The eighteenth section of the Schedule provides (Code 1904, p. cclxxviii) that: "In all elections held after this Constitution goes into effect, the qualifications of electors shall be those required by article two of this Constitution." And the contention is that the phrase "all elections" embraces, not only all elections provided for by the Constitution, but elections of every kind and description, that it fastens itself upon, regulates, and controls the power of the Legislature with respect to all elections which it may see fit to order, and confines the electorate to those having the qualifications required by article 2 of the Constitution (Code 1904, p. cxxi).

It is true that in the interpretation of all writings words must be construed with reference to their plain and ordinary meaning, and, if possible, every word must be given its due force and effect; but in the effort to give to words their due force, we must not lose sight of other parts of the instrument, but each part must be construed with reference to the whole, so as to make it harmonious and sensible as a whole.

As was said by Judge Moncure in the Richmond Mayoralty Case, 19 Gratt. 712: "The office of a schedule is to provide for a transition from the old to the new government, and to obviate inconveniences which would otherwise arise from such transition." Elsewhere in the same opinion it is said that, "if a convention in framing the Schedule should plainly show an intention to place any of its provisions beyond the control of the Legislature, such provisions, being the act of the representatives of the sovereignty of the state without any constitutional restrictions, would be as effectual and binding as if they were embodied in the Constitution itself."

The general principle, however, is that the office of a schedule, as this Schedule discloses, is not to cure defects or provide for omissions in the Constitution; not to introduce new and substantive provisions into the Constitution. There was no occasion for that. The whole subject, the entire instrument, was within the breast of the convention and subject in all its parts to be altered and amended as to the convention seemed best. Is it to be supposed that under such circumstances a provision which was to limit the power of the Legislature over a numerous and important class of subjects, a power which had existed in and been exercised by all preceding Legislatures, would have been postponed to the Schedule? To do so would be to suggest doubt and to invite controversy, when, if such was the purpose of the convention, it could have been placed beyond the pale of question or debate by its insertion where it properly belonged.

But it is urged upon us that the convention was called and the Constitution was adopted in order to purge the electorate of ignorant and undesirable voters, and that, unless all elections of whatever description are to be confided to the electorate thus established, the convention to that extent fell short of discharging its duty.

We have seen that in the several Constitutions of this state down to that of 1869, and under it after the amendment of 1876, the General Assembly, without question in numerous instances and in furtherance of various objects, exercised its power and discretion in submitting questions to an electorate of its own choosing with qualifications different from those prescribed by the Constitution. We have seen that the Constitution of 1869 provided in express terms that the electorate which it established should vote "upon all questions submitted to the people"; and we have seen that this provision was stricken out, and the phrase, "for members of the General Assembly and all officers elective by the people," was inserted, thereby bringing the Constitution of 1869 into harmony with the long-established policy of the commonwealth.

This circumstance seems to us to be one of the utmost importance. From 1776 to 1869 the power had been exercised by the General Assembly, when dealing with elections not provided for in the Constitution, to prescribe the qualifications for an electorate as to such elections. By the Constitution of 1869 this power was taken away, and the people of Virginia, with their attention directed to the specific question, voted to strike this provision from the Constitution and restored the power to the General Assembly.

It is true that the convention of 1901 was assembled in order to purge the electorate of ignorant and undesirable voters. When the convention met, the chief difficulty encountered in the performance of their duty was found in the limitations upon their power contained in the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments to the Constitution of the United States.

The object of the fourteenth amendment, so far as it bears upon the question before us, was to secure "the right to vote at any election for the choice of electors for President and Vice President of the United States, Representatives in Congress, the executive and judicial officers of a state, or the members of the Legislature thereof."

The fifteenth amendment declares that "the right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any state on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude." Code 1904, p. civl.

We think that it may fairly be said that the fifteenth amendment is intended to secure the right of citizens to vote in the elections enumerated in the fourteenth amendment; that, with respect to the right of suffrage, the two amendments cover and embrace the same objects.

These amendments imposed the only limitations that existed upon the power of the convention to deal with the question of suffrage, and certainly the fourteenth amendment never contemplated an election such as we are now considering.

So far as the history of the times throws light upon the situation, there is nothing to suggest that any part of the evil with which the convention had to deal grew out of or was in any degree referable to the improper exercise of the power which the Legislature had theretofore possessed to provide an electorate other than that created by the Constitution for the determination of elections for which the Constitution itself did not provide.

The exercise of the power having been the subject of no complaint, it may well be supposed that the convention felt that, having purged the electorate by which the General Assembly was to be chosen, that body would be in the future entitled to the same confidence and respect which it had theretofore enjoyed.

It is said, however, that, unless the construction contended for by defendants in error be given to the eighteenth section of the Schedule, it would be meaningless and inoperative.

The Schedule provided for convening the Legislature within five days after the Constitution went into effect. The eighteenth section of the Schedule provides that in all elections held after the Constitution goes into effect the qualification of electors shall be those required by article 2 of the Constitution; that is, with respect to all elections which were intended to be embraced by this section of the Schedule all the requirements of article 2 should apply, not this or that section of article 2, but article 2 as an entirety. Some of the sections of that article are not self-executing and require legislative action to render them operative. The Schedule refers in terms to many, if not all, the elections, state, county, and municipal provided for by the Constitution, and it is a reasonable construction of the eighteenth section of the Schedule to make it apply either to all elections ordained by the Constitution or to all such as are mentioned in the Schedule itself, if any election provided for by the Constitution be omitted; or, to put it more accurately, is such a construction so manifestly contrary to, unwarranted by, and so plainly at war with the Constitution that it must be condemned by the courts?

The word "all" is without doubt one of very comprehensive meaning, but the meaning to be given to it in any particular case must be determined by its context. It may have its broadest signification, or it may be limited in its meaning to all of a particular kind or class. This phrase "all elections" has been frequently construed by the courts of other states.

In Birchmore v. State Board of Canvassers, 78 S. C. 461, 59 S. E. 145, the Supreme Court of South Carolina held that an election to determine whether or not intoxicating liquor may be sold in a precinct is within a constitutional provision that all elections shall be by ballot. This case is reported in 14 L. R. A. (N. S.) p. 850, and is the subject of an elaborate note, in which it is said "that the position of the court that the phrase 'all elections,' as used in the Constitution, was sufficiently broad to include, not only elections for the selection of officers, but also elections to determine any particular or special question which might be submitted to the electors, seems to be contrary to the weight of authority, as the general rule appears to be that the words 'election' or 'all elections' imply merely elections for the selection of officers, and that elections for the decision of some stated proposition need not be conducted under the formal and prescribed rules for elections for the selection of officers." In support of this criticism many cases are cited.

In Valverde v. Shattuck, 19 Colo. 104, 34 Pac. 947, 41 Am. St. Rep. 208, the Constitution in question provided that "every male person over the age of twenty-one years, possessing the following qualifications, shall be entitled to vote at all elections." The court said: "In our opinion the word 'elections' thus used does not have its general or comprehensive signification, including all acts of voting, choice, or selection without limitation, but is used in a more restricted political sense,—as elections of public officers."

In Graham v. Greenville, 67 Tex. 62, 2 S. W. 742, article 503 of the Revised Statutes of 1879, reads as follows: "Whenever a majority of the inhabitants qualified to vote for members of the state Legislature of any territory adjoining the limits of any city accepting the provisions of this title, to the extent of one-half mile in width, shall vote in favor of becoming a part of said city, any three of them may make affidavit to the fact, to be filed before the mayor, who shall certify the same to the city council of said city." Under this law the court held that a petition signed by a majority of the qualified voters within a certain district was a sufficient vote to determine the question of annexation, although the Constitution said that in all elections by the people the vote should be by ballot; the court holding that this provision of the Constitution did not provide that the will of a limited number of people on any subject in which they might be interested should be ascertained in no other way than by ballot.

In Porter v. Crook, 126 Ala. 600, 28 South. 745, the Constitution provided that all elections by the people should be by ballot, and that the General Assembly should pass laws to regulate and govern elections in the state, and all such laws should be uniform throughout the state, and that no classes of qualified voters should be excluded from participating in the elections. The Legislature passed a law providing for an election to establish a county seat, which law required ballots to be numbered, and that the election be restricted to voters within the county. The court said that it might well be doubted whether the provisions of the article of the Constitution cited above did not relate exclusively to elections held to select public officers; but that it was unnecessary to decide that question, as the power to locate or change a county seat was exclusively in the Legislature, and it could prescribe any method for selecting a location that it chose.

In Pritchard v. Magoun, 109 Iowa, 364, 80 N. W. 512, 46 L. R. A. 381, a statute contained the following provisions: "That in all elections to be held after November 1st, 1892, in the state, for public officers (except those elected at school elections), the voting shall be by ballots, printed and distributed at public expense as hereinafter provided; and no other ballot shall be used." "The term 'city election' shall apply to any municipal election held in a city or incorporated town." The court held that the latter provision was not intended to apply to a special election, although held within the limits of a city, and the provisions, taken together, did not require that an election to decide the question of raising money to build a bridge should be by ballot.

And the same laws were held not to apply to a special election held for the purpose of raising money to support a railroad. Bras v. McConnell, 114 Iowa, 402, 87 N. W. 290.

See, also, Buckner v. Gordon, 81 Ky. 665; Belles v. Burr, 76 Mich. 1, 43 N. W. 24.

In Hanna v. Young, 84 Md. 179, 35 Atl. 674, 34 L. R. A. 55, 57 Am. St. Rep. 396, the Supreme Court of Maryland construed a provision of the Constitution of that state which reads as follows: "All elections shall be by ballot and every male citizen of the United States of the age of twenty-one years or upwards, who has been a resident of the state for one year, and of the legislative district of Baltimore city, or of the county, in which he may offer to vote, for six months next preceding the election, shall be entitled to vote, in the ward or election district in which he resides, at all elections hereafter to be held in the state." "It is contended," said the court, "that this section of the Constitution plainly comprehends and includes within its express terms all elections, whether state, federal, county, or municipal. Yet there is but one municipality mentioned in this section of the organic law, and, in fact, Baltimore city is the only municipality mentioned eo nomine in any part of the Constitution. This court in Smith v. Stephan, 66 Md. 381, 7 Atl. 561, 10 Atl. 671, Mr. Justice Bryan, delivering the opinion of the court, said: 'It is sufficient to say that no municipal elections except those held in the city of Baltimore are within the terms or meaning of the Constitution.' Whilst the Constitution of Maryland (article 3, § 48) authorizes and empowers the General Assembly to create corporations for municipal purposes, it nowhere prohibits the Legislature from imposing upon the qualified voters residing within the corporate limits of a town any reasonable restrictions it may deem proper, when seeking the exercise of the right of elective franchise in the selection of its officers. In this respect the power of the Legislature is unlimited."

The contention before the Maryland court was, as here, that the act in question was void because the Constitution had conferred the right and prescribed the qualifications of electors at all elections, and the Legislature was therefore without authority to change or add to them in any manner. Speaking to this proposition, the court said: "The Constitution of this state provides for the creation of certain officers, state and county, which are filled, either by election or by appointment; and we regard it as an unreasonable inference to suppose that municipal elections held within the state (outside the corporate limits of Baltimore city) can be properly termed elections under the Constitution, such as state and county elections, or that the framers of the Constitution ever contemplated that article 1, § 1, of that instrument, was intended to apply to municipal elections, such as the one now under consideration, which is the mere creature of statutory enactment." The court then refers with approval to the case of State ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. Dillon, 32 Fla. 545, 14 South. 383, 22 L. R. A. 124, where it was held that the suffrage provision in the Constitution of that state, prescribing the qualifications of voters at all elections under it, does not apply to elections for municipal officers, but such elections are subject to statutory regulation; and further, that it is competent for the Legislature to prescribe the qualifications of voters at the same. Continuing, the Maryland court says: "It is only at elections which the Constitution itself requires to be held, or which the Legislature under the mandate of the Constitution makes provision for, that persons having the qualifications set forth in said section 1, art. 1, are by the Constitution of the state to be qualified electors." See, also, McMahon v. Savannah, 66 Ga. 217, 42 Am. Rep. 65.

We have freely used the notes to cases in Lawyers' Reports Annotated, and cheerfully acknowledge our obligation.

To recapitulate the case made by the record: We find that the power which the order appealed from denies to the General Assembly has been exercised by that body under every Constitution of this commonwealth from 1776 down to that of 1902. Down to the Constitution of 1830, the right to vote was expressly given by the Constitutions only as to members of the General Assembly. By the Constitution of 1850, the right was extended by adding the phrase "all officers elective by the people." The Constitution of 1864 used the same expression. In 1869 the constitutional provision was extended to "all questions submitted to the people," which was by direct vote of the people stricken out in 1876, and the right "to vote for members of the General Assembly and all officers elective by the people" was substituted for it. As we have seen, the principal object of calling the convention of 1901 was to purge the electorate of undesirable and ignorant voters, and the chief difficulty in accomplishing that object was found in the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments to the Constitution of the United States. The provision of the second article of the state Constitution confers a right of suffrage which is practically commensurate with these amendments. The Constitution of the state, exclusive of the Schedule, it is conceded, does not make the act of Assembly here called in question unconstitutional; but, if it be so, it is by virtue of the eighteenth section of the Schedule. The office of a schedule is to "provide for the transition from the old to the new government," and not to introduce independent and substantive provisions of law into the Constitution, though it is conceded that it may be done if such purpose plainly appears. When the Schedule was prepared, the whole of the Constitution was still within the control of the convention to alter and amend as it deemed proper, and, had such been the purpose, a provision so important as that under consideration would have been inserted in its appropriate place in plain and unequivocal language, as was done in the Constitution of 1869, and not in an unusual and inappropriate place and expressed in undecided and ambiguous terms, certain to cause doubt and to invite controversy. The phrase "all elections," as must have been known to the learned lawyers in the convention, had in many states been held to refer only to such elections as had been prescribed by the Constitution itself, and, indeed, at the time the Schedule was adopted, there was no decision to the contrary; the case of Birchmore v. State Board of Canvassers, supra, having been decided since that date.

We have seen that article 2 was not self-executing as to some of its features, and that the Schedule provided for the assembling of the Legislature within five days after the Constitution went into effect. Many, if not all, of the elections mentioned in the Constitution are referred to in the Schedule, and it was a natural and proper thing, under all the circumstances, to insert a mandatory clause in the Schedule which made it imperative upon the General Assembly to provide at once that "all elections" within the purview of the Constitution and Schedule should be held in accordance with article 2.

When all these facts are recalled, and the rules of construction to which we have referred are applied to them, when we reflect that all legislative power may be exercised by the General Assembly, except as restrained by the Constitution, that it is only in cases of plain and palpable repugnancy to the Constitution that we can declare the statute to be unconstitutional, and that to doubt is to affirm the validity of the statute—we are led to the conclusion that the statute in question is a valid expression of legislative power.

Bull et al. v. Read, 13 Grat. 78, is a leading case in this state, and beyond its limits with respect to the power of the Legislature to make the operation of a statute dependent upon a vote of the people thereafter to be taken, or other future contingency, and in the course of his opinion, Judge Lee speaks as follows: "As to the wisdom and expediency of this kind of legislation, this is not the place to express an opinion. To say that it is liable to be abused is but to affirm what is equally true of every mode of legislation. Whilst there may be occasions on which it may be adopted with advantage to the public interest, it may also be resorted to upon others to enable the representative to escape from his just responsibilities. Yet, however profoundly impressed the judicial mind may be in any given instance with its impropriety and inexpediency, it will not do to say that for that cause the law may be set aside. This would but be for the judiciary to set itself up as a revisory body upon the acts of the General Assembly, and would be a plain usurpation upon the powers conferred upon that body. * * * How great soever the evil may be, the security against it must be sought in the wisdom and integrity of the legislative body, or, failing these, the corrective will be found in the virtue and intelligence of the people."

No matter how ingeniously arranged may be the checks and limitations imposed by Constitutions, the point will at last be reached where confidence must be reposed, and wherever that occurs there is danger of its abuse. It is impossible in a Constitution, however elaborate, to provide for every contingency. Something must be left to the discretion of those intrusted with the conduct of government. The General Assembly, the direct agent and representative of the sovereignty of the people, is the natural and necessary repository of power, to be exercised at its discretion for the general good, except as the people have seen fit, in express terms or by necessary implication, to impose limitations and restraints. Any other conclusion is founded upon distrust of the people and their representatives.

We are of opinion that the act under which the election was held is not repugnant to the Constitution of the state, but is a valid exercise of legislative power, and that the judgment of the corporation court of the city of Fredericksburg must be reversed.

Reversed.

HARRISON, J. (dissenting). I cannot concur in the opinion of the majority of the court in this case.

A great jurist has said that in construing Constitutions "every word employed in the Constitution is to be expounded in its plain, obvious and common sense meaning, unless the context furnishes some ground to control, qualify or enlarge it. Constitutions are not designed for metaphysical or logical subtleties; for niceties of expression; for critical propriety; for elaborate shades of meaning; or for the exercise of philosophical acuteness or judicial research. They are instruments of a practical nature, founded on the common business of life, adapted to common wants, designed for common use, and fitted for common understandings. The people make them; the people adopt them; the people must be supposed to read them with the help of common sense; and cannot be presumed to admit in them any recondite meaning, or any extraordinary gloss." Dwarris on Statutes and Constitutions, p. 675, quoting from Judge Story.

The constitutional convention performed the paramount work for which it was assembled when it reformed and defined the electorate of Virginia. In the preparation of article 2 of the Constitution the mind of the convention was addressed to and absorbed with the responsible duty of determining upon the character and qualifications of those who should constitute our future electorate. After this work had been satisfactorily accomplished, the convention turned its attention to a consideration of the elections to which the new electorate should apply, and this important question was settled by the adoption of section 18 of the Schedule, which provides that: "In all elections held after this Constitution goes into effect, the qualifications of electors shall be those required by article two of this Constitution."

There is no ambiguity about this language. It has no recondite meaning. The convention expresses its purpose in terms that cannot be misunderstood when it declares that, in all elections held after this Constitution goes into effect, the qualifications of electors shall be those required by article 2 of this Constitution.

This court has said that "all" is the most comprehensive word in the English language. I am aware of no canon of construction which authorizes any meaning to be given to this provision other than that which its plain and simple language imports. Section 18 of the Schedule is conceded to be a part of the Constitution. It must, therefore, be given the same force and effect that is attributed to any other provision of the instrument. When it is read in connection with article 2 and other provisions of the Constitution, the conclusion is to my mind irresistible that the convention did not intend to leave the Legislature with power to prescribe the qualifications of the electorate in all special elections held in this commonwealth.

It is said that section 62 of the Constitution is authority for the Legislature to provide an electorate in local option elections with other qualifications than those prescribed by article 2 of the Constitution.

Section 62 (Code 1904, p. cccxlii) is as follows: "The General Assembly shall have full power to enact local option or dispensary laws, or any other laws controlling, regulating, or prohibiting the manufacture or sale of intoxicating liquors."

The expression "local option laws" employed in this section necessarily implies local option elections; the purpose of a local option law being to provide for holding local option elections. The convention had already determined upon the qualifications that the future Virginia electorate should possess, and there is, in my opinion, nothing in this section that warrants the view that the convention intended thereby to leave the Legislature with unrestrained power to create any electorate, with or without qualifications, that to it might seem proper in local option elections. The purpose of the provision was merely to emphasize the fact that the convention did not intend to restrict the power the Legislature had always possessed to control and regulate the manufacture or sale of intoxicating liquors. The language employed I think excludes the idea that it was intended to ingraft upon the provision already adopted, which prescribed the qualifications of the electorate, an exception in favor of local option elections. What reason could there have been for not having as pure an electorate to determine the question of local option as was required to settle any other question that might be submitted to the voters of a community?

The General Assembly of 1904, which put the Constitution into operation, as to all special elections, provided that the qualifications of voters in all special and local option elections should be those prescribed by article 2 of the Constitution, thereby placing upon the Constitution the meaning so plainly pointed out by section 18 of the Schedule. Acts 1904, p. 213, c. 115 (Code 1904, § 62). The Legislature of 1908, by the act now under consideration, amended the act of 1904 so as to reduce the measure of qualification from the standard prescribed by the Constitution in the case of special and local option elections. After prescribing what the qualifications of voters should be at any special election or any local option election, the act proceeds to define its meaning as follows: "The term 'special election,' as used in this section, shall be construed to include such elections as are held in pursuance of a special law as well as such as are held to fill a vacancy in any office, whether the same be filled by the qualified voters of the state, or of any county, corporation, magisterial district or ward." So that under this act, the constitutionality of which is attacked, the Legislature assumes the power to prescribe a different qualification for voters from those prescribed by the fundamental law, not only in local option elections, but in all special elections, including such as may be held to fill vacancies in office. Acts 1908, p. 83, c. 73.

By section 30 of article 2 of the Constitution of 1902 (Code 1904, p. ccxiv), the Legislature is given power under stated circumstances to enlarge the qualifications of the electorate by adding a property qualification of $250; but not in line or word do we find an intimation that it can, under any circumstances, diminish the qualifications prescribed by the Constitution.

Special elections are, in most cases, of much greater interest and importance to those immediately concerned than are elections involving the selection of public officials, and there was, at least, as much reason and necessity for throwing the protection of a purified electorate around the interests involved in those elections as there was to prescribe limitations and restrictions for the qualification of voters who were to participate in the election of public officers.

It is insisted that the act in question was necessary to avoid inconvenience as to the time of holding special elections; that without the act, under the constitutional provision requiring the six months' prepayment of poll tax, special elections could not be held except during a portion of the year.

I do not so understand the present laws on the subject. The right of suffrage, under our Constitution, is a privilege. It is not compulsory. Every citizen who possesses the prescribed qualifications has the right to cast his ballot, but he must first qualify himself, and that is a matter that rests with him, depending upon his own voluntary act. One of the essentials of his qualification as a voter is that he shall have personally paid, at least six months prior to the election, all state poll taxes assessed or assessable against him under the Constitution during the three years next preceding that in which he offers to vote. The three years next preceding that in which he offers to vote plainly refers to the three tax years preceding that in which he offers to vote. The tax year commences on February 1st and ends on February 1st of each year. By section 491 of the Code of 1887 (Code 1904, p. 252), it is made the duty of the commissioner of the revenue to ascertain and assess all male persons of full age and sound mind residing in his district on the 1st day of February in each year. It is to my mind clear that under existing tax laws any voter who pays his poll taxes on any day prior to the 1st day of August in any year can vote in every election held on any day in the next succeeding year, beginning on the 1st day of February and ending the following February. For example, if the poll tax is paid before the 1st day of August, 1908, the voter so paying is entitled to vote in any election held in any month or on any day of the month during the year beginning February 1, 1909, and ending the 1st day of the following February. Hence every voter can qualify himself to vote in all elections by paying his poll tax prior to the 1st day of August in each year.

But it is said the treasurer may not be ready to receive the poll taxes prior to the 1st day of August. No reason is perceived why he should not be. If, however, any such inconvenience should arise under the existing laws, the Legislature has the power to modify those laws so as to remedy the inconvenience. The laws should be made to yield to the Constitution, and not the Constitution to the laws.

That the Constitution contemplates other elections than those held for the election of officers and members of the General Assembly fully appears from numerous sections of that instrument. I will advert to two by way of illustration.

Section 98 (Code 1904, p. cccxxiii) provides for special elections to determine the question of abolishing the corporation courts in cities of the second class by the qualified electors of such cities.

Section 127 (Code 1904, p. ccxlii) provides for an election to determine the issue of bonds by a city, by a majority of the qualified voters of such city, either at a general or special election for that purpose.

Can it be doubted that the qualified voters mentioned in these provisions for special elections means voters who are qualified in the manner prescribed by article 2 of the Constitution? And when the Constitution, in a subsequent provision, says, "In all elections held after this Constitution goes into effect, the qualifications of electors shall be those required by article two," is there room to doubt that it was intended to embrace the special elections which it expressly mentions and provides shall be submitted to the qualified voters?

Much is said of the provisions of former Constitutions of this state, and the powers that the Legislature had under them, as bearing upon the construction of our present Constitution. No former Constitution of this state was adopted under the conditions and circumstances that surrounded her people at the time of the adoption of the present Constitution. Cases are cited construing the Constitutions of other states as authority for the construction put upon this Constitution. I do not know the circumstances under which those Constitutions were framed, nor do I know the motives which impelled the action of the framers. These authorities can, therefore, have but little weight in determining the grave question now involved in the construction of our own Constitution.

As illustrative of the policy of the state in the past, much importance is attached to the circumstance that the Constitution of 1869 provided that the electorate which it established should vote "upon all questions submitted to the people," and that seven years afterwards that provision was stricken out, and the language, "for members of the General Assembly and all officers elective by the people," was substituted.

The Constitution of 1869, known as the "Underwood Constitution," was imposed upon an unwilling people by an alien and inimical body. It had established an ignorant and vicious electorate that was a menace to our civilization. The amendment mentioned was the first effort of an oppressed people to do what they might to relieve the situation then confronting them. With that end in view they adopted the amendment referred to, because they preferred that a democratic white Legislature should prescribe the electorate which was to determine the important questions involved in special elections rather than have such questions settled by the corrupt electorate prescribed by the Constitution of 1869. The Legislature was all we had at that time, but since then the people of Virginia have framed their own Constitution and defined their own electorate, and are no longer confronted with the perils that made it necessary for them at the time to lodge that power in the hands of the Legislature.

The present decision is far-reaching in its effect and consequences. When I recall, as I must do, the history of the times, and remember that the purpose for which the recent convention was called was primarily and above all else to release the people of this commonwealth from the menace of a debased electorate, and to provide for them a reformed and purified electorate, I am unable to give my assent to the conclusion that those high purposes have failed, and that the right of suffrage has been left by the Constitution to the unrestrained power of the Legislature to create any electorate it may see fit in all that large, important, and rapidly increasing class of elections, other than general elections for members of the Legislature and officers elective by the people.

For these reasons I am of opinion that the judgment of the learned judge of the corporation court of the city of Fredericksburg is right, and should be affirmed.

1. ELECTIONS (§ 83*)—QUALIFICATION OF VOTERS—PAYMENT OF TAXES—MANNER OF PAYMENT—"PERSONALLY PAY."

Const. 1902, § 20, art. 2 (Code 1904, p. ccxii), provides that male citizens who have personally paid poll taxes for three years shall be entitled to register, and section 21 (Code 1904, p. ccxiii), gives such person the right to vote if he has personally paid such poll tax at least six months prior to the election. Held, that the phrase, "personally pay," in section 21, does not require that the voter be physically and bodily present when he pays his tax, but only that his tax be paid by him out of his own funds, though the amount be sent by check or through an agent.

3. ELECTIONS (§ 19*)—STATUTORY PROVISIONS—POWER OF LEGISLATURE TO ENACT.

The Legislature has power to require a city treasurer to keep a record of the payment of poll taxes in order to show who had paid their poll taxes so as to be entitled to register and vote.

Error to Law and Chancery Court of City of Norfolk.

Mandamus by John G. Tilton and others against H. D. Herman, Treasurer, and others. Judgment awarding a writ directing defendants to include only certain names on the list of persons entitled to vote, and petitioners bring error. Reversed, and writ awarded in accordance with opinion.

R. R. Hicks and the Attorney General, for plaintiffs in error. N. T. Green and J. B. Jenkins, for defendants in error.

CARDWELL, J. This is a writ of error to the judgment of the court of law and chancery of the city of Norfolk, directing, by mandamus, H. D. Herman, treasurer of that city, to include in the list required of him by law to be made and filed five months before each regular election with the clerk of the corporation court of the city only those voters who were physically present and had paid, and not all voters in his city who had paid at least six months before such regular election, the state poll taxes required by the Constitution during the three years next preceding that in which such election is held; this case being a sequel to the case of Tazewell et al. v. Herman, Treasurer, 108 Va. 416, 60 S. E. 767, 61 S. E. 752, recently decided by this court, in which it was held that said list to be made up and filed by the treasurer should only contain the names of those persons who at least six months prior to the election had personally paid the poll taxes required of them as a prerequisite to their right to register and vote at an ensuing regular election. In denying a rehearing of that decision, the court said: "What constitutes a personal payment, therefore, within the meaning of article 2 of the Constitution of 1902 (Code 1904, p. ccxi), was not involved in the case (Tazewell v. Herman), was not argued by counsel for the defendant in error, and was not considered or passed upon by the court. A failure, therefore, to pass upon that question, furnishes no ground to grant a rehearing. When a case is before the court, where that question is involved, it will be considered and decided, but until then any expression of opinion on the subject would scarcely be proper, and, at most, would be mere obiter."

The question not involved in that case, and therefore not passed upon, is the precise question presented in this; the lower court having held that the treasurer of the city of Norfolk, in making out and certifying to the clerk of the corporation court the list of persons who had paid their capitation taxes, etc., should include therein only the names of those voters "who were physically present when they themselves paid their poll-taxes to the treasurer, and should omit therefrom the names of such persons as were not bodily present when their poll taxes were paid on or before the 2d day of May, 1908." In other words, the learned judge below held that the words "personally pay" mean payment only in bodily person.

The learned Attorney General, considering the public interests involved in the case to be of great moment, on behalf of those interests, unites with counsel for plaintiffs in error in urging upon this court not only to review and reverse the ruling of the lower court in this case, but also to review and overrule its own decision in Tazewell v. Herman, supra.

Considering these questions in inverse order, we deem it only necessary to say with respect to the last mentioned that this court upon mature consideration of the reasons urged and ably argued in the present case why the decision in the case of Tazewell v. Herman, supra, should be abrogated and a ruling the reverse of that therein made should be made in this case, for the reasons stated in the former opinion, as well as others which will be incidentally, but necessarily, referred to in disposing of the remaining question now before us, is of opinion that the ruling of the court upon the question involved in the former case should be adhered to and be regarded as conclusive of that question.

Coming, then, to the remaining question: What is meant by the words "personally paid," as used in section 20 of article 2 of the present Constitution of 1902 (Code 1904, p. ccxii), and "personally pay," as used in section 21 of the same article (Code 1904, p. ccxiii)? In other words, does the use of these words in the Constitution, where the right of franchise is dealt with, mean that, in order to entitle a citizen of the State to register and vote, he must in person, in bodily presence, pay to the treasurer of his city or county the poll taxes required of a voter as a condition precedent to the right to register and vote, or do these words mean only that the tax must be paid by the voter out of his own estate or means, and not by another out of that other's estate or means?

To determine that question, we should look to the evil which the framers of the Constitution had in view, and then to the remedy intended to be applied.

As was said in the opinion in Tazewell v. Herman, supra: "It is manifest that one of the reasons for requiring that the voter shall personally pay his poll tax was to remedy a great evil which had prevailed at one time under the Constitution of 1869. That evil was that political and other organization, candidates for office, and others paid or caused to be paid the poll tax of voters in order to improperly influence and control the votes of the persons whose tax they so paid."

That is a clear statement of the evil which our late convention sought to remedy when they came to frame article 2 of the present Constitution, which deals with elective franchise and qualification for office; and it was unquestionably the purpose of that article to exclude from the electorate of the state that class of citizens who are not entitled to have the right of franchise by reason of not "having sufficient evidence of permanent common interest with, and attachment to, the community" (section 6, Bill of Rights [Code 1904, p. cclx]); and clearly a citizen who permits the poll tax required of him as well as of all other citizens of the state over the age of 21 years, by section 173 of the Constitution of 1902 (Code 1904, p. cclxiii), to be paid by another for corrupt and illegal purposes, might reasonably expect to be excluded from the class of citizens declared in the Bill of Rights to be entitled to the right of franchise. And it is equally as clear to us that it was never the intent of that able body of men who framed our present Constitution to make it even possible that hundreds and thousands of the best citizens of our State might be deprived of their right of franchise, although they had paid out of their own estate or means, as contradistinguished from the means or estate of others, the poll taxes required as a prerequisite to their right to vote merely because they did not in bodily presence make the payment to the collecting officer. From such a lamentable result in thousands of instances there would be no escape, if the word "personally" used in the Constitution were restricted to "in propria persona."

It is true that the word "personally" may and often does, mean in person. It also often means "in propria persona"; but that is not its necessary and only meaning, and many instances could be cited in which it could not be given that meaning. Suffice it to say that the word is used in a number of our existing statutes in which it could not with any sort of reasonableness be given the meaning which is here contended for.

The principal definition of the word "personally" given by Webster and by the Century Dictionary is, "in a personal manner," and every one of ordinary intelligence understands that he does not personally or "in a personal manner" pay a debt he owes unless its payment reduces his estate or means to the extent of the payment; and that if this be not the case, but the debt be paid by another out of that other's means, such debtor could not claim that he had personally discharged the obligation. Where, however, the debtor was the source of the payment and paid the debt because he desired to discharge the obligation out of his own funds, it is, as would seem clear, a personal payment, no matter by what method or avenue the money is made to reach the hand of the creditor.

So, as would seem equally clear, where it appears that a voter was the source of the payment of the poll taxes required of him, and paid them out of his own estate or funds because he wished to pay them, it is a personal payment by the voter, whether the money was handed by the voter to the treasurer or to one of his deputies or was sent by check drawn on a bank in which the drawer had funds to meet its payment, or by the hand of the taxpayer's clerk or duly authorized agent, and a payment by a voter of his poll tax in any of the methods mentioned other than the handling of the money himself to the treasurer would as effectually guard against the corrupt practices which article 2 of the Constitution is designed to prevent as would a manual delivery of the money to the treasurer, and the voter would stand on the same footing, so far as being free from influence is concerned, in the one case as in the other, since there would be in neither case the apprehended ground of improper influence or control of the voter.

Any other construction of the constitutional provision would no more effectuate the intentment of the provision than the one we think is required, and certainly would be much more unreasonable, when it is remembered that, if the ruling of the lower court be upheld, many of our best citizens would, as before stated, be deprived of their right to vote, although the taxes required of them had in good faith been paid within the required time out of their own means, and not out of the means of another, and that too merely for the reason that the voter, either by sickness or absence miles and miles away from his home on business or perhaps in search of health, could not appear in person, "in bodily presence," and himself hand the money to the treasurer or his deputy in due time.

The answer to the argument for defendants in error, that it would be no more unreasonable to require the voter to go in person to the treasurer and pay his poll tax than to require that he go in person to register as a voter and also when he casts his vote, is that, in order to become a registered voter, the person offering to register has to take and subscribe a required oath, and it may be to answer interrogatories propounded to him by the registrar, which oath cannot be taken and subscribed, nor answer be made to interrogatories propounded, by any one except the voter himself; and, as voting in this state is required to be by ballot—secret ballot—ex vi termini the voter must cast his ballot in person, in bodily presence. With respect to registration and voting, the requirement of bodily presence is necessary, and therefore reasonable; while, with respect to the payment of a tax as a prerequisite to the right to vote, it would be not only unnecessary but unreasonable.

And the answer to the further contention, that the meaning of the words "personally pay" applied by the learned judge below would more surely effectuate the intention of the framers of the Constitution, is that the agent of the "political or other organization, candidates for office or others, spoken of by Buchanan, J., in Tazewell v. Herman, supra, would have only to stand on the outside and give to each voter whose vote is purchasable or could be controlled the amount of the poll tax as he enters the treasurer's office, and, upon the voter's handing the money to the treasurer, he would be qualified to vote.

We are aware that the ruling of this court in the former case places a power in the hands of the treasurers which may be greatly abused, but such is the mandate of the Constitution as it appears to us.

As was said by Keith, P., in Willis et al. v. Kalmbach et al., 64 S. E. 342, handed down at the present term: "It is impossible in a Constitution, however elaborate, to provide for every contingency, something has to be left to the discretion of those intrusted with the conduct of government."

For this very reason, no doubt, the convention, recognizing that it might be found necessary to require further evidence than that of the treasurer's list as to the prepayment of capitation taxes, by section 88 of article 2 (Code 1904, p. ccxvi), left that duty upon the Legislature. By that section of the Constitution, as interpreted by this court in Tazewell v. Herman, supra, the treasurer is required to place on the list only persons who have "personally" paid the poll taxes required of them, and paid the same at least six months prior to the date of an ensuing regular election, which it is declared shall be conclusive evidence of the facts stated in the list for the purpose of voting; and, if for any reason a voter's name is improperly omitted from the list, a remedy is provided by the same section of the Constitution. If the treasurer should, for an illegal and corrupt purpose, improperly place on the list the name of any person or persons not entitled to have his or their names thereon, beyond question the general laws of the state provide adequate means for the punishment of such malfeasance in office.

The suggestion that, if the treasurer is not to put on the list the names of the persons who did not in person—in bodily presence—pay their poll taxes, the list would not afford the auditor the intended proof as to all who had paid, loses its entire force when it is remembered that the general laws make ample provision for requiring a treasurer to account for all the state's revenues that he receives.

The question we are considering being one of first impression in this state, the adjudications of our court have afforded us no assistance; but the authorities from without the state sustain the view we have taken.

In State ex rel. Lamar v. Dillon, 32 Fla. 545, 14 South. 383, 22 L. R. A. 124, 139 (a well-argued and considered case), the question involved was very similar to the one we have under consideration. The Florida law provided that the voter should qualify himself "by registering and himself paying his own poll taxes" for the requisite years more than two weeks before the election, and the precise question was whether the voter was required to pay those taxes in his own person, which question was decided in the negative; the opinion of the Supreme Court of Florida saying: "Our consideration of the provisions mentioned is that they do not deprive the voter of his right to pay his poll taxes through an authorized agent, and that a payment made by such agent would be a valid payment under the terms of the act. A liberal construction should obtain in favor of the voter's right to make the payment through another, and the act does not in terms deny such right. It is true it says 'himself paying his own poll taxes' for the years mentioned, but the general principle, 'qui facit per alium facit per se,' should apply, and the payment through an authorized agent would be the payment by the voter himself." See, also, section 110, McCrary on Elections; 15 Cyc. p. 297.

In our view, the constitutional provision aimed at that class of voters who would not manifest enough interest in the government or the welfare of the community by qualifying themselves as voters in the prescribed mode, but would be willing to exercise the right to vote as any other citizen, although their right to do so were secured by permitting another illegally to pay the taxes required of them, and for corrupt purposes, and merely designed that the payment should be the personal act of the citizen—that it should be by him and with his means. If such was not the purpose, surely the real purpose would have been declared in clear, unmistakable language at the appropriate place, instead of leaving the purpose to depend upon construction.

Within this limitation the constitutional requirement would be met in the instances we have adverted to and also where the tax is paid with the citizen's money sent to the treasurer by a member of his family by his clerk, or other duly authorized agent, and perhaps there are also other ways in which the money could be paid to the treasurer which would justify and require him to include the name of the taxpayer in the list he is required to certify to the Auditor of Public Accounts and to the clerk of his county or corporation.

It is also claimed that this view would put the burden upon the treasurer of having to determine in every case where the payment is not made by the voter in bodily presence whether the payment is out of the taxpayer's own means or out of means furnished by another, and that the burden could not be borne at all by a new treasurer coming into office, as he would not be able to tell who had and who had not personally paid their poll taxes for the two preceding years.

To the first of these contentions we can only repeat that the mandate of the Constitution requires the treasurer to include in his list all persons who have personally paid the required poll taxes at least six months next preceding an ensuing regular election, and to the other contention the answer is that if no record be made in the treasurer's office of the payment of poll taxes, and, when paid, the incoming newly elected treasurer would encounter the same difficulty in certifying these facts as he would in certifying who had personally paid the two preceding years. If a record in the treasurer's office sufficient to enable a newly elected treasurer to perform these duties be not kept, it is entirely within the power of the Legislature to require that such a record be kept, and the fact that this has not heretofore been required can have no sort of bearing on the determination of the question we have before us.

It follows that the judgment of the lower court complained of must be reversed and annulled, and this court will enter its judgment awarding plaintiffs in error a writ of mandamus, directed to H. D. Herman, as treasurer of the city of Norfolk, requiring him to make up, verify, and file with the clerk of the corporation court of said city a list, as provided for in section 38 of article 2 of the Constitution, not only of persons who in bodily presence paid, but also all persons who "personally paid" to him prior to May 2, 1908, the poll taxes required of them, as said words "personally paid" employed in said article of the Constitution are construed in this opinion. The said judgment, however, in favor of plaintiffs in error will be without costs against said H. D. Herman.

Reversed.

HURXTHAL v. ST. LAWRENCE BOOM & MFG. CO.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
March 23, 1909.)

1. NEW TRIAL (§ 71*)—GROUNDS—VERDICT ON CONFLICTING EVIDENCE.

A verdict, depending wholly on conflicting oral testimony of witnesses in the presence of the jury, will not be set aside on the sole ground that it is against the weight and preponderance of such evidence. The jury's province to judge the credibility of such witnesses cannot be so invaded.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see New Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 144, 145; Dec. Dig. § 71.*]

2. DAMAGES (§ 120*)—MEASURE—BREACH OF CONTRACT—CONTRACT TO FURNISH WATER POWER.

In the ascertainment of damages to a mill because of the breach of a contract to maintain dams, and do other things affording a supply of water essential to its operation, an appropriate standard is the rental value of the mill, under conditions that would have existed had the contract been kept, as compared with the rental value when the contract was not kept.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Damages, Dec. Dig. § 120.*]

3. EVIDENCE (§ 498*)—OPINION EVIDENCE—AMOUNT OF DAMAGES.

In such case, the opinion of witnesses acquainted with the premises is admissible as to the amount of damages judged by the standard of rental value.

4. DAMAGES (§ 184*)—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

In the ascertainment of damages, absolute certainty is not required. The causes and probable amount of the loss may be shown with reasonable certainty. Substantial damages may be recovered, though the loss can be stated only approximately.

5. DAMAGES (§ 184*)—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

A verdict for damages cannot be set aside upon the ground that the evidence afforded no basis for ascertainment of its amount, when the facts, circumstances, and data justify the inference that the amount found is a just and reasonable compensation for the injury suffered.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error to Circuit Court, Greenbrier County.

Action by Josie M. Hurxthal against the St. Lawrence Boom & Manufacturing Company. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant brings error. Affirmed.

John W. Harris, Henry Gilmer, J. A. Preston, and H. L. Van Sickler, for plaintiff in error. Williams & Dice, for defendant in error.

ROBINSON, J. This writ of error is a sequel to the decision of the case reported in 53 W. Va. 87, 44 S. E. 520, 97 Am. St. Rep. 954. An understanding of the facts is there disclosed. After that reversal, a new suit on the same cause of action was instituted. It was later consolidated with the old suit, by agreement, it seems. Trial of the case resulted in a verdict in favor of plaintiff for $2,500. Upon that verdict judgment was rendered, over the motion of defendant to set aside the same and award a new trial. The defendant has brought the case here. It assigns as error the giving of certain instructions to the jury, and the court's refusal to set aside the verdict as being contrary to law and the evidence. By a decision of this court on November 26, 1907, the judgment was affirmed. But a rehearing was granted upon the petition of defendant. The case was reargued, and a thorough review of it has since been made.

That review leads us unalterably to the opinion that the former conclusion is right. We find no error in the instructions. They embody law applicable to the case as presented. Nor is it true that plaintiff's cause of action is unsupported by the evidence. That cause of action is the alleged damage to plaintiff's mill by reason of the failure of defendant to perform the contract by which it was obligated to maintain dams, and do other things essential to the furnishing of a water supply for the operation of that mill. That contract is clear and specific; and, from the whole of the evidence adduced, the jury were justified in believing that it was not fulfilled by defendant, and that plaintiff's injury arose from such default. Were the dams maintained, and other things done by defendant to the extent stipulated in the contract? If not, did the failure of defendant to perform its obligations under that contract injure plaintiff's mill? These simple questions embrace that which the jury had for determination as to the fact of damage and the cause thereof. They are answered by the verdict against defendant. Neither is it conclusively shown that plaintiff's own negligence caused the damage, or contributed thereto. The jury were the judges in this regard also. Granting the evidence to be conflicting in the particulars aforesaid, we cannot say that the finding of the jury is unfounded. The finding, in its relation to these particulars, depending, as it does, on oral testimony and the credibility of witnesses, cannot be disturbed. It is not against the decided weight and preponderance of the evidence. It is not manifestly wrong. There is no preponderance for plaintiff, it is said. If such be true, it cannot avail to disturb the verdict; for, as held in Coalmer v. Barrett, 61 W. Va. 237, 56 S. E. 385: "A doubtful case, a slight weight and preponderance of the evidence against the verdict, is not sufficient cause for setting it aside." And it would seem unnecessary to reiterate the well-known rule plainly stated in that case that "a verdict depending solely on conflicting oral evidence, given by witnesses in the presence of the jury, will not be set aside on the ground alone that the verdict is plainly against the decided weight and preponderance of such evidence, because to do so would invade the province of the jury in determining the credibility of such witnesses."

This brings us, then, to the really controverted feature of the case. It is the feature most strongly relied upon by defendant, and, in fact, the only one pressed in the argument upon this rehearing. It is this: Is there in the evidence a basis for ascertainment of the amount of damages? It is insisted that there is nothing upon which the jury could arrive at the amount of $2,500, or any other amount; in other words, that no money value of damages was proved. We find otherwise. An appropriate standard for the ascertainment of damages in such case is the rental value of the mill had the defendant kept its said contract as compared with its rental value when that contract was not kept. Pickens v. Boom & Timber Co., 51 W. Va. 445, 41 S. E. 400, 90 Am. St. Rep. 819; Woodin v. Wentworth, 57 Mich. 278, 23 N. W. 813; Winne v. Kelley, 34 Iowa, 339; Rogers v. Bemus, 69 Pa. 432. True, in a case of this kind a party is not confined to a single mode of measurement for estimating his damages, but rental value is a certain measure. It is a surer criterion than the evidence of lost profits. Counsel on both sides concede that rental value of the mill under conditions when the contract was kept as compared with rental value under conditions when it was not kept was a proper basis for ascertainment of the amount of the damages sustained by plaintiff. But for defendant it is insisted that there is no evidence in the case to which this principle can be applied; that there are no certain or proper data of rental value. Yet we find absolute and specific statements by witnesses as to what the rental value of the mill was under each of the conditions aforesaid. Moreover, it is significant that not a word was offered in contradiction of these statements. Therefore they stand proved. Plaintiff bought the mill, and took with it the rights under defendant's said contract, on March 16, 1899. In May of that year she rented it to Pierpont and Ammonnette, at $1,000 for the first year, $1,200 for the second, and $1,400 for the third year. On January 2, 1900, she took back the mill from her lessees, compelled to do so, it is shown, because of threats, on the part of those lessees, to sue her on account of an insufficient water supply—for the same insufficient water supply which plaintiff insists came about by defendant's breach of its obligations. Yet plaintiff testifies that with water any one would have given from $1,800 to $2,000 per year rental for the mill, and that she would not have rented it for that amount if there had been a sufficient water supply. Two other witnesses, peculiarly competent to speak in that behalf because of intimate acquaintance with the property and its milling business, also state what the rental value would have been had the water been furnished. And the evidence, though conflicting, justified the jury in believing that the water supply would have been sufficient had defendant kept its contract. White, who bid on the mill at judicial sale when plaintiff bought it, and who afterwards purchased it from her, says that from $1,500 to $1,800 per year "would have been right." Ammonnette, one of the aforesaid lessees, plaintiff's miller during this very time, puts the rental value at $2,000 per year, provided the water supply had been good.

What do these witnesses say on the other hand? What do they say the mill was worth during the period for which damage is claimed? Plaintiff says that during the latter part of her ownership she did not make anything, but that she got in debt. One can understand, by natural sense, how delay and stoppage in the operation of a valuable mill, with a miller employed at $75 per month, and other large expenses, continuing despite said stoppage, would destroy the usual profit in such business. Plaintiff says she thinks that she could not have rented it at any price, because of the conditions brought about by the breaches of defendant. The jury, as we have said, could find that there were such breaches, and that by them plaintiff was injured. White says that he would not consider the rental value "very much on account of water," and that "the annoyance to any one who owned it was about all it was worth." Yet he says that there was nothing the matter with the mill itself. Ammonette says that, taking into consideration the water supply, the mill had no rental value. True, the mill did run at times, but from this evidence must it not be known that it did not run with profit? Surely it was competent for the jury to ascertain the amount of damages from such evidence as all this. Plainly, by it, there was before the jury the fact that, because of defendant's violations of the contract, the mill possessed no annual rental value; and just as plainly was it proved that, under conditions such as would have prevailed had the contract not been violated, the rental value of the mill would have been from $1,500 to $2,000 per year. Would not reasonable men then be able easily to compute the amount of the loss caused by defendant? The jury had before them the evidence as to length of the period during which the breaches were made. That period of time covered a space of two years, nine months, and one day. We must not suppose that the jury could not make a computation upon such a plain arithmetical problem. The verdict is within any result obtainable by such computation. "The jury are the judges of the compensation to be paid in case of wrongful damage to real property, and the court will not disturb their finding, unless plainly unwarranted by the evidence." Miller v. Shenandoah Pulp Co., 38 W. Va. 558, 18 S. E. 740.

It is complained that the aforesaid measure of damage, by comparison of the rental value under the different conditions of the property, is based on mere opinions of the witnesses. But those witnesses were acquainted with the property and the business, and were competent to give opinions in that regard. Such evidence is proper in ascertaining damages. "It is the settled law of this state that the opinions of witnesses are admissible as to the amount of damages done in cases of this character, to enable the jury to arrive at a just verdict; and, while the jury are not bound by these opinions, they have the right to give them such weight as, taken together with other evidence, is justifiable." Miller v. Shenandoah Pulp Co., supra; Railroad Co. v. Forman, 24 W. Va. 662. That which was said by Judge Brannon in Pickens v. Boom & Timber Co., 58 W. Va. 11, 50 S. E. 872, is pertinent here: "Witnesses acquainted with the mill, practical millers, were permitted to give rental value and the earning capacity daily. Why do not these constitute a basis for estimation of damages, in connection with evidence of the number of days of stoppage, which was given for some months?" And this court has held: "In an action for damages for diverting water it is proper to ask a witness to state from facts within his knowledge what, in his opinion, was the amount of damages suffered by the plaintiff because of such diversion of the water; and, to authorize the giving of such opinion, it is not necessary that the party be an expert." Hargreaves v. Kimberly, 26 W. Va. 787, 53 Am. Rep. 121. In other words, laconic ones from the West, "It is not necessary to be an expert horse dealer to have some judgment as to the value of a horse." Johnson v. Railway Co., 7 Utah, 351, 26 Pac. 926.

In the evidence above recited, concerning the matter of rental value, there is more than the usual certainty of proof in like cases. In the ascertainment of damages absolute certainty is not required. The causes and probable amount of the loss may be shown with reasonable certainty. Substantial damages may be recovered though the plaintiff can state his loss only approximately. Hale on Damages, p. 70; Sedgwick on Damages, § 171; Joyce on Damages, § 75. And the language of a court of high standing is in point: "The law does not require impossibilities, and cannot therefore require a higher degree of certainty than the nature of the case admits. And we can see no good reason for requiring any higher degree of certainty in respect to the amount of damages than in respect to any other branch of the cause. Juries are allowed to act upon probable and inferential, as well as direct and positive, proof. And when, from the nature of the case, the amount of the damages cannot be estimated with certainty, or only a part of them can be so estimated, we can see no objection to placing before the jury all the facts and circumstances of the case having any tendency to show damages, or their probable amount, so as to enable them to make the most intelligible and probable estimate which the nature of the case will permit." Allison v. Chandler, 11 Mich. 542. Nor is the evidence on which the jury herein acted objectionable as a basis for finding the amount of a verdict because the witnesses aforesaid differed in their opinions as to the rental value, or that they stated that value approximately. In a case growing out of a cause of action not wholly dissimilar to this one, and very similar as to character and extent of evidence, it was said: "We think it unsafe, in a case like the present, to approve a ruling which rejects a claim to damage, otherwise lawful and unexceptionable, on the ground that the party could only state the amount of his injury approximately, and his witnesses differed in their judgment." Satchwell v. Williams, 40 Conn. 371. Recovery in this case is not based on guesswork or inference, but is supported by facts, circumstances, and data justifying the inference that the damages awarded are a just and reasonable compensation for the injuries suffered. 13 Cyc. 218.

Because plaintiff rented her mill at the figures set forth in said lease, defendant contends that the other figures given by the witnesses aforesaid are overthrown. But from the evidence and circumstances the jury were justified in believing that such contract of rental was made by her because of the bad condition of the water supply. The contract of rental does prove that the property had rental value but for the insufficiency of the supply of water. The lease was actually made and existed until the deficient supply caused its surrender. We cannot assume that it would have been surrendered for other reasons had this reason not arisen. Is not this renting at fixed figures, at the inception of plaintiff's ownership, before the breaches of defendant had become notorious to the lessees, substantial proof of what the property could be rented for under normal conditions? Let us take the figures of that lease as a basis. The jury may have done so. Those figures are the ones most favorable to the defendant. And yet the verdict found is within them. Under this contract of rental, as we have stated, plaintiff was to receive $1,000 for the first year, $1,200 for the second, and $1,400 for the third year. That rental lasted about 7½ months of the first year. This netted plaintiff $625, if the rent was paid. Because of the surrender, which the evidence says was occasioned by defendant's acts, plaintiff lost the residue of the rent for the first year, or $375. The next year she lost $1,200, and for the 9 months of the third year that she owned the property she lost three-fourths of $1,400, or $1,050. So the total of the loss because of the compelled surrender of the lease amounted to $2,625. Assuming that the jury believed, as the evidence warrants, that the defendant's acts caused the loss of this lease after it had existed for 7½ months, was it not a substantial and certain basis for computation of the damages, and is not the amount of $2,500 only a little under that actually proved? Certainly it cannot be said that such basis was uncertain; that said proof was deficient. Nor can it be said that the computation thereupon was erroneous or excessive.

There has been a fair trial of the case. The verdict is not manifestly wrong. The judgment is affirmed.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
March 23, 1909.)

1. ELECTRICITY (§§ 14, 18*)—CASE REQUIRED OF ELECTRIC COMPANIES—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

The rules and principles announced in Thomas v. Wheeling Electrical Co., 54 W. Va. 395, 46 S. E. 217, respecting the duties of electric companies, and the care required of them in keeping their dangerous wires perfectly insulated at places where people have the right to go for work, business, or for pleasure, and their liability for negligence therein, considered, approved, and applied.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Electricity, Cent. Dig. §§ 7, 10; Dec. Dig. §§ 14, 18.*]

2. ELECTRICITY (§ 19*)—ACTIONS—QUESTIONS FOR JURY—NEGLIGENCE.

Ordinarily the question whether that degree of care required in the construction, inspection, and repair of wires carrying highly dangerous currents of electricity has been observed in a given case is one for the jury.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error to Circuit Court, Ohio County.

Action by D. S. Thornburg, administrator of Ezra I. Blosser, deceased, against the City & Elm Grove Railroad Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Russell & Russell, for plaintiff in error.
Joseph Handlan, for defendant in error.

MILLER, P. This is an action by plaintiff, as administrator of Ezra I. Blosser, deceased, a boy of 14 years, against defendant, to recover damages for the death of deceased, the result of his coming in contact with a primary wire of defendant, heavily charged with electricity, suspended over Little Wheeling creek, in Ohio county, and along and near to the National Pike and the stone arched bridge over said creek and over which bridge, on the evening of January 7, 1907, the deceased with his mother, the janitress of a schoolhouse near by, and her two little girls, one nine and the other seven years of age, were passing on their way home from the schoolhouse. A side wall three feet high and two feet wide, with coping on the top, and beveled or tapering off at each side, but leaving a level surface about 14 inches wide, guarded each side of the bridge. The top of this coping was constantly used by school children and others as a walk in crossing the bridge, although there was a sidewalk 4 feet wide on the inside and along the wall built over the bridge. The top of the coping had been so used, and used so long in this way, as to have become much worn by the feet. On one side of the bridge at about the top of the arch, where deceased was killed, there was a lamp or gas post with a bearing on the arch outside of and fastened to the wall and coping, bearing a gas pipe bent over the walk, with a lamp attached, to give light on the bridge. Besides the wire with which deceased came in contact, there was a second primary wire charged with the same voltage, also a signal wire carrying a lighter current of electricity. The two primary wires were suspended from horizontal brackets on poles set at each end of the bridge and on the same side as the gas post, but the signal wire was fastened to small upright brackets attached to the poles some 12 to 13 inches below the horizontal brackets. These wires opposite the lamp-post hung so low and close to the bridge that a boy of the height of young Blosser, standing on the coping of the wall, could, as some witnesses say, reach out and touch the first primary wire and the signal wire; but, as others say, they could be reached only by putting one arm around the lamp-post and reaching out in the direction of the wires with the other. The mother says that at the time her son was killed the inside primary wire was sagging down a few inches below the signal wire, and could easily be reached by one standing on the coping at the lamp post, without any support from it; and in this she is supported to some extent by some of the other witnesses, who were at the place either a few minutes after Blosser was killed or early the next morning. U. M. Hervey, president of the school board, a witness for plaintiff, who was there the following morning, says, on cross-examination, that a person could stand on the coping and reach either of the wires. Counsel endeavored to have him say that these wires could be reached only by swinging out from the post, as already indicated, but the nearest he came to it was to say, with reference to the fatal primary wire, that it could easily be reached in that way, "and it might be reached with safety without that. I wouldn't want to say yes or no." Another witness, R. H. Walter, who saw the wire sagging, made some measurements with his ruler that evening. He could not say he measured accurately, for he was afraid to get too close to the wires; but, as near as he could tell, the wire was between 4 and 5 feet from the wall, measuring, as he said on cross-examination, diagonally across from the top of the wall to the wire. He did not measure horizontally out from the post to the wire. Witnesses for the defendant who testified that they made accurate measurements the following morning say that measuring vertically the inside primary wire hung 6 feet and 10 inches, and the signal wire 5 feet and 9 inches from the top of the coping; and that measured horizontally out the primary wire was 3 feet and 1¼ inches from the post. The fact is, however, that young Blosser, just before his death, was seen by his mother walking on the top of the coping and almost instantly afterwards, when she looked up, she found him standing upright on the top of the wall with the first three fingers of his right hand clutched under and around the inside primary wire, and, as she says, his head bent back, his knee slightly bent, and his hair standing out and waving as if the wind was blowing through it; and that when she caught hold of his coat and pulled him he fell over unconscious on the sidewalk, and was dead. She did not see him, and no one seems to have seen him at the moment when he caught hold of the wire. The mother, the only witness who testified as to the boy's height, says his height was five feet seven inches. All witnesses agree that the insulation of the wire, which did the deadly work, was worn off and hung down in shreds so as to furnish little, if any, protection to one coming in contact with it. The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, and the court below pronounced judgment thereon for $3,500, and defendant brings error.

Is the defendant liable? The defendant denies liability on two grounds: First, that the deadly wire was not in a place where it owed deceased any duty to keep it insulated and in good repair; and, second, because Blosser was guilty of contributory negligence in reaching out in the manner described and touching the wire. Appertaining to these questions the jury responded to three interrogatories, submitted by the defendant, as follows: "No. 1. Was the wire which caused the death of Ezra I. Blosser in such a position that children or other persons may reasonably have been expected to come in contact with it? Answer: Yes. No. 2. Was the manner in which Ezra I. Blosser acted in coming into contact with the wire negligent, taking into account his age and the circumstances surrounding him at that time? Answer: No. No. 3. Could Ezra I. Blosser while walking along the stone wall have unintentionally come in contact with the wire which caused his death? Answer: Yes." It is claimed: That the answer to the last interrogatory was not supported by any evidence; that the manner in which the deceased was shown to have had hold of the wire shows conclusively that he had not taken hold of it to save himself from a fall, because in falling he would naturally have taken an overhold, and not an underhold of the wire; and that inasmuch as he was found with his left arm around the post and the fingers of his right hand on the wire, and, thus supported by the post, he must necessarily have reached out and intentionally and negligently taken hold of the wire, and thereby by his negligence contributed to his death. But assuming the fact to be as claimed we do not think the answer of the jury to this interrogatory destructive of their general verdict.

On the first proposition this court in Thomas v. Wheeling Electrical Co., 54 W. Va. 395, 46 S. E. 217, in accordance with the decisions of many other states, has held it to be "the duty of electric companies to use very great care to keep the insulation of its dangerous wires perfect at places where people have the right to go for work, for business, or for pleasure," and that "when injury to a person comes from contact with a live electric wire from bad insulation at a place where there ought to be good, safe insulation for safety to persons, it is a case of negligence on the part of the electrical corporation rendering it prima facie liable." And on the second proposition the same case holds: "If one take hold of an electric wire at a place where it ought to be safely insulated for safety to persons, and is injured by reason of defective insulation, he not knowing its defect, he is not from so doing guilty of contributory negligence forbidding recovery of damages," and that, "in places where electric wires should be insulated for safety to the persons, one may assume that they are so insulated, if he know not to the contrary." In the Thomas Case these principles were applied in the case of a workman at work on a balcony of an opera house who came in contact with defendant's wires extending to a bracket on the wall of the opera house. In Virginia they were applied in the case of a boy 8 years old, who sitting upon a box along a street, and seeing, hanging through the limbs of a tree, in an adjacent yard, what he supposed to be a string, put his hand through and over the railing, grasped the wire, and was injured. Lynchburg Tel. Co. v. Booker, 103 Va. 594, 50 S. E. 148. In Connecticut, in the case of a boy 16 years of age who was killed by an electric shock from a wire strung along a highway bridge, and who at the time was on the truss of the bridge preparing to dive and caught the wire to prevent himself from falling. Boys had been in the habit of diving from and swimming around the bridge, a fact known to the selectman of the town and to defendant. Nelson v. Branford Lighting and Water Co., 75 Conn. 548, 54 Atl. 303. The facts in this case are quite similar to those in the case at bar. They were also applied in Mississippi, in the case of a boy

10 years of age who while climbing an oak tree sustained a shock by coming in contact with a wire which defendant had negligently permitted to become and remain uninsulated. Temple v. Electric Co., 89 Miss. 1, 42 South. 874, 11 L. R. A. (N. S.) 449, 119 Am. St. Rep. 698. It was held in this case that defendant was bound to take notice of the immemorial habit of small boys to climb such trees. They were also applied in Texas, in the case of a police officer who, in the discharge of his duty, went on the roof of a building in the nighttime for the purpose of discovering persons who were violating the law, and received injuries by coming in contact with an electric wire of the defendant, negligently left in a dangerous position on the roof and not properly insulated. City of Greenville v. Pitts (Tex. Civ. App.) 102 S. W. 451. So also in Missouri, in the case of a laborer engaged in hanging and taking down signs from buildings, a case similar to our case of Thomas v. Electrical Co. Gelsmann v. Missouri Edison Electric Co., 173 Mo. 654, 73 S. W. 654. And these are the principles which we think were rightly applied by the court below to the case at bar.

Whether that degree of care in the construction, inspection, and repair of the wires carrying highly dangerous currents of electricity imposed upon one employing them so as to keep them harmless at places where persons are liable to come in contact with them has been exercised in the given case is ordinarily for the jury. Thomas v. Electrical Co., supra (Syl., point 3); Perham v. Electric Co., 33 Or. 451, 53 Pac. 14, 24, 40 L. R. A. 799, 72 Am. St. Rep. 730; Birsch v. Citizens' Elect. Co., 36 Mont. 574, 93 Pac. 940. The question whether or not the person injured, under the circumstances like the case at bar, has been guilty of contributory negligence, is likewise a question for the jury. Geismann v. Elect. Co., supra; Thomas v. Elect. Co., supra.

In this case the record shows that judge and jury visited and viewed the place where young Blosser was killed. True the wires were not in exactly the same condition and situation as on the evening of the accident; but having seen and viewed the premises, and heard the testimony of the witnesses, they were better able to judge of the merits of the case than we can be from a mere consideration of the record of the trial and the arguments of counsel. The case seems to have been well and carefully tried, before a learned judge, assisted by able counsel on both sides, and we cannot say that any error has been committed.

There is nothing for us to do therefore but order an affirmance of the judgment.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
March 23, 1909.)1. FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES (§ 321*)—CREDITOR FIRST ATTACKING—PREFERENCES.

A general creditor who first attacks a fraudulent conveyance obtains a lien on the property by the institution of his suit; and preferences among all of such creditors are determined by the dates of the commencements of their suits, if separate suits are brought, or of the commencement of the suit and the filing of petitions, if all assert their rights in the same suit.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from Circuit Court, Tucker County. Bill by John J. Gilbert and others against Walter C. Peppers, James T. Darkey, and others. Decree for complainants, and James T. Darkey appeals. Reversed and remanded.

C. O. Strieby, for appellant. Geo. P. Shirley and Cunningham & Stallings, for appellees.

POFFENBARGER, J. James T. Darkey, engaged in the mercantile business in the town of Davis, Tucker county, and owner of a stock of goods and property used in connection therewith, sold the same to Walter C. Peppers, on the 2d day of May, 1904, for the sum of $2,000, of which sum $200 was paid in cash. For the balance Peppers executed his 36 promissory notes for the sum of $50 each, dated May 2, 1904, payable one each month thereafter, and a deed of trust to secure the payment thereof, by which he conveyed the property to C. O. Strieby for that purpose. Peppers took charge of the business, and carried it on for about a year, paying 9 of the notes, and incurring a good deal of other indebtedness, from $1,200 to $1,500. Though dated May 2, 1904, the deed of trust was not acknowledged until June 14, 1904. Darkey neglected to record it until the 21st day of February, 1905. About the 1st day of May, 1905, Strieby took possession of the property and closed the store. He advertised it for sale on the 15th day of May, 1905, and adjourned the sale until May 30th. An application for the appointment of a receiver was made by Gilbert Bros. & Co. on May 24th, and on the next day A. L. Helmick was appointed special receiver and took charge of the property. Under a subsequent order of the court he sold it, keeping the proceeds of the sale of the goods that were in the store at the time Peppers bought it separate from the proceeds of those subsequently bought, and put into it by him. The bill set up indebtedness due the plaintiffs, amounting to $201.59, consisting of a note executed by Peppers for the sum of $118.73 and an open account amounting to $82.86. It charged the existence of indebtedness to various other persons. The grounds of relief are (1) that the deed of trust is fraudulent on its face; (2) that it is fraudulent in fact; (3) that the sale to Peppers was fraudulent; (4) that the provision in the deed of trust, purporting to give a lien in favor of Darkey on after-acquired goods does not constitute a lien thereon; (5) that the trustee was about to mingle the new stock with the old and sell it all for the satisfaction of Darkey's claim, to the detriment and injury of other creditors; (6) that the deed of trust constitutes an unlawful preference in favor of Darkey; and (7) that Peppers had been permitted to retain all the accounts, claims, and demands due him, and was collecting the same. The cause was referred to a commissioner to ascertain and report the debts due from Peppers to the plaintiffs, and other creditors who had come into the suit by petition, and was submitted on his report, the pleadings and the depositions taken, and a decree pronounced holding the deed of trust fraudulent as to the creditors of Peppers, and ordering a pro rata distribution of the proceeds of the property among them, including Darkey. From this decree Darkey has appealed. The creditors are also dissatisfied, and have cross-assigned errors; their contention being that the other creditors should have been given preference over Darkey in the distribution. As the entire proceeds of the sale amounted to only $700.25, of which $230 arose from the sale of the after-acquired goods, the position taken by the general creditors would exclude Darkey entirely.

The right of the plaintiffs, Gilbert Bros., to maintain this suit at all is challenged on the ground that they were not in condition to proceed in the manner in which they did. The note was not then due, and the open account bore date on May 17th, the day before the institution of the suit. We held, in Frye v. Miley, 54 W. Va. 325, 46 S. E. 135, that an ordinary suit in equity to set aside a fraudulent conveyance cannot be maintained by a creditor whose debt is not due, and that such a creditor, in order to obtain relief, must invoke attachment. If the plaintiffs claimed no debt except the one evidenced by the note, the principle declared in Frye v. Miley might require a reversal of the decree and dismissal of the bill. Whether it would or not, in view of the intervention of other creditors, we need not decide, however, since the open account, bearing date one day before the institution of the suit, constitutes a debt for which it could be instituted, and, jurisdiction having been thus conferred, the court could make provision for debts not due and payable, as well as those that were. Although the decree says, by way of recital, the deed of trust is fraudulent because of failure to record it, the fund is disposed of as if it had been regarded as creating an unlawful preference. All the creditors are permitted to share therein ratably. This is not the rule of distribution or priority in cases in which deeds are set aside for fraud. The creditor who first attacks a fraudulent conveyance obtains a lien by the institution of his suit, and preferences among all of them are determined by the dates of the commencements of their suits, if separate suits are brought, or of the commencement of the suit and the filing of petitions, if all assert their rights in the same suit. Foley v. Ruley, 50 W. Va. 158, 40 S. E. 382, 55 L. R. A. 916; Clark v. Figgins, 31

W. Va. 156, 5 S. E. 643, 13 Am. St. Rep. 860.

The decree plainly applies the provisions of section 2, c. 74, of the Code of 1906, determining the basis and mode of relief in cases of transfers and charges made by insolvent debtors, attempting to prefer creditors, or to secure some of their creditors to the exclusion and prejudice of others. The provisions of said section, however, are clearly inapplicable, because the suit was not brought within the time prescribed therein. The deed of trust was made on the 2d day of May, 1904. Both grantor and grantee testify to this fact, and the deed of trust itself bears that date. Besides, the record shows the contract of sale of the store bearing the same date, and Peppers then took charge of the business. The failure to have it acknowledged on that day is accounted for in the testimony of Peppers, and nothing to the contrary is disclosed, except the date of the acknowledgment, June 14th. It could do no more than raise a presumption, and it seems not to have even that weight. As between the parties, the deed of trust would be valid without any acknowledgment. The acknowledgment is for the purpose of recordation, and the recordation subverted the purpose of constructive notice to creditors and subsequent purchasers. The presumptions arising from the date of acknowledgment, if any, are not conclusive as to the date of signing and delivery. This conclusion is fully sustained by the principles and reasoning in Colquhoun v. Atkinsons, 6 Munf. 550. Any relevant evidence is admissible to prove the real date of delivery of a deed. Duval v. Bibb, 4 Hen. & M. 113, 4 Am. Dec. 506. The deed of trust was made on the 2d day of May, 1904, and not admitted to record within eight months after the making thereof, nor was the suit brought within one year after it was made, and the statute provides that the suit must be brought within one year after the transfer or charge was made, or within four months after it was recorded, if recorded within eight months after it was made. Otherwise the transfer or charge is valid as to any preferences or priority thereby given. The general limitation imposed by this provision is one year from the date on which the transfer or charge was made. No suit can be brought after the expiration of such year, under any circumstances; but the limitation will be shortened, if the instrument creating the transfer or charge is recorded within eight months. When it has been so recorded, we must count from the date of recordation, and sue within four months thereafter.

There is no provision in the deed of trust requiring or authorizing the trustee to take possession of the stock of goods; and it clearly contemplates possession by the grantor until default in payment of some of the notes or the interest thereon. The following clause, under several decisions of this court, imports intention that the grantor shall retain possession: "The said notes are for the purchase money on the said stock of goods and fixtures. It is agreed and understood that the 'conveyance' of the said stock of goods shall go as to all future goods that may be placed in the said stock, and that the party of the first part agrees to keep the said stock up in good condition, and not be allowed to fall to a valuation of less than it is now." Clafin v. Foley, 22 W. Va. 434; Shattuck v. Knight, 25 W. Va. 590, 599.

Until a comparatively recent date this court held all deeds of trust on stocks of mercantile goods, allowing the debtor to remain in possession of the property and sell and dispose of the same, fraudulent and void per se. Shattuck v. Knight, 25 W. Va. 590; Klee v. Reitzenberger, 23 W. Va. 749; Livesay's Ex'r v. Beard, 22 W. Va. 585; Clafin v. Foley, 22 W. Va. 434; Gardner & Co. v. Bodwing's Adm'r, 9 W. Va. 121; Kuhn v. Mack, 4 W. Va. 186. In Shattuck v. Knight, Judge Green stated the doctrine as follows: "In a case where a stock of goods, wares, and merchandise is conveyed in a deed of trust to secure debts, the property not to be sold for a considerable time, if there be any provisions in the deed which clearly indicate that the grantor, when he made it, intended to remain in possession of the property until the day of sale, such deed will be regarded as per se fraudulent, precisely as it would be had there been in it an express provision that the grantor should remain in possession of the goods until the day of sale. If such intention appears on the face of the deed, whether it be express or implied, is entirely immaterial." The principle upon which the decisions above referred to stand has been elucidated in a number of them, and is well understood by members of the legal profession. Such a deed of trust, while professing to secure a debt, leaves the debtor in absolute control of the property, and free to sell it and appropriate to his own use the proceeds, and for that reason affords the creditor no security in point of fact, so long as the parties to the instrument see fit to let it operate according to the intent disclosed. As between them it would no doubt secure the debt after maturity, and be enforceable, but it discloses on its face a collusive agreement between debtor and creditor to the prejudice and injury of other creditors of the former. So long as they let it operate in accordance with the intention so disclosed, it does not secure the debt described in it, and yet, if valid, it would preclude any other creditor from resorting to the property for satisfaction of his debt.

In Clafin v. Foley, cited, Judge Snyder said: "Such a conveyance is certainly more a protection to the debtor than it is a security to the creditor, and is therefore condemned, as fraudulent and void as to the creditors of the grantor, by numerous decisions in Virginia and this state." In Lang v. Lee, 3 Rand. 410, Judge Carr said: "Is it not completely a felo de se? A security is taken on goods, and they are left in the possession of the debtor, * * * with a power to sell and dispose of them as he may think proper—no check whatever. Does not this resolve the whole matter into personal security?" In Sheppard v. Turpin, 3 Grat. 399, the court said: "Can such a contract between debtor and creditor, the avowed purposes of which rest for their execution upon the good faith of the former, unguarded even by a single covenant, and which may be entirely frustrated by his imprudence or misfortune in trade, be regarded in legal contemplation as constituting a valid security or specific lien on the property conveyed, as against any creditor postponed by it?" A fuller exposition of the principle will be found in Bump on Fraudulent Conveyances, § 116. In a note to that section the holdings of the various courts throughout the country are given, and it will appear, by reference thereto, that such deeds of trust and mortgages are held fraudulent and void per se in Alabama, Colorado, Connecticut, Delaware, District of Columbia, Florida, Idaho, Illinois, Kansas, Massachusetts, Minnesota, Mississippi, Missouri, Montana, Nebraska, Nevada, New Hampshire, Ohio, Oklahoma, South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas, Virginia, and Wisconsin. In the following states they are said to be presumptively, not conclusively, fraudulent: Arkansas, New Jersey, North Carolina, South Dakota, and Vermont. In some of the states (Kentucky, Maine, Michigan, North Dakota, and Rhode Island) there is no presumption either way. The question is submitted to the jury as one of fact. In California a stock of merchandise cannot be mortgaged at all, the statute prohibiting it. In Georgia such mortgages are legalized by statute; but, even there, retention of possession by the debtor is regarded as a circumstance, tending to show bad faith. The state of the law in Iowa is most peculiar and exceptional. Such mortgages are treated as transfers of title, and the registration statutes applied, but there fraudulent intent, a matter of fact, will invalidate it.

For a great many years, the doctrine of our cases cited has been adhered to by this court, but in Conaway v. Stealey, 44 W. Va. 163, 28 S. E. 793, the rule of the Iowa Supreme Court, as recognized in Etheridge v. Sperry, 139 U. S. 266, 11 Sup. Ct. 563, 35 L. Ed. 171, was adopted, and a departure so made. The only other case cited in the opinion in Conaway v. Stealey as supporting the views therein expressed is Kreth v. Rogers, 101 N. C. 263, 7 S. E. 682; and, as has been noted, that decision was pronounced by a court which observes an entirely different principle from that adopted by ours in the earlier cases. In North Carolina such deeds are never held to be conclusively fraudulent. They are only presumptively fraudulent, and the presumption is rebuttable. Conaway v. Stealey was followed in two later cases, Horner-Gaylord Co. v. Fawcett, 50 W. Va. 487, 40 S. E. 564, 57 L. R. A. 869, and Bartles & Dillon v. Dodd, 56 W. Va. 383, 49 S. E. 414. These decisions do not wholly repudiate the doctrine of the earlier cases. On the contrary, they admit it as the general rule, but establish an exception thereto. The grounds of this exception, as stated, are (1) that the debt secured represents purchase money of the property; (2) that there are no prior or existing creditors who could be prejudiced, or against whom any fraud in the transaction could have been directed; and (3) that the recordation of the deed of trust constitutes notice of the incumbrance to all subsequent creditors, the only class of creditors who could be injured. Upon mature consideration we have concluded that these circumstances do not constitute any exception, and that the reasoning by which they were made to do so, in the three cases just mentioned, is fallacious and unsound. That the debt is for purchase money of the mortgaged property does not change its character as a debt. A debt so created may be made and used as an instrument for the perpetration of a fraud, or a cloak for fraudulent conduct, just as effectively as a debt originating in any other manner. That it is an honest and bona fide debt is a mere circumstance bearing on the question of good faith, when the inquiry is whether there was fraud in fact. It is perfectly apparent that an honest debt may be so used as to hinder and delay creditors and defraud them of their rights, just as the payment of a valuable consideration, even the full value of the property in cash, does not avail to protect a purchase in fraud of creditors, when the intention, on the part of both purchaser and seller, to perpetrate such a fraud has been established. This proposition is elementary in the law of fraudulent conveyances. If, in the case of a bona fide indebtedness, honest and meritorious in all respects, the debtor and creditor agree to use that debt so as to conceal and cover up property of the debtor, so as to shield it from other creditors, and thus establish a secret trust in favor of the debtor, so that the transaction operates, not to secure the creditor, but only to shield the property of the debtor and withhold it from other creditors, this honest debt will become the means of hindering and delaying such other creditors, and depriving them of the means of satisfying their debts. Hence it is perfectly clear that the honesty or verity of the debt mentioned in such a deed of trust is nothing more than a circumstance bearing on the good faith of the transaction. Nor can the fact that the creditors are subsequent and not pre-existing make any difference. That subsequent creditors may set aside a deed for fraud directed against them has been decided by this and many other courts. Silverman v. Greaser, 27 W. Va. 550. "But if it be shown that there was mala fides or fraud in fact, in the transaction, whether the actual fraudulent intent relates to existing creditors, or is directed exclusively against subsequent creditors, the effect is precisely the same, and subsequent creditors may, upon the strength of such fraud, successfully impeach the conveyance." Lockhard v. Beckley, 10 W. Va. 87; Miller v. Gillispie, 54 W. Va. 450, 46 S. E. 451; Moore on Fraud, Convey. pp. 180-189.

The three decisions of this court just mentioned involved questions of fraud in fact, and not fraud in law, it is true, but no reason is perceived why there should be a difference between fraud in fact and fraud in law, as regards the rights of creditors. If fraud in fact, directed against subsequent creditors, will vitiate a deed or other instrument of conveyance, why should not the same thing, written at large on the face of the instrument, have the same effect? Let it be supposed that the owner of a stock of goods, owing nothing, incur a debt and secure it on the merchandise by such a deed of trust as we have here, then on the next day incur further indebtedness. Is not that deed as much an obstruction of the subsequent creditor's right to resort to the property as it would be if his debt had been previously contracted? As to both classes of creditors, such a deed affords protection to the debtor, and no security to the creditor, if it is to operate according to the intent disclosed on its face. That the attacking creditors, in all the cases decided by this court, in which deeds of trust were held fraudulent per se, prior to the decision in 44 W. Va., and 28 S. E., happened to be existing creditors is a mere circumstance which does not affect the principle, and affords no reason for saying it is not applicable in the case of subsequent creditors. The language of the old decisions is that such a deed of trust is fraudulent and void as to creditors. The terms in which the rule has been expressed do not limit it to existing creditors, and all the reasons for holding it void as to existing creditors are applicable to the case of a subsequent creditor. He has just the same right at law and in equity to resort to the property of his debtor for satisfaction of his debt as a prior creditor, and the deed, if permitted to stand, would bar him just as effectually. How, then, can it be said that it does not hinder, delay, and defraud him within the meaning of the statute against fraudulent conveyances? The exception made in section 2, c. 74, of the Code of 1906, protecting securities given for purchase money, does not apply to this question. That section relates to preferences, not fraud, and we need hardly remark that the distinction between fraud and preference of a creditor is well known and universally recognized. It only provides that a security given for purchase money of property by an insolvent debtor shall be valid, although it creates a preference in favor of the creditor. This it says by way of exception to the general declaration of legislative will that all securities given by such a debtor for the purpose of preferring any creditor, shall be taken for the benefit of all his creditors who shall claim the benefit thereof, not that it shall be deemed fraudulent as to anybody. The argument founded upon the recordation of the deed of trust is equally fallacious. Section 5, c. 74, of the Code of 1906, declaring contracts and deeds void as to creditors and subsequent purchasers for valuable consideration, without notice until and except from the time that it is duly admitted to record in the county where the property embraced in such contract or deed may be, does not contemplate general creditors. As to them it is valid, whether recorded or not. A mere personal debt bears no relation to the property of the debtor, since it does not constitute a lien thereon. Before a creditor can claim any legal right in respect to the property of his debtor, or any interest therein, in law or equity, he must by some means acquire a lien thereon, as by an attachment or reduction of his debt to judgment. Moore v. Tearney, 62 W. Va. 72, 57 S. E. 263; McCandlish v. Keen, 13 Grat. 615; Dulaney v. Willis, 95 Va. 608, 29 S. E. 324, 64 Am. St. Rep. 815.

In McCandlish v. Keen, Judge Lee, speaking of this statute, said: "It was not designed to make any change in the kind or character of the debts which would entitle creditors to assail an unrecorded deed, but to define the class of creditors as to whom, if their debts were of the kind and character authorizing them to call it in question, an unrecorded deed would be void. This is apparent from the context, for the section declares that the words 'creditors' and 'purchasers,' where they occur, are not to be restricted to the protection of creditors of and purchasers 'from the grantor,' but are to embrace all who but for the deed would have had title to the subject, or a right to subject it to their debts. It was intended to settle by statutory provision the question so much controverted in the cases of Pierce v. Turner, 5 Cranch, 154, 3 L. Ed. 64, Land v. Jeffries, 5 Rand. 211, and Thomas v. Gaines, 1 Grat. 347, and which was decided in the last-named case in conformity to the decision in Anderson v. Anderson, 2 Call, 198, and overruling Pierce v. Turner and the opinions of Judges Carr, Coalter, and Brooke in Land v. Jeffries; but it made no change in the well-settled rule which required a creditor who would assail an unrecorded deed to show that he had some lien, by judgment or otherwise, entitling him to charge the subject conveyed, specifically." It is to be observed here again that recordation, required by this statute, has no relation to the subject of actual or legal fraud. It relates to title and rights respecting property, in cases in which the parties are free from fraudulent intent. Its object is in conformity with the purpose of the whole scheme of registration of title papers. Its mandate is that the claimant of title to property, or a lien upon property, shall make the evidence thereof public, so that others, dealing with the property, not merely with the owner of it, may know what its status is, who owns it, and what incumbrances are upon it. It declares the deed void as to lien creditors and subsequent purchasers for failure to record it, not fraudulent as to anybody or for any cause.

Much as we regret to disapprove and overrule decisions of this court, we are constrained, by the weighty reasons of public policy which, centuries ago, impelled the passage of the statutes against fraudulent conveyances, to overrule Conaway v. Stealey and Horne-Gaylord Co. v. Fawcett. In our judgment they open the door to the perpetration, with impunity, of fraudulent practices, by means of such sales and deeds of trust as are disclosed by this record. There may be, and no doubt are, instances in which the intention of the parties is free from fraud, but this form of security, if upheld, will afford the means of robbing subsequent creditors without fear of detection, and with the assurance that the courts are powerless to prevent it. A failing merchant, or a solvent one having a store in a bad place, would be required to do no more, in order to profit at the expense of wholesale dealers, than make a pretended sale to an irresponsible party on credit, at any price they may see fit to adopt, and take such a deed of trust on the stock as we now have under consideration, and let the store continue to operate under it as long as the pretended purchaser can obtain credit. Bartles & Dillon v. Dodd may possibly be sustainable on principle, as the property, except a small portion thereof, was not consumable in its use, nor perishable, nor intended to be sold.

For the reasons given, we reverse the decree and remand the cause, for distribution of the fund in accordance with the principles herein stated.

BRANNON, J. I dislike to overrule cases. I did not really agree to the decision in Horne-Gaylord v. Fawcett, 50 W. Va. 487, 40 S. E. 564, 57 L. R. A. 869. I urged that it was not clear law. My real opinion appears in a note I filed at the time, which, by omission of the reporter or clerk, was not published in 50 W. Va., but will be found in 57 L. R. A. 809; and 40 S. E. 564. It was also published out of place in a later volume of state reports. So I have not changed my opinion upon the subject, as said note will show.

Appeal from Superior Court, Forsyth County; Council, Judge.

The Marler-Dalton-Gilmer Company recovered a judgment against the Wadesboro Clothing & Shoe Company in a justice's court, and thereafter defendant applied to the superior court for a writ of recordari and a supersedeas. Judgment for plaintiff denying the application, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

B. S. Womble and McLendon & Thomas, for appellant. L. M. Swink, for appellee.

WALKER, J. The plaintiff sold a case of merchandise to the defendant for $118.18, and shipped the same to the defendant at Wadesboro, N. C., by the Southern Railway Co. and the Seaboard Air Line Railway Co., taking a bill of lading therefor. The defendant represented to the plaintiff that it had not received the goods, and refused to pay the debt, whereupon the plaintiff sued the two railway companies and the defendant before a magistrate in Forsyth county, and caused a summons to be issued for the defendant, in the manner prescribed by the statute, to Anson county. This summons was returned by the sheriff of the latter county with an entry of service indorsed on the summons. At the trial before the justice the defendant did not appear. Upon the evidence introduced judgment was rendered against the defendant for the amount of the debt, with interest and costs, and in favor of the railway companies. The defendant received notice of the judgment on July 9, 1908. The next regular term of the superior court of Forsyth county commenced on July 27, 1908. At the next, or September, term, in the year 1908, the defendant applied to the superior court for a writ of recordari and a supersedeas, upon the general ground that the Southern Railway Company had been improperly joined as a party defendant in the suit before the justice, for the purpose of conferring jurisdiction upon him. The judge, at the request of the defendant, found and stated the facts, and, among other findings, are these: That the defendant admitted the debt, and that the plaintiffs acted in good faith in joining the railway companies as defendants, and that the joinder was not made for the purpose of conferring jurisdiction. He further found that the defendant's prayer for relief before him was that it be allowed to plead to the original action. In the petition for the recordari, the plaintiff prayed that the papers in the cause be transmitted to the superior court by the justice.

The writ of recordari may be used, under the statute (Revisal 1905, § 584), either as a substitute for an appeal, or as a writ of false judgment. In Weaver v. Mining Co., 89 N. C. 198, it was said by the court that "the writ of recordari under the former practice, and retained in the new, as has been often declared, is used for two purposes; the one, in order to have a new trial of the case upon its merits—and this is a substitute for an appeal from a judgment rendered before a justice—the other, for a reversal of an erroneous judgment, performing in this respect the office of a writ of false judgment." See, also, Caldwell v. Beatty, 69 N. C. 399; Morton v. Rippy, 84 N. C. 611. In the two cases last cited it is held that the writ may be resorted to in the first instance, and without moving before the justice to set aside the judgment, where it is alleged that the latter had no jurisdiction of the defendant, no process having been served upon him, and that the judgment is therefore void. But the facts of this case, as found by the judge at the request of the defendant, do not bring it within the principle announced in either of those cases, for here the judge has found all the essential facts in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendant. He has found specifically that the railway companies were joined in good faith, and not for the purpose, alleged by the petitioner, of conferring jurisdiction upon the magistrate who issued the process and tried the case. The defendant does not contend that the summons was not actually served upon it, but attacks the sheriff's return as insufficient to show a proper service. That officer returns that he did serve the summons upon the defendant, and we have decided that, when such a return is made, it carries with it, ex vi termini, the idea of a full performance of all that the law requires, or, in other words, that the process has been served as the statute directs. It is prima facie sufficient until it is made to appear, in some proper way, that in fact there was no service. There is no such evidence or finding in this case. Indeed the defendants are silent as to the fact of actual service in their affidavits, and the judge states in his findings of fact that the only position taken before him by the defendant was that the suit had been improperly brought before the justice in Forsyth county. As to this matter the findings of fact, as we have said, are all against the defendant. Whether there was a misjoinder of defendants is a question which is not now before us, as upon demurrer or answer. There seems to have been a fair contention, raising a serious doubt, as to whether the defendants were liable to the plaintiff. At least this is a reasonable deduction from the findings of the court.

The statute (Revisal 1905, § 1447) is as follows: "No process shall be issued by any justice of the peace to any county other than his own, unless one or more bona fide defendants shall reside in, and also one or more bona fide defendants shall reside outside of, his county; in which case, only, he may issue process to any county in which any such nonresident defendant resides." The language of the statute would seem to make the question of jurisdiction, or the right to serve process on a defendant outside the county of the justice, to depend somewhat upon the good faith of the plaintiff in joining the defendants as parties. In certain cases, perhaps, it may be so plain that the plaintiff has no real or bona fide claim against the defendant, who is a resident of the county in which the suit is pending, that the question of misjoinder may be presented as one of law. However this may be, it is found in this case that the railway companies and the defendant were joined as defendants bona fide, and not for the fraudulent purpose alleged by the defendant.

It is generally held that the applicant for the writ of recordari must show merit in his case, and also that he has not been guilty of laches. Pritchard v. Sanderson, 92 N. C. 41; March v. Thomas, 63 N. C. 249; In re Brittain, 93 N. C. 587. Whether this rule applies where the sole question is one of jurisdiction, we need not decide.

This case was ably presented for the defendant by counsel; but, the facts having been found against the defendant by the court, we are concluded by them, and it follows that there was no error in the order dismissing the petition.

Affirmed.

SUTPHIN et al. v. SPARGER et al.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. April 21, 1906.)

1. HIGHWAYS (§ 72*)—ALTERATION—APPEAL—TIME FOR TAKING.

An appeal from the county commissioners in proceedings to change the location of a road must be taken at the term at which the report of the road commissioners is confirmed.

2. HIGHWAYS (§ 58*)—ALTERATION—APPEAL—DOCKETING OF APPEAL.

Appeals from the county commissioners in highway cases are governed by the rules applying to appeals from justices of the peace, and must be docketed at the first ensuing term of the superior court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Highways, Cent. Dig. § 190; Dec. Dig. § 58.*]

3. HIGHWAYS (§ 72*)—ALTERATION—APPEAL—BOND ON APPEAL.

On appeal from county commissioners in proceedings for the alteration of a road, a bond must be given, as required by Revisal 1905, § 2690.

Appeal from Superior Court, Surry County; Webb, Judge.

Action by Walter A. Sutphin and others against James A. Sparger and others. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendants appeal. Reversed.

Under authority conferred by chapter 409, p. 590, Laws 1897, the county commissioners of Surry on the first Monday in March, 1903, appointed three road commissioners for said county. By section 1 of said act the road commissioners of said county were authorized, upon petition of a prescribed number of citizens and landowners, to lay out or change any public road of said county. Soon after their appointment, the road commissioners, acting upon a petition presented to them to change the grade and straighten the road in question at certain points, after viewing the same and upon notice of the hearing, laid off and staked out the changes. Some of the parties made no charge for damages, and the total amount assessed for those who claimed damages was $40. The road commissioners made their report to the county commissioners at their regular session on the first Monday in April, 1908, who confirmed the same. No exception was filed and no appeal was taken. An overseer was appointed who worked out the road, as laid off, and made his report to the county commissioners at an adjourned meeting September 21, 1908, when the report of the overseer was confirmed, and the road turned over to the supervisors of that township. On September 26th a notice of appeal by plaintiff was served. The next term of the superior court for Surry was held in November, but the appeal was not docketed at that term nor till February term, 1909. The plaintiff obtained in February, 1909, a restraining order against the defendant Sparger, the road overseer, to prevent his working the road. The defendants moved to dissolve the restraining order. The court refused the motion, and continued the restraining order to the hearing. The defendants appealed.

W. F. Carter, for appellants. V. E. Holcomb, for appellees.

CLARK, C. J. The plaintiff's appeal did not put the case in the superior court.

1. The appeal should have been taken at the April term of the county commissioners when they confirmed the report of the road commissioners and ordered the changes in the road to be laid out and worked. McDowell v. Insane Asylum, 101 N. C. 656, 8 S. E. 118. The plaintiff should not have waited till after the work was done and the expense incurred by the public.

2. The plaintiff has further slept on his rights, in that, when he did appeal, he did not docket his appeal at the first term of the superior court thereafter, in November, 1908. Appeals from county commissioners are governed by the rules applying to appeals from justices of the peace (Blair v. Coakley, 136 N. C. 405, 48 S. E. 804), and must be docketed at the first ensuing term of the superior court. The docketing at February term was a nullity. Davenport v. Grissom, 113 N. C. 38, 18 S. E. 78.

3. Besides, it seems that the plaintiff did not give the appeal bond required by Revisal 1905, § 2690. The new road having been laid off and worked, and the old road abandoned, it is a serious inconvenience to the public to enjoin the working of the new road, which alone can be used, for the old road has been discontinued, and there is no authority to use it.

The restraining order was improvidently granted, and the motion to dissolve it should have been allowed. An order to that effect will be entered here. Griffin v. Railway (at this term) 64 S. E. 16.

UMSTEAD et al. v. BOWLING et al.

1. WITNESSES (§ 159*)—COMPETENCY—TRANSACTIONS WITH DECEDENT.

Testimony that testator rode with witness to a certain place and left him in front of a store, and as to the relative positions of testator and others when they witnessed his will, is not as to personal transactions or communications between witness and testator within the prohibition of Revisal 1905, § 1631.

Appeal from Superior Court, Durham County; Long, Judge.

Proceeding between Nannie L. Umstead and others, caveators, and E. H. Bowling and others, propounders. From the judgment, caveators appeal. Affirmed.

The propounders offered a paper writing purporting to be the last will and testament* of William Bowling, deceased, for probate before the clerk of the superior court of Durham county. The caveators filed a caveat in due form, and filed the bond as prescribed by the statute, whereupon an issue was prepared and transferred to the superior court for trial. The jury answered the issue in the affirmative, and judgment was rendered in accordance therewith. The caveators noted exceptions to his honor's rulings upon the admission of testimony and instructions to the jury, and appealed. The exceptions are set forth in the opinion.

Manning & Foushee, J. F. Cothran, and D. W. Sorrell, for appellants. Aycock & Winston and Bryant & Brogden, for appellees.

CONNOR, J. The caveators lodged a large number of exceptions, but in their brief discuss only those which go to the merits of the controversy. The evidence tended to show that the testator signed the paper writing at his home and took it with him to Rougemont, a village nearby, where he requested Mr. Flintom and Mr. Lawson to witness it. B. P. Bowling, son of the testator, one of the executors and devisees, testified: "I saw the paper writing now shown me purporting to be the will of Capt. Bowling. My father signed it before he carried it down to the store that morning. He signed it that day before he left home. It was in the evening, right after dinner. I went with my father to Rougemont. We traveled in a buggy." Counsel proposed to ask the witness: "State what your father said and did when he reached Rougemont when he saw Squire Flintom and Mr. Lawson. (Caveators objected; overruled; exception.) Where was this paper now shown you, purporting to be his will, at that time, if you know? (Objection.) The court allowed witness to state, if he knew, the locality of the paper, where he saw it, but does not allow him to make any statement as to any transaction or communication between himself and his father. (Exception.)" The witness proceeded to say that he carried his father in his buggy to Rougemont; that his father got out of buggy in front of store of Carver & Lawson; that witness drove down the road, tied his horse, and went back to store; that his father, Flintom, and Lawson had gone into the store. He described the position of his father and the other persons in the store, saying that from where his father was standing at the time Lawson and Flintom were at the desk, his father could see them and the top of the desk—a paper on the desk. Caveators excepted. The first five exceptions are directed to the admission of this testimony, and are based upon the alleged incompetency of the witness to testify to any transaction or communication with his father. The record shows that his honor carefully confined the testimony to what he saw his father do, and excluded any evidence of declarations or conversations. It will be noted that no objection was made to the testimony of the witness that his father signed the will before going to Rougemont.

It is decided in Pepper v. Broughton, 80 N. C. 251, that the inhibition of section 1631 of the Revisal of 1905 applies to the trial of an issue of devisavit vel non, that persons excluded on account of interest to testify in regard to transactions or communications with the deceased, the validity of whose alleged will is involved, are within the statute. The correctness of his honor's ruling depends upon whether the witness was permitted to testify to a communication or transaction with the deceased. It has been found impracticable to give a satisfactory definition to the words used in the statute for the purpose of establishing a precedent for cases as they arise. Many of the cases found in the reports are very near to the line which separates those which come within the language and mischief intended to be avoided. The interpretation of the words "transaction or communication" as they are used in the statute, which was introduced into our law by Code Civ. Proc. 1868, was first considered in Whitesides v. Green, 64 N. C. 307, in which Rodman, J., said: "No interested party shall swear to a transaction with the deceased to charge his estate because the deceased cannot swear in reply. * * * But there is no prohibition against the witness testifying as to any matter other than a transaction or communication with the deceased." In Gray v. Cooper, 65 N. C. 183, it was held that the plaintiff was competent to prove that the defendant's intestate "had and enjoyed the services of slaves," for whose kin the suit was brought because it was "a fact which the plaintiff might know and which he says he did know otherwise than from a transaction or communication with the intestate." In March v. Verble, 79 N. C. 19, plaintiff was permitted to testify that he had but one animal, for the price of which the action was being tried. Smith, C. J., said: "The plaintiff did not testify to any conversation or transaction with the intestate within the meaning of the statute, but to a substantive and independent fact." In McCall v. Wilson, 101 N. C. 598, 8 S. E. 225, it is said that an interested witness may testify what he saw the deceased do—as that he saw the deceased stand off with the money and bring back the deed. Lane v. Rogers, 113 N. C. 171, 18 S. E. 117. In Davidson v. Bardin, 139 N. C. 1, 51 S. E. 779, Clark, C. J., said: "The plaintiff was competent to testify that he went to the house of the defendant's intestate, and his condition, and what he saw or heard, so long as these were independent facts, and did not tend to show a communication or personal transaction." Johnson v. Rich, 118 N. C. 268, 23 S. E. 1007. With the light thrown upon the subject by these decisions and "upon the reason of the thing," we conclude that the witness B. P. Bowling was competent to testify within the limitations prescribed by his honor. The fact that the testator rode to Rougemont with the witness, and that he left him in front of the store, cannot reasonably be said to be personal transactions or communications. The testimony in regard to the position of the attesting witnesses and the desk and counter in the store are manifestly independent facts. We do not express any opinion upon the competency of witness to say that his father signed the will before he left home, because there is no objection to the admission.

Caveators insist that the testimony does not show that the attesting witnesses signed their names in the presence of the testator. The testimony upon this point tended to show that Capt. Bowling, the testator, went to the home of Mr. Flintom, and said to him that he wanted him to witness his will; wanted to know where Mr. Lawson was; wanted them to witness his will. They met Mr. Lawson at the store. He says: "Immediately after Capt. Bowling pulled out his paper and gave it to me and Mr. Lawson, and we went in the store in a little room where Mr. Carver did his writing, and I signed the paper. Captain was 20 or 25 feet from the front door of the store when he handed me the paper. * * * The desk was opposite the door. The gap was two feet from the desk. There was a little screen about 2½ feet square placed on the desk. This cut the view from the desk if you stand on the floor opposite the desk. The screen don't cut off the view of a person who was in the gap between the counter. When I signed my name, I was in that place. The paper was on a little writing desk or table, which desk had the screen to it. * * * Mr. Lawson signed it at the same time. We were both together in each other's presence. * * * I think a person standing where Capt. Bowling was when he handed me the will could have seen the desk through the window that I speak of. * * * The bench on which Capt. Bowling was sitting was 10 or 12 feet from the window opposite the desk."

Mr. Lawson testified substantially as the other attesting witness in regard to the place at which they signed and the position of testator. He also testified that Capt. Bowling said to him that he had a paper which he wanted Mr. Flintom and himself to sign for him—that it was his will—that he took it from his pocket and handed it to Mr. Flintom. It was folded.

William Mangum, who was present at the time, and described the location of the parties, said: "It seems to me that Capt. Bowling was in plain view of that desk from where I last saw him. Could not have been more than three feet."

E. W. Thacker said: "I happened to be at Rougemont when Capt. Bowling, Lawson, and Flintom came in and went behind the counter. I was standing back of the store, and Capt. Bowling said something to me; said he came to have his will signed. I said: 'You did?' He said 'Yes,' and some one passed along and said, 'What did he say?' and I said: 'He came to have his will signed.' I was standing 12 or 15 feet from the desk. Capt. Bowling was standing at the gap. The gap is only two feet from the desk. He was standing at the gap, and could see both the desk and the paper."

H. L. Carver said: "A man standing in the gap could easily see the desk."

The testator was 84 years of age when he signed the will. The caveators introduced no evidence. They submitted a large number of prayers involving different phases of the testimony in regard to the position of the testator at the time the witnesses attached their names to the will, and his ability to see them do so. Several were given as asked, and to the refusal to give other and the giving of general instructions they assigned error. It is neither necessary nor practicable to set out all of the prayers or discuss all of the assignments of error. We have carefully examined them, and think that they are embraced in the instructions given in so far as they were correct propositions of law. While the subscribing witnesses do not testify directly that the testator was in a position from which he could see them at the time they signed the will, and it may be conceded that their testimony leaves the question in doubt, the other witnesses who were present and in a position to observe the transaction testified very clearly as to this point. The other witnesses do not contradict the testimony of the attesting witnesses, but make the matter very much clearer.

His honor instructed the jury that it was not essential to the valid execution of the will that the testator signed in the presence of the witnesses. This is sustained by authority. It is sufficient if he acknowledge his signature and declare the paper to be his will, and that they sign as attesting witnesses at his request and in his presence. Whether this requirement is met is usually for the jury under the direction of the court. We think that there was evidence proper for the consideration of the jury. The only question presented upon the exception is whether his honor correctly instructed them upon the law. He instructed the jury: "If you find from the evidence and by the weight of the evidence that P. A. Flintom and J. J. Lawson signed their names as witnesses to the paper offered in evidence at the time they say they signed or subscribed their names as witnesses to the paper writing, that William Bowling was in a position where he did or could have seen them sign or subscribe their names, this would be a signing in the presence of William Bowling in compliance with the law, if you find the facts to be as herein cited. In order to make a valid will, it was not necessary that Mr. Bowling sign in the presence of the subscribing witnesses at the time they subscribed their names to it, provided he had signed the same when he handed it to them to witness the paper. If you find that the two witnesses signed their names to the script that has been offered in evidence, and that the same was already signed by William Bowling before these parties signed their names to the paper, and if you find from the evidence that at the time the two witnesses signed the paper that William Bowling was standing between the gap in the counter and within three or four feet of the desk upon which the witnesses were signing the paper, and if you find from the evidence, further, that Mr. Bowling had his face in the direction of where the witnesses were signing the paper and actually saw them, and also the paper writing that they were signing, and if you find that he was standing close enough to them to see them and the paper writing, if he desired to do so, and there was nothing obstructing the view between him and the witnesses as they were signing the paper and the paper they were signing, and if you find that they at the time when they were thus in a position to see them and see the paper writing he was in a position to see the paper writing and see them, and see what it was they were subscribing their names to, and you find that they, under these circumstances, did sign their names to the paper—this would be a signing of the paper agreeable to the requirements of the statute, and, nothing else appearing, you would answer this issue in favor of the propounders—that is to say, you would answer it 'Yes.' If at the time they signed this paper, if you find they did sign it, if you find that he was in a position where he could not see them nor see the paper nor see them sign the paper, and you find that under these circumstances they did sign this script—that is to say, at a time when he was not in a position where he could see them nor the paper writing nor see them sign it—this would not be a signing of the paper in his presence as required by the statute, and you would answer it 'No.' If you find from an examination of the evidence that Mr. Bowling was standing on the porch not far away from where the witnesses Flintom and Lawson were, and that he was in a position that he could see the witnesses and the paper writing in controversy, and could see them sign their names to the paper writing, and if you further find that he was only a few feet away at the time, and you further find that he had himself prior to that time signed the paper writing, these facts, if you find them to be so, would be a compliance with the statute, and nothing else appearing, you would answer the issue 'Yes.' But if you find that he had signed the paper and the witnesses themselves had subscribed their names to it, but at the time that they did so that he was on the porch and at a place where he could not see them nor the paper they were signing, this wouldn't be a compliance with the statute, and, if you find the facts so to be, your answer to it would be 'No.' If you find from the evidence that William Bowling was in the store at the time the paper writing was witnessed by Mr. Flintom and Lawson, and that he was in such a position that he could see the instrument as it was placed upon the desk and at the time they subscribed it as witnesses, and if you find that they did so, and further find he was in such a position at the time that he might see them sign their names to the instrument, and see the instrument and see them sign it, and you further find he had previously signed the instrument himself, these facts, if you find them so to be, nothing else appearing, would be a compliance with the statute, and you would answer the issue 'Yes.' You may consider also whether this was openly done, whether the room where the alleged signature was made was light at the time, and whether the said witness returned the said paper to Mr. Bowling. The jury will also consider the evidence that relates to the size of the room, of the distance of Mr. Bowling from the subscribing witnesses, the position of the window and that of the counter, and especially of the desk, the localities of the parties, both the witnesses and Mr. Bowling, and all of the other facts and circumstances that have been given in evidence by the defendant's witnesses. If, after reviewing all the evidence, your minds reach the conclusion from the evidence, and by the greater weight of it, that the paper writing was executed by the said William Bowling, witnessed by Flintom and Lawson in his presence, you would answer the issue 'Yes.' That the deceased, William Bowling, must actually have seen, or been in a position to see not only the witnesses, but the paper writing itself at the time the witnesses signed the same, and that if the jury shall believe from the evidence that he did not see the paper writing and the witnesses at the time that the witnesses signed it, they should answer the issue 'No.'"

We think these instructions are fully sustained by the authorities. In Bynum v. Bynum, 33 N. C. 632, Ruffin, C. J., said: "Actual view is never necessary, but it is sufficient if the party might see the witnesses at test though in a different as well as in the same room; for, if actual sight were requisite, if a man did but turn his back or look off, though literally present by being at the spot when the thing was done, the attestation would be invalid." In Cornellius v. Cornellius, 52 N. C. 593, Judge Manly said: "The strictest interpretation of the law has gone no further than to require the testator should be in a position and have power, without a removal of his person, to see what was done. It is not necessary for him, in fact, to see." Burney v. Allen, 125 N. C. 314, 34 S. E. 500, 74 Am. St. Rep. 637. The examination of the testimony in these cases will show that they are direct authorities to sustain his honor's instructions. "If the testator is able to see the attestation by the witnesses, it is not material to prove that, in fact, he did not see it. But he must be able to see the witnesses subscribe the will, or, to define the rule more clearly, their relative position to him at the time they are subscribing their names as witnesses, whether they are in the same room with him or not, must be such that he may see them if he thinks proper to do so; * * * for the purpose of the law is not so much to secure a signing of the names of the witnesses in the actual view of the testator as to afford him an opportunity to detect and to prevent the substitution of another will in the place of that which he has signed." 1 Underhill, Wills, § 196. The instructions are very full and present every phase of the testimony. His honor instructed the jury that there was no evidence of fraud or undue influence. The testimony showed that the testator had been married twice, and had living children by both wives; that two days before making his will he executed deeds for several tracts of land, aggregating 2,400 acres, to his children by his second marriage. It will be observed that in the fourth item of the will he says: "To the children of my first marriage I have heretofore given as much property as I intended for them, and therefore I make no further provision for them." He directs payment of a bond of $849, which he had given to the clerk, to his children by his first marriage. He had given them some lands of small value. He was 84 years of age when the will was executed in 1903, and died in 1907. There is no suggestion of any other circumstances relied upon to show undue influence. We concur with his honor that there was no evidence fit for the consideration of the jury tending to sustain the allegation.

We have examined the entire record and the briefs of counsel, and find no error. The case was carefully tried and fairly submitted to the jury. We note a want of uniformity in the manner of stating cases involving the trial of an issue of devisavit vel non. It would seem that, in view of the fact there are no parties in the usual sense of the term, the case should be stated "In re Will of," etc. There is no error.

Appeal from Superior Court, Wayne County; Neal, Judge.

Action by B. A. Price and others against G. O. Griffin and wife. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

M. T. Dickerson and H. L. Stevens, for appellants. Isaac F. Dortch, F. A. Daniels, and Aycock & Winston, for appellees.

WALKER, J. This is an action for the partition of land. In March, 1879, Jesse Price, Sr., who was then the owner of the land in controversy, conveyed the same by deed to his son, John C. Price, during the term of his lifetime, and at his death to his surviving heirs, reserving to Jesse Price, Sr., the grantor, an estate for life in the land. Jesse Price, Sr., died in 1879, and John C. Price on January 15, 1883, conveyed the land by deed to W. P. Price in fee simple. John C. Price died on April 6, 1906, leaving as his heirs four children, B. A. Price, E. H. Price, A. B. Price, and Bettie Pearsall, who are the plaintiffs, and W. P. Price, Lewis H. Price, John T. Price, and C. D. Price. The defendant G. O. Griffin has acquired the interest of W. P. Price and C. D. Price by deeds duly executed to him in 1884, before this proceeding was commenced. If the deed from Jesse Price, Sr., to John C. Price conveyed a fee-simple estate to the latter, the plaintiffs are not entitled to recover, so that the only question in the case is whether it conveyed a fee or only a life estate with remainder to his children surviving him. The difficulty presented in the cases arises from the use of the word "surviving" prefixed to the word "heirs," but we do not think this is sufficient to render inapplicable the rule in Shelley's Case to this limitation. It is said that, as one of the principal reasons for establishing this rule was to prevent the abeyance or suspension of the inheritance, it only applied to those limitations in which the word "heirs" (or some equivalent word of inheritance) is used on account of the maxim, "Nemo est hæres viventis." As under this maxim no one can be heir to a living person, the word "heirs" must necessarily refer to those who survive the ancestor, and the word "surviving" therefore is mere surplusage, just as we have held that the word "lawful" in a limitation to the "lawful heirs" of a person has no significance and does not restrict the ordinary meaning of the word "heirs." Wool v. Fleetwood, 136 N. O. 460, 48 S. E. 785, 67 L. R. A. 444.

In Criswell's Appeal, 41 Pa. 283, Judge Strong (afterwards a justice of the Supreme Court of the United States), for the court, said: "It is said there could be no other heirs than such as were living at the death of the ancestors; that the words 'then living' would be superfluous, unless the testator intended children by 'heirs'; and that, in order to give meaning to those words, the technical words of limitation must give way, and be treated as only a description of persons. We are not convinced by the argument. Let it be admitted that the words 'then living' are strictly of no legal meaning, when applied to heirs, this is no sufficient reason for holding that the testator in the use of technical words of limitation intended to depart from their ordinary legal meaning. It is not so easy to overcome the presumption. The words 'heirs' and 'heirs of the body' will retain their significance, though the effort be to make unmeaning other words in the will not technical, and even though there may be inconsistent expressions. If the words are repugnant, why should the word 'heirs' give way, rather than the words 'then living'? In the will of an unlettered man, however, they can hardly be called repugnant. Lawyers may understand that there are no heirs of a living person, or that the phrase 'living heirs' is a superfluous addition to a gift to heirs; but laymen may not." He adds that the books are full of cases in which it has been held that superfluous expressions in a will do not suffice to reduce the words "heirs" or "heirs of the body" into words of purchase, so as to make them the root of a new inheritance, or the stock of a new descent or descriptio personarum. Chancellor Kent (4 Kent's Comm. [13th Ed.] 226) says that Mr. Hargrave in his observations on the rule is for giving it a most absolute and peremptory obligation. "He considered that the rule was beyond the control of intention when a fit case for its application existed. It was a conclusion of law of irresistible efficacy, when the testator did not use the words 'heirs' or 'heirs of the body' in a special or restrictive sense, for any particular person or persons who should be the heir of the tenant for life at his death, and in that instance inaptly denominated 'heir,' and when he did not intend to break in upon and disturb the line of descent from the ancestor, but used the word 'heirs' as a nomen collectivum for the whole line of inheritable blood. It is not nor ought to be in the power of a grantor or testator to prescribe a different qualification to heirs from what the law prescribes when they are to take in their character of heirs; and the rule in its wisdom and policy did not intend to leave it to the parties to decide what should be a descent and what should be a purchase."

The heirs of a man are his descendants who survive him and are capable of inheriting at the time of his death. At no other time can it be ascertained who his heirs will be. They may be his lineal descendants, or those only who are related to him collaterally. Hardage v. Stroope, 58 Ark. 306, 24 S. W. 490. In the case of Watts v. Clardy, 2 Fla. 389, 390, where the limitation was very much like the one in this case, it is said: "The term 'surviving heirs' is one of unusual occurrence in the books; for, whilst we have 'survivors,' 'surviving children,' 'sons,' 'issue,' and 'daughters,' there is in the books no such word attached to heirs as far as we have been able to discover, and we are inclined to the opinion that so connected it is without meaning, neither enlarging nor contracting the estate. The heirs of Mrs. Clardy from necessity are those who survive her at her death. They could not have preceded her. 'Nemo est hæres viventis.' There is no heir until the death of the ancestor. The fair import of the clause then would seem to be that the estate is to go to the heirs of her body at her decease. If this view be correct, the case is freed from difficulty, and the deed is a naked grant to the heirs of her body. Obviously those who take as surviving heirs claim as heirs to the mother at her death, and, taking as heirs, they take by descent. According to our view, the property would descend to the whole class of heirs of Mrs. Clardy, and they would become entitled to the estate in the same manner, and to the same extent, and with the same descendible qualities, as if the grant had been simply to her and her heirs." The same conclusion was reached by the court in Hlester v. Yerger, 166 Pa. 445, 81 Atl. 122, in which the court said that "there is no distinction between the expressions 'his then surviving heirs' and 'heirs then living at the time of their deaths.' In each case the word 'heirs' refers to those who under the intestate laws would inherit from the first taker, qua heirs." In May v. Lewis, 132 N. C. 115, 43 S. E. 550, this court construed the following devise: "I loan unto my son Benjamin May my entire interest in the tract of land [describing it] to be his during his natural life, and at his death I give said land to his heirs, if any, to be theirs in fee simple forever, and if he should die without heirs, said land to revert to his next of kin." We held that the rule in Shelley's Case did not apply, because of the closing words which changed the ordinary course of descent, but it was said that "if the deviser had concluded the limitation with the words "to his heirs, if any, to be theirs in fee simple forever," the rule would have applied and given to Benjamin May a fee simple. In other words, that the expression "if any" would not in such a case prevent the application of the rule. By the words "if any" the deviser evidently meant if any living or surviving, or, to state it differently, to the "living" or "surviving" heirs, "if any." The court further said in that case that the person designated by the technical word "heir" is he on whom the law casts an inheritance at the time of the ancestor's death, citing Oroom v. Herring, 11 N. C. 393, where Henderson, J., so defines the word.

The limitation in this case cannot be differentiated from one to a person, and, at his death, to his heirs; for his heirs must be ascertained at that time. They are those upon whom at his death the inheritance or descent is cast. In the case of Richards v. Bergavenny, 2 Vern. 324, the estate was limited to the Lady Bergavenny and such heirs of her body as should be living at her death, and, in default of such heirs of her body, the remainder over. The court held that the Lady Bergavenny took an estate in fee tail, and did not attach any importance to the words "living at her death," as having the effect to restrict the words "heirs of her body" so as to cut down her estate to one for life. This case has often been cited as an authority in support of the position that such words cannot be allowed to reduce the quantity of the estate or to free the limitation from the operation of the rule in Shelley's Case. We are authorized to examine the context of the deed in order to ascertain the true meaning of words which we are required to construe when they are ambiguous. Gudger v. White, 141 N. C. 507, 54 S. E. 386; Railroad v. Railroad, 147 N. C. 368, 61 S. E. 185. In this way we may determine whether the words "surviving heirs" were used as designatio personarum or as descriptive of those persons upon whom the law casts the inheritance under the canons of descent as heirs of John O. Price, and not as purchasers from Jesse Price, or as those who take under the law, and not under the deed.

Looking at the instrument in its entirety, we find that, in addition to the words we have already taken from the deed, the clause of warranty contains a covenant for quiet enjoyment which runs, not to John O. Price for life and then to his "surviving heirs," but "to him and to his heirs and assigns forever." This may be slight evidence of what the grantor meant when he used the words "surviving heirs"; and, while this may be so, it is not to be disregarded, but may be considered as shedding some light upon the question in controversy. The form of the covenant is in perfect harmony with the interpretation we have given to the words of the limitation "to him during the term of his life time," and, at his decease, "to the surviving heirs of the said John O. Price." It evinces a purpose to give him the fee, and not merely a life estate, by the use of proper words of inheritance which are sufficient for the application of the rule of law laid down in Shelley's Case. We believe our conclusion to be supported by recent decisions of this court as to the application of the rule in Shelley's Case. Leathers v. Gray, 101 N. C. 162, 7 S. E. 657, 9 Am. St. Rep. 30; Nichols v. Gladden, 117 N. C. 497, 23 S. E. 459; Chamblee v. Broughton, 120 N. C. 170, 27 S. E. 111.

As John O. Price acquired by the deed from his father a fee-simple estate, he conveyed the same estate to the defendant G. O. Griffin by the deeds executed in 1884, and the plaintiffs consequently have no interest in the land as tenants in common with the defendants.

The ruling of the court was therefore correct.

No error.

BROWN v. MYERS et ux.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. April 14, 1909.)

1. DEEDS (§ 118*)—MISTAKE IN DESCRIPTION—PRESUMPTION.

That the word "east" in the description in a deed down a certain road in an "east" direction, to a certain stream, should clearly have been "west," raised no presumption that there was a further mistake, in that the description should have been down the road to a bend in it, thence in the same direction to the stream.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Deeds, Dec. Dig. § 118.*]

2. DEEDS (§ 118*)—MISTAKE IN DESCRIPTION—EVIDENCE.

On the issue of a mistake in a deed, in that a description, instead of being down a certain road to a certain stream, should have been down the road to a bend therein, thence in a straight line to the stream, a second deed containing the latter description, and written after the first, in the absence of the grantee and without her request, but at the request of some one not shown, is inadmissible.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Deeds, Dec. Dig. § 118.*]

3. DEPOSITIONS (§ 56*)—NOTICE OF TAKING—SERVICE BY CONSTABLE.

Service of a notice of the taking of a deposition in the superior court by a constable is insufficient.

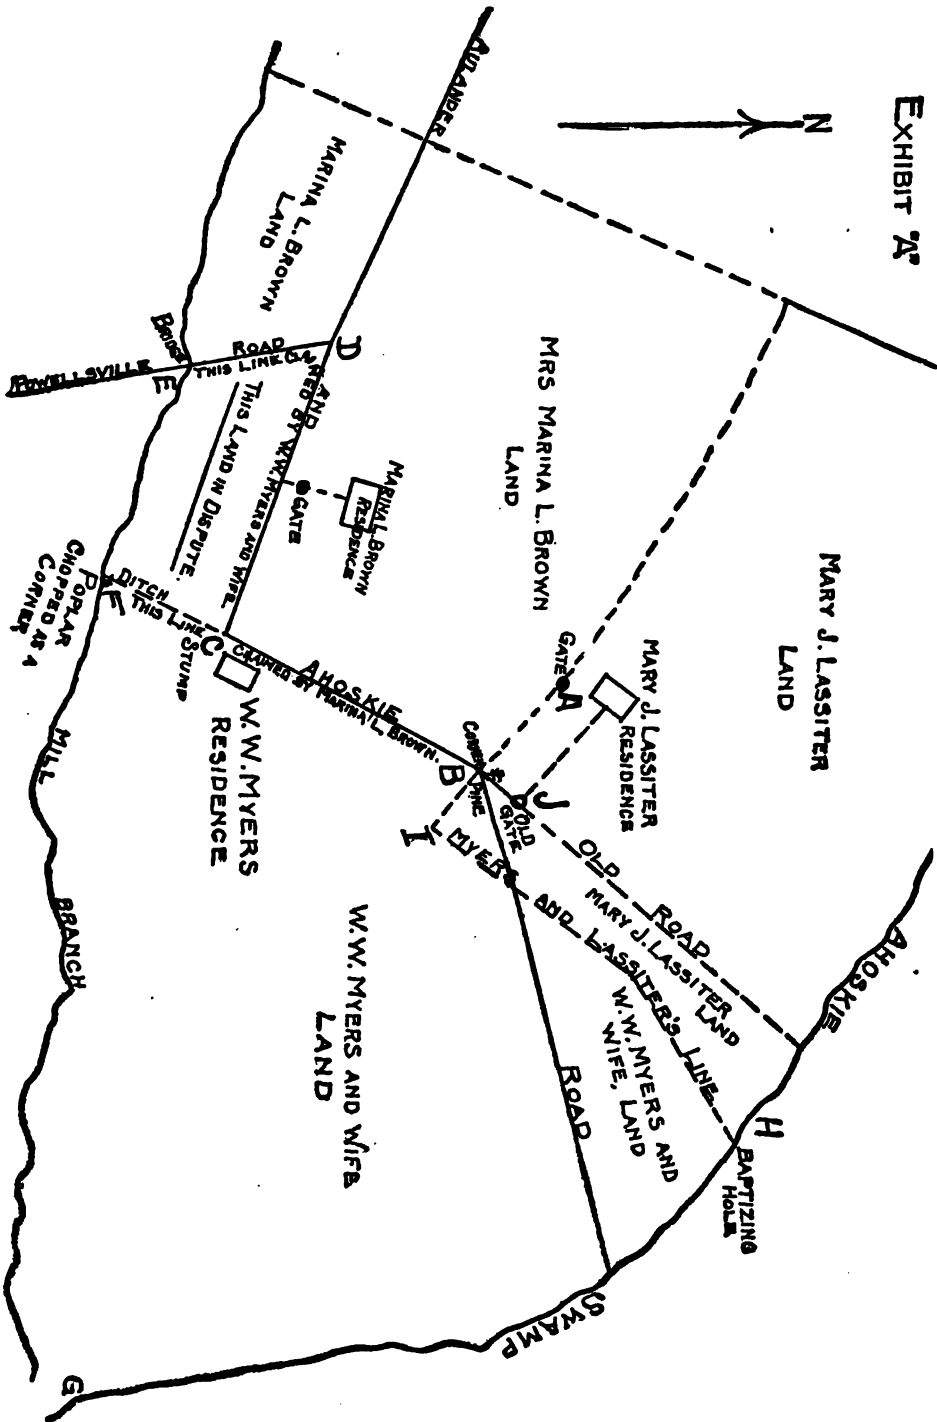

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Depositions, Cent. Dig. § 110; Dec. Dig. § 56.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Hertford County; W. R. Allen, Judge.

Action by Marina L. Brown against W. W. Myers and wife for alleged trespass. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

The following is a map of the property in question:

EXHIBIT 'A'

R. C. Bridger and L. L. Smith, for appellants. Winborne & Lawrence, for appellees.

CLARK, C. J. The plaintiff conveyed to the feme defendant a tract of "75 acres more or less," describing the boundaries as follows: "Beginning at Mrs. M. J. Lassiter's road gate, thence running in an east direction down the road to the run of Mill Branch, thence down the run of the branch to the run of Ahooskie Swamp; thence up the run of said swamp to the Baptizing Hole; thence running a line of marked trees between Mrs. M. J. Lassiter's land and Walter Lassiter to the begining." The only controversy is as to the line "down the road to the run of Mill Branch." Going "down the road," one would come to Mill Branch, without let or hindrance. There are two bends or sharp turns in the road, and the plaintiff contends that, while the straight road from B to C should be followed, that at C, the first bend, instead of further following the road, the line should be extended almost straight ahead through the woods to F, which is a point on Mill Branch, but below the point which would be reached, going "down the road to the run of Mill Branch," as is prescribed in the deed. This variation of leaving the road, and "taking to the woods," if allowable, would save the plaintiff, the grantor in the deed, the 10 acres now in controversy. To justify such departure from the plain words of the deed, the plaintiff avers in the complaint that, "by mutual mistake or by mistake of the draftsman," the words "along the road to the run of Mill Branch" were written when it ought, and was intended, to be written, "along the road to the bend of the road, thence nearly the same course a line of marked trees to a poplar near the canal or the run of Mill Branch." This was denied, as was also the further allegation that prior to the execution of the deed the grantor went over the land with the husband of feme defendant and located the line as being from the bend of the road at C to F on Mill Branch, below where the line, if following the road, would strike Mill Branch. These contentions were submitted to the jury, who found for the defendant on the following issues:

"(1) Is the land in dispute embraced within the boundaries of the deed to the defendant Rosa L. Myers? Ans. Yes.

"(2) If so, did the plaintiff and W. W. Myers prior to the execution of the deed go over the land to be conveyed for the purpose of locating the land to be embraced in the deed, and did they locate said line and make the same run from B to C and then to F on the plat? Ans. No.

"(3) If so, was it the intention of the parties to said deed at the time of the execution thereof to convey the land to the line B to C and then F on the plat, and no further? Ans. No."

The points at issue were fairly submitted and determined. The words "in an east direction" along the road should have been "west," as the plaintiff avers, and as is evident (Wiseman v. Green, 127 N. C. 288, 37 S. E. 272), but that fact has no bearing on the controversy. It raises no presumption that there were other errors and omissions whereby the plaintiff conveyed 10 acres more than he intended. The jury found on the evidence that there was no omission, and that the road was the boundary on that side, as stated in the deed. The court properly refused to charge the jury that the line in dispute was where the plaintiff contended. This was his first exception.

The second exception relied on in the plaintiff's brief is the rejection in evidence of another deed written after the defendant's deed was recorded, making the line run from the bend of the road at C to F, which deed was written by witness in the absence of the feme defendant, without her request, and witness is unable to remember at whose request.

The third exception is to the holding by the court that the service of a notice in the superior court by a constable was insufficient. Cullen v. Absher, 119 N. C. 441, 26 S. E. 33.

The only other exception relied on in plaintiff's brief is the refusal of the following prayer: "That as a matter of law the description in the defendant's deed is too vague to cover the land in controversy, and you will therefore answer the first issue, 'No.'"

These exceptions require no discussion at our hands.

No error.

(150 N. C. 381)

STATE v. JACKSON.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. April 7, 1909.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 407*)—ADMISSIONS—ACQUIESCENCE.

Evidence of acquiescence in the conduct or the statements of another is only admissible where such conduct was fully known, or the statements were heard and fully understood, by accused under circumstances giving him an opportunity to act or speak, and naturally calling for some action or reply from a person similarly situated.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 898-900, 968; Dec. Dig. § 407.*]

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 407*)—EVIDENCE—ADMISSION—ACQUIESCENCE.

In a prosecution for perjury by falsely swearing, in a prosecution of another for disturbing an election, that such other stole a ballot from the box, a witness testified that, in an investigation of the election before the county commissioners, accused was present, and said nothing about the other person taking a ballot, but it did not appear what the nature of the investigation was, or whether accused was especially interested therein, or that he was given an opportunity to speak concerning it. Another witness testified that some time after the election a certain person said in conversation that the election certainly was fair, and accused was present, and did not say anything. Held, that the evidence was not admissible against accused as admissions by acquiescence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 898, 900, 968; Dec. Dig. § 407.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Cumberland County; W. J. Adams, Judge.

L. C. Jackson was convicted of perjury, and he appeals. Reversed and new trial ordered.

There was evidence tending to show that an election had been held in Rockfish township, in said county, on the question of graded schools for district No. 5½, and that one Thos. Seals had been arrested and tried for unlawfully disturbing said election, and stealing a ballot from the ballot box being used in same; that present defendant swore out the warrant, against Seals, and testified against him, in the hearing before the justice, that he saw said Seals steal a ballot from the box pending said election; that Seals was bound over by the justice, and, the grand jury having ignored the bill, the defendant was indicted for perjury, by reason of the oath and testimony as above stated. There was evidence, on the part of the state tending to show that the said testimony was wrongfully and corruptly false, and, on the part of the defendant, that the facts stated and testified against Seals were true, and in the trial below one John Calhoun, a witness for the state, was allowed to testify over defendant's objection; that, in a hearing or investigation had before county commissioners concerning this election defendant, Jackson, was present, and said nothing at that time about Seals having taken the ballot. To the admission of this testimony defendant excepted. Again Edgar Hall, a witness for the state, was allowed, over defendant's objection, to testify that "some time after the election [date not given in record] Henry Ratly said to some one that he (Ratly) did not understand the election, but it certainly was fair; that defendant was present, and could have heard this remark, and did not say anything." Defendant excepted. There was verdict of guilty, and from judgment on verdict defendant appealed, assigning for error the rulings of the court on the admission of evidence as above stated.

Thos. H. Sutton, for appellant. The Attorney General and A. S. Hall, for the State.

HOKE, J. (after stating the facts as above). The silence of a party in the presence and hearing of statements relevant to a matter undergoing investigation, may, under given circumstances, be received in evidence against him by way of admission or acquiescence. Although the statements, under the circumstances indicated, are necessarily to be heard, it is the silence of the party, and the inferences fairly deducible from that fact, which constitutes the evidence; and, while this silence may at times have strong probative force, it is a fact so liable to misinterpretation and abuse that the authorities uniformly consider it as evidence to be received with great caution, and, except under well-recognized conditions, hold it to be altogether inadmissible. The very terms of the maxim to which the admission of such evidence is referred give clear indication that this is a proper estimate, and a correct position concerning it. "Qui tacet consentire videtur."

The general principle, and the conditions required for its admissibility, will be found very well stated in Taylor on Evidence (with American notes by Chamberlayne) vol. 2, pp. 523, 525, 555 (5), 588 (5). Thus page 523: "Admissions may also be implied from the acquiescence of the party. Acquiescence, to have the effect of an admission, must exhibit some act of the mind, and amount to voluntary demeanor or conduct of the party. And whether it be acquiescence in the conduct or in the language of others, it must plainly appear that such conduct was fully known, or such language fully understood, by the party, before any inference can be drawn from his passiveness or silence. The circumstances, too, must be, not only such as afforded him an opportunity to act or to speak, but such also as would properly and naturally call for some action or reply from men similarly situated." And on page 527: "Admissions are, too, sometimes, inferred from acquiescence in the oral statements of others. At the same time the maxim, 'Qui tacet consentire videtur,' must be applied by the lawyer with careful discrimination. 'Nothing,' it has been observed, 'can be more dangerous than this kind of evidence. It should always be received with caution, and never ought to be received at all, unless the evidence is of direct declarations, of that kind which naturally calls for contradiction—some assertions made to the party with respect to his right, which by his silence he acquiesces in.' Moreover, to effect one person with the statements of others, on the ground of his implied admission of their truth by silent acquiescence, it is not enough that they were made in his presence, or even to himself, by parties interested, but they must also have been made on an occasion when a reply from him might be properly expected." And on page 554 (5): "To render an unchallenged declaration, made in a person's presence, evidence against him it is essential that he be in a position to reply, if so minded. 'If a party is so situated that he is not called upon to say anything, and does not say anything, his silence under such circumstances is not to be taken as furnishing any ground for an inference that he thereby made any admission'—citing Proctor v. Old Colony R. R., 154 Mass. 251, 28 N. E. 13 (1891); Corser v. Paul, 41 N. H. 24, 77 Am. Dec. 753 (1860); Gibney v. Marchay, 34 N. Y. 301, 305 (1866); Loggins v. State, 8 Tex. App. 434, 444 (1880); Kaelin v. Com., 84 Ky. 354, 367, 1 S. W. 594 (1886); Peck v. Ryan, 110 Ala. 336, 17 South. 733 (1895)." And again on page 588 (5): "The inference that silence is tantamount to an admission of guilt must rest upon the idea of acquiescence, and it is not consistent with sound reason to imply an acquiescence from silence, unless the circumstances are such as to afford the party an opportunity to act or speak, but such, also, as would naturally call for some action or reply from prudent men similarly situated."

The rule is well and tersely settled in Com. v. Brown, 121 Mass. 69, as follows: 'A statement made in the presence of a defendant, to which no reply is made, is not admissible against him, unless it appears that he was at liberty to make a reply, and that the statement was made by such person and under such circumstances as naturally to call for a reply unless he intends to admit it. But, if he makes a reply wholly or partially admitting the truth of the facts stated, both the statement and the reply are competent evidence. Com. v. Kennedy, 12 Metc. (Mass.) 235, 46 Am. Dec. 672.'

The doctrine so stated is fully supported by the decisions of our own court on the subject, and others of recognized authority. Tobacco Co. v. McElwee, 96 N. C. 71, 1 S. E. 676, 60 Am. Rep. 404; Guy v. Manuel, 89 N. C. 83; Francis v. Edwards, 77 N. C. 271; Peck v. Ryan, 110 Ala. 336-341, 17 South. 733; State v. Mullins, 101 Mo. 514, 14 S. W. 625.

A perusal of these authorities, and a proper consideration of the subject, will establish that, when admissible, it is always open to the party affected to impair or destroy the force of the testimony by showing that he did not, or could not, hear the statements, or that he was ignorant of the facts, and not in a condition to make intelligent reply, or other circumstances of like tendency; and, unless the party at the time was afforded fair opportunity to speak, or the statements were made under circumstances, and by such persons, as naturally called for a reply, the evidence in question is not admissible at all. The first of these conditions, suggested as positive limitations on the reception of the evidence in question, more usually arises where the statements are made in the course of some judicial, or quasi judicial, investigation, and of these an instance is afforded in the case of Tobacco Co. v. McElwee, supra, where the statements were made by a witness when a deposition was being taken, and the party affected was present, and did not make reply. Chief Justice Smith for the court said: "In our opinion it would have been rude and indecorous in him to do so orally; nor was it to be expected that he should interfere with the course of his examination as a witness, conducted by counsel, for the mere purpose of contradiction. The testimony was taken for use in a case then depending, and its pertinency and materiality were under the control of counsel. It was not required that the witness should use the occasion to correct every erroneous statement made in the deposition of another witness, even to his own prejudice, under the penalty of having the omission construed into an admission of the truth of what was said, and more especially when he is a mere hearer, and no party to the conversation, so to denominate what was then going on." Another appears in State v. Mullins, supra, where it was held: "That statements of a witness made at a coroner's inquest, in the presence of the defendant, are not subsequently admissible against him on the trial of the charge." In this case Black, J., for the court said: "The rule of evidence which allows the silence of a person to be taken as an admission or confession of the truth of the matters stated in his presence should be applied with caution, for it is often much abused. The rule is based on the assumption that the party is at liberty to speak and proceed upon the ground that the circumstances are such as call on him for a reply. The rule has no application whatever to statements given in evidence in a judicial proceeding, for in such case he is not at liberty to interfere or contradict the evidence whenever he pleases."

And the second limitation suggested that the declarations should be made under such circumstances, and by such persons, as naturally call for a reply can rarely, if ever, arise when the party had no present right or interest involved or to be affected. This is illustrated in Guy v. Manuel, supra, where it was sought to use the silence of the party in the hearing of declarations of a person deceased as to boundary, and it appeared that, at the time the declarations were made, the party to be affected had then no interest in the property, but acquired it later. Ashe, J., for the court said: "The plaintiff at the time of the survey had no interest in the land, nor does it appear that he then had its purchase in contemplation. He was then a stranger to the controversy about the location of the land which was being surveyed. If he had at the time any interest in the question sought to be settled by the survey, his failure to object to the oral statements of the persons present, we are ready to admit, would have been some evidence of his acquiescence in what was said in regard to the corner, in his presence and hearing. To make the statements of others evidence against one on the ground of his implied admission of their truth by silent acquiescence they must be made on an occasion when a reply from him might be properly expected. Taylor on Ev. 738; State v. Sugg (at this term) 89 N. C. 527. But where the occasion is such that a person is not called upon or expected to speak, no statements made in his presence can be used against him on the ground of his presumed assent from his silence."

An application of these authorities leads to the conclusion that the court below made an erroneous ruling in the reception of the evidence objected to. On the first exception noted, the investigation as to the election before the board of commissioners, it does not clearly appear from the record what was the nature or purpose of the investigation, nor does it appear that the defendant was especially interested, or, if he was, that he was given opportunity or called on to speak in any way concerning it. And in the second, the statements testified to by the witness Hall, they appear to have been made by one Henry Ratly to some third person, at a time when this defendant had no present interest specially involved, and when there was no call or occasion for him to reply.

We are of opinion that the admission of the evidence constitutes reversible error, and the defendant is entitled to have his cause tried before another jury, and it is so ordered.

New trial.

(150 N. C. 487)

IN RE THORP'S WILL.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. April 14, 1909.)

1. EVIDENCE (§ 220*) — ADMISSIONS — ADMISSIONS BY ACQUIESCENCE.

Evidence that a few years before testator's death, testator pleaded guilty to a charge of trespass, and his counsel in argument stated, in testator's presence, that testator had recently returned from an asylum, and was still of weak mind and irresponsible, was inadmissible, as made on an occasion when testator was not called upon to speak.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 778; Dec. Dig. § 220.*]

2. EVIDENCE (§ 832*) — DOCUMENTARY EVIDENCE—OFFICIAL RECORDS.

The record of an instrument, not authorized by law to be recorded, is inadmissible in evidence, so that in a will contest the Book of Settlements of the Superior Court, containing a copy of the papers discharging testator from the asylum, which were issued by the asylum authorities pursuant to statute, were inadmissible, no statute authorizing the record of such certificates in the Book of Settlements.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Dec. Dig. § 832.*]

3. EVIDENCE (§ 83*) — PRESUMPTIONS — DISCHARGE OF OFFICIAL DUTY.

It will be presumed in a will contest, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, that testator was discharged from an asylum because he had become sane.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 105; Dec. Dig. § 83.*]

4. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1051*)—HARMLESS ERROR—PREJUDICIAL EFFECT—ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE.

In a will contest, several pages of the Book of Settlements of the Superior Court, containing a copy of the certificate discharging testator from the asylum as sane, were admitted in evidence, though the statute did not require such certificates to be recorded in the Book of Settlements. A large number of witnesses on both sides spoke of testator having been confined in the asylum, and of his discharge after about two years, which was some 12 years before the will was made, and all the evidence outside the copy of the certificate admitted showed that testator was confined in the asylum and discharged as sane, and the testimony on both sides went to testator's sanity during the last few years of his life, there being no evidence showing that he was not sane immediately after leaving the asylum. Held that, under the circumstances, error in admitting the Book of Settlements was not prejudicial to caveator.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4161, 4162-4185; Dec. Dig. § 1051.*]

5. WILLS (§ 52*)—WILL CONTEST—BURDEN OF PROOF.

In a will contest, the burden is on caveator to establish insanity at the time the will was executed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. §§ 101-110; Dec. Dig. § 52.*]

6. WILLS (§ 88*) — WILL CONTEST — MENTAL CAPACITY.

If testator signed the purported will as his will, and at the time had the mental capacity to know and understand the intent and effect of his act, the property he owned and wished to dispose of, his relation to the property and the beneficiaries under his will, he had the mental capacity to make a will; but, if he was laboring under insane delusions, so that he did not know and understand those things, he was incapable of making a will.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. §§ 78-81; Dec. Dig. § 88.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Granville County; Long, Judge.

In the matter of the will of James M. Thorp. From a judgment establishing the will, caveator, William H. Thorp, appealed. Affirmed.

B. S. Royster, B. K. Lassiter, and T. T. Hicks, for propounder. Graham & Devin, for caveator.

BROWN, J. The ground upon which the will of the testator, James Thorp, was contested is stated in the caveat to be "for the reason that at the time of the execution thereof and continuously thereafter until his death, the said James M. Thorp did not have the capacity to make and execute a will for that he was not of sound and disposing memory at and during said time." The evidence on both sides is quite voluminous. That introduced for the propounders, including that of the witnesses to the will, tends to prove that the testator, a colored man, was eccentric, had been committed to the asylum for the insane in 1894 for about two years, and then discharged; that he returned to his home and managed his affairs successfully, up to his death, so much so that he surpassed all of his race in that community in making money and in keeping it, and got decidedly the better of two lawyers on a land trade; that up to his death he kept his houses insured, collected his rents, could read and write and kept accounts accurately; and that he had ample capacity to make a will. The evidence offered for caveator tends to prove that testator was of unsound mind, suffered from mental delusions, and that he did not have testamentary capacity, at the time of the execution of the will.

There are two exceptions to the evidence relied upon in the brief of counsel for appellant.

1. To the exclusion of evidence of witness Nat Venable, by whom caveator proposed to show that, a few years before the death of testator, he pleaded guilty to trespass, and his counsel, in his plea to the court for mercy, stated in the presence of testator that he had lately returned from the insane asylum, and was still of weak mind, and not responsible for his acts. It would be hard measure to charge a person in after life with everything an attorney may say for him in a fervent plea to the judge for mercy upon his client. But in any event, the occasion was one when the testator was not called upon to speak for himself; and, under such circumstances, he will not be held to have acquiesced therein what was said by another. To make the statements of others evidence against a person on the ground of the implied admission of their truth by silent acquiescence therein they must be made on an occasion when a reply might be properly expected. It would have been indecorous for the testator to have interrupted the speech of his counsel while addressing the court. Tobacco v. McElwee, 96 N. C. 74, 4 S. E. 676, 60 Am. Rep. 404; Guy v. Manuel, 89 N. C. 86; State v. Jackson (this term) 64 S. E. 376.

2. To the admission in evidence of certain pages of the Book of Settlements No. 3 of the Superior Court of Granville county, upon which was recorded the following:

"The Eastern Hospital, Dr. J. F. Miller, Supt. Goldsboro, N. C., June 2, 1896. To the Board of Directors of the Eastern Hospital—This is to certify that Mat. Thorp, an insane person, was sent to this hospital from Granville county, and that in my opinion he having become of sane mind is recommended for discharge. A duplicate of this certificate is made to the clerk of the superior court of said county in accordance with the provisions of section 21, c. 156, p. 246, Laws 1883. Very respectfully, J. F. Miller, Superintendent."

"The Eastern Hospital. Dr. J. F. Miller, Superintendent. Goldsboro, N. C., June 2, 1896. To Dr. J. F. Miller, Superintendent, of the Eastern Hospital—Sir: The Board of Directors of the Eastern Hospital having considered your certificate made in accordance with the provisions of section 21, c. 156, p. 246, Laws of North Carolina Session of 1883, to the effect that Mat Thorp, an insane person in this hospital, was sent from the county of Granville, and that in your opinion he having become of sane mind and recommend that he be discharged, it is hereby ordered that the said Mat Thorp be discharged. Very respectfully, J. F. Sutherland, T. B. Parker, Executive Committee."

These appear to be the discharge papers of the testator required by law. Revisal 1905, § 4596, and issued in pursuance of the statute. It is possible the originals, or the record of the executive committee of the Eastern Hospital containing them, would be competent evidence if proven and identified, but it is quite clear that the Book of Settlements upon which the papers are recorded is not competent. We have been cited to no statute which authorizes the recording of such certificates upon the Book of Settlements, and our own researches fail to discover any. It is familiar learning that, when the law does not require or authorize an instrument, or paper, to be recorded, a copy of the record is not admissible in evidence. 1 Greenleaf, Ev. § 485, p. 551 (note). But a majority of the court are convinced that the error was harmless, and evidently did not affect the result. The record discloses that a large majority of the witnesses of both sides spoke of the fact that the testator was confined in the hospital, and that he was discharged after being there some 18 months or 2 years, and returned to his home. The law will presume, in the absence of anything to the contrary, that the testator was discharged because he had become of sane mind again. It is not even contended that the testator was ever a raving maniac or hopelessly incurable. On the contrary, for most of the period covered by the evidence of the caveator the testator had occasional delusions, and was sensitive about any reference to the asylum. The will was made some 12 years after testator's discharge, and it is only in the very last years of his life that witnesses for caveator declare he was "mighty bad off." All the evidence in the record outside of these certificates indicates clearly that the testator was confined in the asylum for a period, and then discharged because it was thought he had been restored to normal sanity. In fact the testimony on both sides is directed almost exclusively to the mental condition of the testator in the last few years of his life, and there is nothing tending to prove that immediately after leaving the asylum he was otherwise than normally sane, something which may well be presumed from the admitted fact that he had been duly discharged, and resided at home for 12 years thereafter undisturbed. For these reasons we are unable to see anything prejudicial in the admission of the Book of Settlements.

3. The several exceptions to the charge of the court are without merit. His honor properly placed the burden of proof on the caveator to establish insanity at the time of the making of the will by a preponderance of the evidence, and charged as follows: "If you find from the evidence that Mat Thorp signed the paper writing offered in evidence as and for his will, and you find that at the time he signed the alleged will he had mental capacity to know and understand what he was doing, the property he owned and wished to dispose of; knew and understood the relation he bore to his property, and the persons to whom he was giving it; understood the nature of the act in which he was engaged and its extent and effect—if he possessed the mental capacity so defined, and you find the facts so to be from a review of all the evidence, he had mental capacity sufficient to make a will. But if at the time he executed the paper you find that he did not know what he was doing, and you find that he was suffering from an insane delusion, or delusions, so that he did not understand what property he had, and what he was doing with it, or did not know how and to whom he was giving his property, and did not understand and know the nature or extent and effect of his act, and if you find the facts so to be from the greater weight of the evidence, then he did not have sufficient capacity to make a will." This charge is in line with an array of well-settled precedents. Horne v. Horne, 31 N. C. 106; Cornelius v. Cornelius, 52 N. C. 595; Lawrence v. Steel, 66 N. C. 586; Paine v. Roberts, 82 N. C. 453; Horah v. Knox, 87 N. C. 489; Bost v. Bost, 87 N. C. 479; Crenshaw v. Johnson, 120 N. C. 274, 26 S. E. 810; Snow's Will, 128 N. C. 102, 38 S. E. 295.

Upon a review of the entire record, we are of opinion that the appellant has shown no substantial error which warrants us in directing another trial.

No error.

FRALEY et al. v. FRALEY et al.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. April 21, 1909.)

1. DEEDS (§ 211*)—CANCELLATION—FRAUD—DEGREE OF PROOF REQUIRED.

In a suit to cancel decedent's deed to defendants, for fraud and undue influence, plaintiffs were not bound to make out their case by "clear, strong, and convincing" proof; a preponderance being sufficient.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Deeds, Cent. Dig. §§ 641, 642, 645; Dec. Dig. § 211.*]

2. EVIDENCE (§ 122*)—CANCELLATION—FRAUD—EVIDENCE—RES GESTÆ.

In a suit to cancel decedent's deed to defendants for fraud and undue influence, evidence of a decision of persons called in by decedent before the conveyance to determine whether the property was worth more than services to be rendered by defendants, and of an announcement of the decision to decedent, was admissible as part of the res gestæ; any fact in the transaction leading to the deed and tending to affect decedent's mind in making the deed being admissible.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 339-350; Dec. Dig. § 122.*]

3. WORDS AND PHRASES — "COTEMPORANEOUS."

The term "cotemporaneous" does not necessarily always refer to any single or ultimate fact, however important to any precise or definite time.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 2, p. 1489.]

4. WORDS AND PHRASES—"TRANSACTION."

A "transaction" may include a series of occurrences extending over a great length of time.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 8, pp. 7060-7062, 7818-7819.]

5. EVIDENCE (§ 119*)—RES GESTÆ—WHAT CONSTITUTE.

A relevant fact in any one of a series of occurrences forming one transaction may constitute part of res gestæ.

Appeal from Superior Court, Rowan County; B. F. Long, Judge.

Action by D. H. Fraley and others against G. W. Fraley and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. New trial granted.

The action was instituted to set aside a deed made by Jacob Fraley, now deceased, to Jane E. Stokes, daughter of said Jacob, and one of the defendants, and G. W. Fraley, his son, another one of defendants, on the ground of mental incapacity and of fraud and undue influence. Issues were submitted: (1) As to the mental capacity of Jacob Fraley. (2) As to fraud and undue influence. It was shown that in March, 1900, Jacob Fraley died, leaving surviving a number of children and grandchildren, his descendants and heirs at law, who were parties plaintiff or defendant in the action; that about 16 months before his death, Jacob Fraley's home having burned, he went to live with Jane Stokes, his daughter, and G. W. Fraley, his son, staying a portion of the time with either; and that not long after making the move, to wit, on October 19, 1898, he executed to Jane E. Stokes, the daughter, and G. W. Fraley, the son, the deed in question, conveying to them his home tract of 109 acres, and 10 days thereafter he executed to these same grantees a deed for 40 acres of land in Stanly county, on which there was a mortgage for $300 or over, the two deeds conveying practically all of his property. There was evidence on the part of the plaintiff tending to show mental incapacity on the part of Jacob Fraley, grantee, at the time of execution of these deeds, and of fraud and undue influence on the part of the grantees and of J. F. Stokes, husband of Jane E. Stokes, one of the grantees. There was evidence on the defendants tending to show that Jacob Fraley at the time the deeds were executed was of sound mind and memory, and that he made them of his own mind and will. Among other circumstances offered in support of defendants' position was the fact that some time before the execution of the deeds three neighbors were called in at the instance of Jacob Fraley and the grantees and perhaps other members of the family, the record not being clear as to this last statement, to consider and decide whether "his property was worth too much, or not, for taking care of him," and J. D. Austin, one of these who took part in the consultation, was allowed, over plaintiffs' objection, to state that, pursuant to the request of Jacob Fraley and the others, the three men selected met at a given time on the premises, and, after consulting over the matter, decided, in substance, that the proposed service, taking care of the old man the remainder of his life, was about a fair equivalent for the property he had. The consultation seems to have been partly in the presence of Mr. Fraley, but the decision was not made in his immediate presence, but he was immediately informed of what their decision was. Plaintiffs excepted. There was judgment for defendants, and, from judgment on the verdict, the plaintiffs appealed, having in apt time assigned for error, among other things, the ruling of his honor on the question of evidence, as indicated, and in charging the jury on the second issue, in part, as follows: "That the plaintiffs were required to make out their contentions by clear, strong, and convincing proof."

R. Lee Wright, P. S. Carlton, and T. J. Jerome, for appellants. Clement & Clement and T. F. Kluttz, for appellees.

HOKE, J. (after stating the facts as above). There was error in the charge of the court as to the degree and quality of proof required on an issue as to the execution of a deed by fraud and undue influence. The question was directly presented in the case of Harding v. Long, 108 N. C. 1, 9 S. E. 445, 14 Am. St. Rep. 775, and the principle declared and sustained in an elaborate and learned opinion by Associate Justice Avery that, on the issue indicated, the plaintiff was required to establish the allegation to the satisfaction of the jury by the greater weight of the evidence. The main purpose of this decision was to withdraw an issue of this character from the principle announced in Ely v. Early, 94 N. C. 1, that in a certain class of cases, notably where it was sought to correct or alter a written deed or superimpose a trust thereon by parol, the proof must be clear, strong, and convincing, and place it within the rule which ordinarily obtains in the determination of civil issues—that is, by the preponderance or greater weight of the evidence—the language of the opinion on the point in question being as follows: "But, on the other hand, when the relief demanded by a party is that a deed shall be declared void because its execution was procured by false and fraudulent representations or undue influence, or that it was executed with intent to hinder, delay, or defeat creditors, the allegations material to establish the fraud must be proven, so as to produce belief of their truth in the minds of the jury, or so as to satisfy the jury of their truth, or to the satisfaction of the jury." In saying here that fraud must be proven to the satisfaction of the jury, etc., the learned justice was only describing or defining the result to be attained in the mind of the jury, and did not, as stated, intend to lay down any special rule of proof differing from that usually applied in the determination of civil issues. This interpretation of the words "proof to the satisfaction of the jury" is fully supported in a later opinion of the court in Chaffin v. Manufacturing Co., 135 N. C. 95, 47 S. E. 226, where, in an action to recover for damages caused by the erection and maintenance of a dam, the trial judge had charged the jury that "it is not sufficient for plaintiffs to show that their land has been damaged. They must further prove, to the satisfaction of the jury, that this damage was caused by the erection of the dam." It was objected that this required of plaintiffs a greater degree of proof than the law imposed upon them, and Justice Walker, in disallowing the exception, said: "The use of the word 'satisfied' did not intensify the proof required to entitle the plaintiffs to their verdict. The weight of the evidence must be with the party who has the burden of proof, or else he cannot succeed. But surely the jury must be satisfied, or, in other words, be able to reach a decision or conclusion from the evidence and in favor of the plaintiff which will be satisfactory to themselves. In order to produce this result or to carry such conviction to the minds of the jury as is satisfactory to them, the plaintiff's proof need not be more than a bare preponderance, but it must not be less. The charge, as we construe it, required only that plaintiffs should prove their case by the greater weight of the evidence. In Neal v. Fesperman, 48 N. C. 446, the court (by Pearson, J.), in stating the true rule in civil cases, said that 'the party affirming a fact must prove it to the satisfaction of the jury, because the "onus probandi" is upon him. If he does prove it to the satisfaction of the jury, it is settled that in civil actions he is entitled to a verdict in his favor upon the issue.'" And intimation of like tenor is given in Ferrall v. Broadway, 95 N. C. 551.

There was error, therefore, in the charge of the court on the second issue as to the degree of proof required. It is urged by defendants that this should be regarded as harmless error, for the reason that there was no evidence presented in favor of plaintiffs' position sufficient for a jury's consideration, but we cannot so hold. At this stage of the action we do not think it desirable to state in detail the testimony which makes only for plaintiffs' claim, but will say in general terms that we have carefully considered the entire evidence, and are of opinion that plaintiffs are entitled to have their cause submitted to the jury, under a correct and proper charge, and that the mistake in the respect indicated constitutes reversible error.

As the case goes back for a new trial, we deem it proper to say, further, that the court below made a correct ruling as to the evidence of J. D. Austin, admitted over plaintiffs' objection. It appears that at some time prior to the execution of the deed in question, and with a view to its execution, this witness, with two others, was called in by Jacob Fraley, the grantor, and the grantees, to consider and decide whether the property owned by Jacob Fraley and to be included in the deed was too much for taking care of him and the payment of his debts, amounting to about $300. The persons called in met on the premises, and, having considered the matter, decided that one was about a fair equivalent for the other, and while Jacob Fraley, it seems, was not present at the precise time when the decision was made, he was then and there immediately informed of the conclusion reached, and the deed was afterwards executed for the consideration indicated. This decision, followed by the immediate announcement of it to Jacob Fraley under the circumstances presented, was admissible as part of the res gestæ, not as conclusive on the question decided, but as a circumstance occurring as a part of an entire transaction which resulted in the execution of the deed; and, in any event, its announcement to the grantor was relevant as an independent fact in the res gestæ, and as tending to affect the mind of the grantor in reference to the execution of the deed. It is said by an intelligent writer—Chamberlayne—in his notes to Taylor's Evidence, 391 (1): "That it would probably be difficult and perhaps impossible to give a wholly satisfactory definition of the term 'res gestæ,' and possibly this very ambiguity constitutes no small part of the attractiveness of the phrase." After this comment, the writer makes the statement: "That legal liability in any case is predicated upon the existence of some particular transaction or state of affairs, and it is this group of facts or events which make up its res gestæ." And Greenleaf on Evidence, § 108, after making comment not dissimilar as to any satisfactory definition of the term, intimates that the phrase "res gestæ" consists of the principal fact and surrounding circumstances consisting of kindred facts materially affecting its character, and essential to be known in order to a right understanding of its nature. And both of these authors and others of repute lay it down as essential to the inclusion of a given fact within the meaning of the term that it should be cotemporaneous with the principal fact, and so connected with it as to illustrate its character. And this term "cotemporaneous" does not always of necessity refer to any single or ultimate fact, however important to any precise or definite time; for a "transaction" may, and not infrequently does, include a series of occurrences extending over a great length of time, and a relevant fact in any one of them, and, until the close of the matter, may come within this term "cotemporaneous," and constitute a part of the res gestæ. Greenleaf and Taylor, supra; Brander on Evidence, 325; Knox Co. v. Ninth Nat. Bank, 147 U. S. 91, 13 Sup. Ct. 267, 37 L. Ed. 93; Ahern v. Goodspeed, 72 N. Y. 108. In this last case it was held: "Representations made by one offering to sell property to another negotiating therefor are part of the res gestæ, and binding upon the maker, although a bargain is not concluded at the time, if afterwards, as a continuation of the negotiation, the person to whom they were made becomes a purchaser"; and so it is here. The ultimate fact of the execution of the deed is not an important or controlling fact in this inquiry, nor the point of time to which the admission of testimony must be necessarily referred. It is not even the issuable fact, for the execution of the deed is admitted, and the issuable fact is whether the grantor executed the deed of his own mind and will, or was induced to do it by fraud and undue influence; and any fact taking place in the treaty between the parties which resulted in the execution of the deed, and any relevant fact occurring at any time during the treaty tending to throw light upon the transaction, which was intended and reasonably calculated to affect the mind of the grantor, in reference to the execution of the deed, would be competent as part of the res gestæ, or an independent fact in the res gestæ, and so admissible in evidence. And see Chamberlayne's Best on Evidence (Int. Ed.) p. 463, 1893-94, where the annotator puts down as an exception to the rule excluding facts which are res inter alios acta, such acts as reasonably tend to show the existence of knowledge, intent, and motive, or any bodily or mental state whatever, in any case, when the existence of such knowledge, intent, or state is a fact in issue, or a fact relevant thereto.

On authority and the reason of the thing we hold that the decision and its announcement to the grantor were properly received.

For the error in the charge, there will be a new trial on all the issues, and it is so ordered.

New trial.

FAULK v. COLUMBIA, N. & L. R. CO.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. April 9, 1909.)

1. CARRIERS (§ 158*)—CARRIAGE OF FREIGHT—LIMITATION OF LIABILITY—CONTRACT.

A shipper who by a special contract agrees on a value of the goods in case of loss, and in consideration thereof obtains a reduced rate, is estopped from showing that the real value of the goods was greater than that specified in the contract.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. § 708; Dec. Dig. § 153.*]

2. CARRIERS (§ 155*)—CARRIAGE OF FREIGHT—LIABILITY—CONTRACT.

A carrier cannot as a general rule limit its liability by notice, unless brought to the knowledge of the shipper within a reasonable time before shipment, and expressly assented to by him, and, in the absence of misrepresentations by the shipper as to the nature and value of the goods, the carrier must make known the conditions as to the value which it proposes to attach at a specified rate, and procure his assent thereto.

3. CARRIERS (§ 218*)—CARRIAGE OF HORSES—LIMITATION OF LIABILITY—CONTRACT.

Where a carrier receiving horses for shipment without inquiry and without representations by the shipper as to value sought to impose on the shipper conditions contained in the regulations of the Railroad Commission governing intrastate shipments, providing for classification of freight with a maximum valuation of live stock shipments at a specified rate, it must show the shipper's assent to the regulations, for the conditions involve a limitation on the carrier's common-law liability to respond for the true value of freight destroyed by it.

4. CARRIERS (§ 155*)—CARRIAGE OF FREIGHT—LIABILITY—CONTRACT.

The regulations of the Railroad Commission governing intrastate shipments, and providing for a classification of freight with a maximum valuation of live stock shipments at a designated rate, and stipulating that the reduced rates specified will apply only on the property shipped subject to the conditions of the carrier's bill of lading, and that, where the classification provides for reduced rates based on a fixed valuation, a special release containing the agreed valuation must be signed by the shipper, etc., make the assent of the shipper a prerequisite to the limited value clause, and under Civ. Code 1902, § 1709, providing that no public notice shall limit the common-law liability of any carrier, etc., the shipper is not estopped from recovering the real value of a shipment on the ground that he received the benefit of reduced rates based on a particular valuation, unless he had notice of the facts and assented thereto.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Richland County; Ernest Gary, Judge.

Action by J. H. Faulk against the Columbia, Newberry & Laurens Railroad Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

W. H. Lyles, for appellant. Nelson & Nelson, for respondent.

JONES, J. On November 6, 1905, plaintiff shipped a car load of horses over defendant's line from Columbia, S. C., to Newberry, S. C. When unloaded at Newberry, one horse was found injured, his leg having fallen through a defective floor of the car furnished by defendant, from which injury the horse died. Plaintiff brought this action to recover damages for the loss of the horse at a valuation of $165 and the reasonable expense incurred in trying to cure it, and recovered judgment for $200.

The vital question was whether the shipment was subject to a classification under which the value of the car load of horses was limited at $75 per head. No bill of lading was issued or signed. The plaintiff phoned for the car, and ascertained that the rate would be $19 for the car load. The car was placed for plaintiff, and was loaded by him Sunday night, and was unloaded by him at Newberry early Monday morning. During the conversation over the phone nothing was said about classification or valuation other than the rate should be $19 per car load, and plaintiff testified that he knew nothing of the classification as established by the Railroad Commission. The only paper in writing was the waybill covering a shipment of a car load of horses, "weight 20,000 class N, rate $19.00," which waybill plaintiff had never seen until the day before the trial. There was not even an oral agreement as to classification and valuation.

The defendant proved the schedule of rates and the rules and regulations adopted by the Railroad Commission governing intrastate shipments at the time, and there was some evidence that the tariffs and specifications were posted or published for the benefit of the public. It appears that the Southern Classification No. 34, applies to all roads in South Carolina subject to the classification and rules as provided in the South Carolina exception sheet. The Southern Classification shows the maximum valuation of live stock shipments for horses and mules each $75, and the South Carolina exception sheet classes horses and mules at class N, but does not specify valuation. Rate table, local rate tariff, distance between 40 and 50 miles, shows the highest rate per car load of 20,000 in class N to be $19, but nothing is stated therein as to valuation. Some of the rules of the Southern Classification provide:

"(1) The reduced rates specified in this classification will apply only on property shipped subject to the conditions of this company's bill of lading. If the shipper elects not to accept the said reduced rates and conditions, he should notify the agent of the receiving carrier, in writing, at the time his property is offered for shipment, and if he does not give such notice, it will be understood that he desired the property subject to the standard bill of lading conditions in order to secure the reduced rate thereon. Property carried not subject to the standard bill of lading will be at the carrier's liability, limited only as provided by common law and by the laws of the United States and of the several states in so far as they apply. Property thus carried will be charged twenty (20) per cent. higher (subject to a minimum increase of one [1] cent per hundred pounds) than if shipped subject to the conditions of the standard bill of lading."

"(6) Where the classification provides for reduced rate, based on a certain fixed valuation, the following special release, containing the agreed valuation, must be written and signed by the shipper or owner upon the face of the bill of lading or shipping recelpt. 'It is hereby agreed that the property herein designated is of the value of * * * and the rate of freight charged thereon is based on such agreed valuation, and on the condition that the carrier assumes liability only to the extent of such agreed valuation and no further.'"

The standard bill of lading contained this provision: "The amount of any loss or damage for which any carrier becomes liable shall be computed at the value of the property at the place and time of shipment under this bill of lading, unless a lower value has been agreed upon or is determined by the classification upon which the rate is based, in either of which events such lower value shall be the maximum price to govern such classification." The testimony further shows "that rules all intend that a bill of lading shall be issued for every shipment."

Upon this state of facts the court was requested by defendant's counsel to instruct the jury as follows: "That, in the absence of a special contract of shipment, evidenced by a bill of lading issued by the railroad company at the time of shipment, under the provisions of law, all shipments must be held to have been made under the appropriate classifications and upon the rates and conditions prescribed by the Railroad Commissioners; and, as there is no evidence in this case that a bill of lading or special contract was made at the time of shipment, the jury cannot find more than $75 as the value of the horse, that being the valuation fixed by the rules of the Railroad Commissioners as class N at the rate of $19 per car load from Columbia to Newberry." The court refused to so charge, and instructed the jury that, in the absence of a bill of lading or contract of shipment agreeing upon a valuation, the defendant was liable as at common law for the true value of the property. We find no error. Where a shipper of goods by special contract agrees upon a value to be placed upon such goods in case of loss and in consideration thereof obtains a reduced rate of transportation, he is bound by the stipulation, and is estopped from showing that the real value of the goods was greater than that specified in the contract. Johnstone v. Railroad Co., 39 S. C. 60, 17 S. E. 512. It is contended that a special contract may be implied or inferred from the fact that the shipper secured transportation at the rate of $19 per car load, when the transportation rate without limitation of value was 20 per cent. higher, and from the fact that general public notice was given of the classification which limited the value of horses and mules to $75 per head. The general rule is "that a carrier cannot limit its liability by any mere notice unless such notice is shown to have been brought to the knowledge or attention of the shipper within a reasonable time before shipment and to have been expressly assented to by him." 5 Ency. Law, 290, and cases cited to show the necessity of express assent on the part of the shipper. The authorities which do not require express assent of the shipper do require that the notice shall be clear, explicit, not unreasonable, and brought home to the shipper. 5 Ency. Law, 291. There appears to be much authority in other jurisdictions that there is an exception to the general rule that a common carrier cannot limit its liability by mere notice without the shipper's assent; the exception being that a published rule requiring a shipper to state the true value of the goods shipped is binding on the shipper, whether brought to his attention or not. 5 Ency. Law, 289; note to Cole v. Goodwin, 32 Am. Dec. 506. It is supposed that such a rule is not an attempt to limit liability, but is a mere regulation for the dispatch of the carrier's business, and to protect the carrier from bad faith by the shipper. We do not think the exception should be sanctioned in this state. It may be granted that the carrier has the right to inquire as to the value of the goods to be shipped, and in such case it is the duty of the shipper to make answer in good faith, and to that extent the rule might be regarded as a reasonable regulation for the proper adjustment of the compensation for the risk assumed. But, in the absence of fraud or deception or misleading representations by the shipper as to the nature and value of the goods to be shipped, it is the duty of the carrier to make known to the shipper the conditions as to the value which it proposes to attach to a specified rate and procure his assent thereto. In Bottum v. Railway, 72 S. C. 375, 51 S. E. 985, 2 L. R. A. (N. S.) 773, 110 Am. St. Rep. 610, the court held that, when the shipper represented by words on a box that it contained "Glass," he could not recover for loss of the contents as "pictures," and that in such a case it was not the duty of the carrier to make further inquiry; but the court recognized that when the carrier received a package marked "Glass," and makes no inquiry as to its kind or value, it is responsible for any article received coming under the general description of glass. Here the carrier received 11 horses for shipment without representation by the shipper or inquiry by the carrier as to their value. The conditions sought to be imposed upon the shipper without his assent in this case are more than a regulation. They involve a limitation on the carrier's liability at common law. When the carrier would limit its common-law liability to respond for the true value of the article lost or destroyed by it, the burden is on it to show the shipper's assent. Jenkins v. Southern Ry., 73 S. C. 289, 53 S. E. 480. To sustain the appellant's contention would shift the burden on the shipper to show his non-assent.

We think also that a proper construction of the rules in question makes the assent of the shipper a prerequisite to the limited value clause, for rule 6 provides expressly for the shipper's special release, and rule 1 contemplates an election by the shipper to accept or reject the reduced rates with the conditions. There can be no real election by the shipper without knowledge that there is more than one object of choice. So far as appears, the shipper knew of but one rate, which he paid. Hence there was no basis for an estoppel upon the ground that he received the benefit of the reduced rate with knowledge that it was based upon a particular valuation. The contention by appellant being an attempt to limit common-law liability by a public notice, it must fall under the express terms of section 1709, Civ. Code 1902, which provides: "No public notice or declaration shall limit or in any wise affect the liability at common law of any public common carriers for or in respect of any goods to be carried and conveyed by them; but they shall be liable, as at common law, to answer for the loss of or injury to any articles and goods delivered to them for transportation, any public notice or declaration by them made and given contrary thereto or in any wise limiting such liability notwithstanding."

The exceptions are overruled, and the judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

STATE v. WASHINGTON.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. April 9, 1909.)

1. JURY (§ 67*)—SUMMONING JURORS—VENIRE.

The venire to the sheriff commanded him, in the name of the state, to serve upon certain persons named *36 men, whom he should immediately summon to appear before the common pleas court. Held that the writ was not fatally defective for the omission, at the place marked with an asterisk, of the words "jury commissioners of the county, this writ of venire requiring them, the said jury commissioners, to draw and annex to the panel of this writ as provided by law the names of."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Jury, Cent. Dig. § 295; Dec. Dig. § 67.*]

2. JURY (§ 67*)—SUMMONING—WRIT OF VENIRE—CONSTRUCTION—"NEXT."

The word "next," in a writ of venire issued June 12, 1908, commanding the sheriff to serve the writ upon the jury commissioners, and requiring them to summon the jurors to appear before the common pleas court held on the 22d of June next, at 10 o'clock, etc., meant the next 22d day of June in that year, especially in view of the fact that the next term of the court after June 12th was June 22d (citing 5 Words & Phrases, p. 4795).

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Jury, Dec. Dig. § 67.*]

3. JURY (§ 67*)—SUMMONING JURORS—ISSUANCE OF WRIT OF VENIRE—TIME.

Under Civ. Code 1902, § 2930, requiring the jury commissioners to draw jurors in Greenwood county not less than 10 or more than 20 days before the first day of each week of any term of the court, where the next regular term of court for Greenwood county was on June 22d, the venire was properly issued on June 12th, when the jurors were drawn.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Jury, Dec. Dig. § 67.*]

4. JURY (§ 82*)—SUMMONING—EFFECT OF IRREGULARITIES—QUASHING VENIRE.

Statutes prescribing the time and manner of selecting jurors are merely directory, and venires will not be quashed for mere irregularities.

Appeal from General Sessions Circuit Court of Greenwood County; J. C. Klugh, Judge.

Marsh Washington was convicted of murder, and he appeals. Affirmed.

D. H. Magill, for appellant. R. A. Cooper, for the State.

JONES, J. The defendant, Marsh Washington, was convicted of murder, and sentenced to be hanged, at the June term, 1908, of the general sessions for Greenwood county, Hon. J. C. Klugh, presiding judge. Defendant's counsel, before sentence, moved in arrest of judgment on the ground that the venire facias for jurors was void, which motion was overruled, and this ruling is the only question for review.

The writ was as follows: "Venue. The State of South Carolina, to the Sheriff of Said County—Greeting: You are hereby strictly required and commanded to serve upon T. C. Turner, C. C. C. P., J. A. Marshall, treasurer, and J. D. Watson, auditor, esquires, 36 good and lawful men whom you shall immediately thereafter summons to be and appear before the court of common pleas and general sessions for the county aforesaid to be holden at Greenwood on the 22d day of June, next, at 10 o'clock in the forenoon, to serve as petit jurors. Herein fall not on the pain of the penalties that will fall thereon. Witness T. C. Turner, clerk of the said court, at Greenwood, this 12th day of June, A. D. 1908, and in the one hundred and 32 year of the sovereignty and independence of the United States of America. T. C. Turner, Clerk C. C. P. and G. S. [Seal.]" Then follows the list of the names of the jurors. The following is the certificate of the jury commissioners: "We, T. C. Turner, C. C. C. P., J. A. Marshall, treasurer, and J. D. Watson, auditor, jury commissioners for said county of —, state of South Carolina, certify that on the 12th day of June, A. D. 1908, the names in the panel above were drawn from the jury box, in accordance with the law in such case made and provided, and in obedience to the foregoing writ of venire facias. Done at Greenwood, this 12th day of June, A. D. 1908. T. C. Turner, C. C. C. P. J. D. Watson, Auditor. J. A. Marshall, Co. Treas." The following is the sheriff's return: "I solemnly swear that I have summoned each of the above-named jury by depositing in the post office a summons, sealed and directed to their post office with the letter, having a two-cent stamp on it. T. W. McMillan, S. G. C." This form of writ and certificate of jury commissioners is exactly like the form in use in many counties, except that between the word "esquires" and "36 good and lawful men" there was omitted the words "jury commissioners of the said county, this writ of venire requiring them, the said jury commissioners, to draw and annex to the panel of this writ as provided by law the names of."

The objections to the writ were (1) that the omission of said words was fatal; (2) that as the writ appears it commands the sheriff to do an impossible thing, viz., to serve upon the officers named 36 good and lawful men; (3) that it appears the writ did not issue 15 days before the commencement of the term of the court which rendered the verdict; (4) that the writ required summoning of jurors for June term, 1908, as the writ dated June 12, 1908, summoned jurors to attend at court to be held on the 22d day of June next; (5) that the defects were not cured by the certificate of the jury commissioners. We think the circuit court was correct in overruling the motion, and in holding that the writ is not void. It runs in the name of the state, is addressed to the sheriff under the seal of the court, is signed by the clerk of the court, and commands the sheriff to summon the persons named to attend the court of common pleas and general sessions as petit jurors at a proper time and place. The word "next" as used in the writ may fairly be construed as referring to the day of the month, and as meaning the next 22d day of June, at 10 o'clock in the forenoon. 5 Words and Phrases, 4795. This is especially true since the "next" ensuing regular term of court after the issuing of the writ was the fourth Monday (22d day) in June, 1908. Act Feb. 24, 1908, 25 St. at Large, p. 1016.

As to the objection that the clerk did not issue the writ of venire 15 days before the commencement of a regular term of court, as required by section 2913, Civ. Code 1902, it is sufficient to say that Greenwood county falls within the provision of section 2930, Civ. Code 1902, which provides for the drawing of jurors by the jury commissioners not less than 10 nor more than 20 days before the first day of each week of any regular or special term of the circuit court, and the clerk of the court is required to issue the venire immediately after such drawing. As the drawing of the jurors took place on the 12th day of June, and the writ of venire was issued on that day, the time was not less than 10 days before the court, which commenced on the 22d day of June. The existence of the special provision for Greenwood county no doubt accounts for the attempt to correct the printed form framed to meet the requirements of sections 2913 and 2914, which contemplated that the clerk of the court should issue the writ of venire, and have it served on the jury commissioners, previous to the drawing of the jury by them. The writ was a substantial compliance with the provisions of section 2930.

We have attempted to show that the writ is not fatally defective in any of the particulars alleged. We might add that section 2947 provides: "No irregularity in any writ of venire facias or in the drawing, summoning, returning or impaneling of jurors, shall be sufficient to set aside the verdict, unless the party making the objection was injured by the irregularity, or unless the objection was made before the returning of the verdict." There is no showing that the objections urged could not have been made before the returning of the verdict, by the exercise of due diligence, and no showing that the jurors drawn were not good and lawful men, and no showing that appellant was in any way injured by the alleged irregularities. Statutes prescribing the time and manner of selecting jurors are usually regarded as directory merely, and venires will not be quashed for mere irregularities. State v. Smalls, 73 S. C. 519, 53 S. E. 976, and cases cited; Hutto v. Railway, 75 S. C. 296, 55 S. E. 445; State v. Smith, 77 S. C. 251, 57 S. E. 868.

The judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

JUSTICES OF THE PEACE (§ 166*)—APPEAL—DISMISSAL.

Under Code Civ. Proc. 1902, § 368, providing that an appeal from a magistrate's court, if not brought to hearing before the end of the second term, shall be dismissed unless continued for cause shown, an appeal which has never been called for trial or continued by either party should not be dismissed summarily without an opportunity by appellant to be heard.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of York County; R. C. Watts, Judge.

Action by the York Supply Company against the Southern Railway Company. From an order dismissing an appeal from the magistrate's court, defendant appeals. Reversed.

C. E. Spencer, for appellant. W. W. Lewis, for respondent.

JONES, J. This is an appeal from an order of the circuit court dismissing an appeal from a judgment in a magistrate's court in favor of plaintiff against defendant for $51.27, for want of prosecution, under section 368, Code Civ. Proc. 1902. The appeal was duly docketed on calendar 2 of the common pleas for York county for April term, 1907, and the cause remained on the calendar until February term, 1908. The record fails to show, and it was not otherwise made to appear, that up to that time any disposition had been made of the appeal, or that the case was called for trial by either party at the second term or subsequently, or that any special order for cause was passed continuing the same. At the February term, 1908, on the last day of the term, plaintiff moved to dismiss the appeal for want of prosecution, and the motion was granted notwithstanding the fact that appellant announced itself ready for trial; the court remarking that he had no discretion in the matter. The order of dismissal recited that the cause had been docketed for four terms, and that no continuance or other disposition of the matter had been had.

The statute regulating this matter is section 368 of the Code of Civil Procedure of 1902, which provides: "If a return be made, the appeal may be brought to a hearing by either party. It shall be placed upon the calendar, and continue thereon until finally disposed of. But if neither party bring it to a hearing before the end of the second term, the court shall dismiss the appeal, unless it continue the same by special order, for cause shown. At least eight days before the court, the party desiring to bring on the appeal shall file the return and accompanying papers, if any, with the clerk, and the clerk shall thereupon enter the cause upon the calendar, according to the date of the return, and it shall stand for trial without any further notice." This statute was construed in Manuel v. Loveless, 54 S. C. 348, 32 S. E. 421, and it was declared that, whenever the circuit court is moved to dismiss an appeal at or after the second term, to justify dismissal, it must appear that the case was called for trial at the second term or some subsequent term, and that neither party, after such opportunity to be heard, brought it to a hearing or had it continued for cause shown. In this cause it did not appear that the case had ever been called for trial by the court until the term it was summarily dismissed for want of prosecution. The statute never contemplated a summary dismissal without an opportunity to be heard. The usual and orderly way for the court to give such opportunity is to call the docket of cases. With a view to enforce the statute, it might be well for the court, after calling the docket, to make some entry therein indicating that the case had been called, and what disposition was made of it, so that the foundation for a summary dismissal may be properly evidenced. The court will not indulge a presumption that cases on appeal from magistrate's courts were called at the second term and opportunity presented for a hearing.

In Bell v. Pruitt, 51 S. C. 344, 29 S. E. 5, opportunity for hearing was given before dismissal for want of prosecution, and the order was sustained. In Manuel v. Loveless, 54 S. C. 348, 32 S. E. 421, a refusal to dismiss was sustained because the case was not called for trial until the fourth term, when it was continued for cause.

The judgment of the circuit court is reversed.

GRANT v. CITY COUNCIL OF CHARLESTON.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. April 9, 1909.)

INJUNCTION (§ 157*)—PRELIMINARY INJUNCTION—ISSUANCE OF ORDER AGAINST PLAINTIFF.

Plaintiff having sought an injunction against the collection of inspection fees imposed by a city ordinance requiring the inspection of fresh meats sold in the city, the right to require payment of such fees being denied by the plaintiff, a temporary injunction requiring him to close up his business pending the litigation, instead of restraining the collection of the fees upon the giving of the usual injunction bond to secure the city against loss, was improper, as being beyond the scope of the issues, and unnecessary for the preservation of the city's right to require inspection which was not disputed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Injunction, Cent. Dig. § 340; Dec. Dig. § 157.*]

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Charleston County.

Action by Thomas L. Grant against the City Council of Charleston. From an order granting a temporary injunction, plaintiff appeals. Modified.

J. C. Miller and N. B. Barnwell, for appellant. Geo. H. Moffet, for respondent.

WOODS, J. On 23d February, 1904, the following ordinance was passed by the city council of Charleston:

"An ordinance to provide for the payment of the cost of inspecting fresh meat outside of the city market: Whereas the preservation of the health of the community demands that there shall be daily inspection of fresh meat sold throughout the city, and said daily inspection is attended by expenses on the part of the city, and it is desired that the city be compensated for such extra labor and expenses,

"Be it ordained by the mayor and aldermen of the city council of Charleston, S. C., in council assembled:

"Section 1. That green grocers and other persons selling fresh meat outside of the city market shall pay to the city treasurer on or before the first day of March, 1904, the sum of $57.20 as a compensation for such inspection by the city officials for the year 1904. That any person or corporation failing to pay this sum to the city treasurer shall be liable to a forfeiture of his license and be subject to a penalty of $100, or imprisonment not exceeding thirty days.

"Sec. 2. That all ordinances or parts of ordinances, the provisions of which are in conflict or inconsistent with this ordinance, are hereby repealed."

The plaintiff, a green grocer doing business outside of the city market, was arrested and held to bail for his appearance before the police court of the city of Charleston on the charge of failing to pay the inspection fee of $57.20. Thereupon he instituted this action to enjoin the enforcement of the ordinance, alleging it to be void on these grounds: (a) Because the entire expense of inspecting meats, both in and outside of the city market, was placed on green grocers outside of the city market alone; (b) because it violated section 6, art. 8, of the Constitution of South Carolina, as to taxes and licenses imposed by municipalities; (c) because the city was without power under its charter to enact such an ordinance; (d) because it limited and abridged rights already granted, in violation of the city's charter; (e) because it violated section 5, art. 1, of the Constitution of South Carolina, and the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States, first, in that it provided for the forfeiture of his licenses without refunding the sums paid by him to the city for the same, and, secondly, in that, while purporting to be a police measure for the preservation of the health of the city, it was, in effect and reality, simply a measure for increasing the revenue of the city market, and for defraying the current expenses. On hearing the complaint and affidavit of the plaintiff Judge Dantzler made an order requiring the city council of Charleston to show cause why it should not be enjoined from enforcing the ordinance until the trial of the cause, and restraining the city council from any further proceeding for enforcement until the hearing of the return. Thereafter, on 22d December, 1904, on hearing the return, Judge Dantzler made this order: "That until the hearing of this cause upon its merits the defendant, the city council of Charleston, S. C., be restrained and enjoined from enforcing against T. L. Grant the provisions of an ordinance passed by defendant on 23d February, 1904, and that the plaintiff, T. L. Grant, be enjoined and restrained from carrying on the business of a green grocer—that is, to say more particularly, selling meat in the city of Charleston—until he has complied with the provisions of the said ordinance." The plaintiff appeals, alleging error in the portion of the order which enjoins him from carrying on his business as a green grocer.

The inference must be that the circuit judge reached the conclusion that the reasons for assailing the ordinance were of sufficient importance to require an injunction against its enforcement until the cause could be heard on its merits; for, if he had not reached that conclusion, he would not have granted any injunction. The city council has not appealed, and therefore this court cannot review the conclusion of the circuit judge that a prima facie cause had been made, showing the necessity of interference of the court by injunction, in order to protect the plaintiff from irreparable injury. The sole question, then, is whether under the pleadings and affidavit there was any ground for enjoining the plaintiff from "carrying on the business of green grocer—that is, to say more particularly, selling meat in the city of Charleston, until he has complied with the provisions of the said ordinance." No doubt, this provision of the order was inserted with the view of protecting the health of the people of the city during the progress of the litigation. But in deciding the point at issue, it is important to observe that the plaintiff does not deny the right of the city council to have inspected the meat offered by him for sale. Indeed the power and duty of the city council to have such inspection is too clear to be questioned. The foundation of the action is the denial of the right, asserted by the city council, to require the plaintiff to pay the sum of $57.20 as a fee for such inspection; and the relief sought is an injunction, not against the inspection, but against the collection of the inspection charge. The temporary injunction, therefore, could not prevent the inspection of the meat offered for sale, and therefore could not imperil the health of any of the citizens, or interfere in any manner with the city government, except to the extent of withholding from the city treasury the fee of $57.20 per annum pending the litigation. The requirement that the plaintiff should close up his business during the litigation was, therefore, not only beyond the scope of the pleadings, but entirely unnecessary to the protection of the health of the city or the preservation of the rights claimed by the city council. Evidently the ultimate loss of the inspection fees was the only risk to which the city council or the municipal public could be subjected from the order of injunction in favor of the plaintiff; and the city council would have been made secure against this risk by the insertion in the order of the usual statutory requirement for an injunction undertaking to be given by the plaintiff.

The judgment of this court is that the order of injunction appealed from be modified by striking out so much thereof as enjoins the plaintiff, and by providing that, until the hearing of the cause on its merits, the city council of Charleston, S. C., be enjoined from enforcing against T. L. Grant the collection of the inspection fees provided for by the ordinance of 23d February, 1904, upon the plaintiff, T. L. Grant, entering into an undertaking, with one or more sureties, to be approved by the clerk of the court of common pleas for Charleston county, to the effect that he will pay to the city council of Charleston such damages, not exceeding $500, as the city council of Charleston may sustain by reason of the injunction, if the court shall finally decide that the said T. L. Grant is not entitled thereto.

ENGLISH v. McDOWALL.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. April 9, 1909.)

LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 298*)—SUMMARY PROCEEDINGS TO RECOVER POSSESSION — RIGHT TO MAINTAIN.

A landlord cannot, while retaining a check sent him by the tenant for the rent due, institute summary proceedings, under Civ. Code 1902, § 2423, to dispossess the tenant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Landlord and Tenant, Cent. Dig. §§ 1276-1278; Dec. Dig. § 298.*]

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Kershaw County; Ernest Gary, Judge.

Proceedings in a magistrate's court, under Civ. Code 1902, § 2423, by C. N. English as landlord to eject J. D. McDowall as his tenant. A warrant of ejectment was issued by the magistrate, but the circuit court on appeal reversed his judgment, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

B. B. Clarke, for appellant. Kirkland & Smith, for respondent.

WOODS, J. This proceeding was instituted under section 2423 of the Civil Code of 1902, by C. N. English, as landlord, to eject J. D. McDowall, as his tenant, from a house and lot in Camden, on the allegation that rent to the amount of $25 was due and unpaid. The magistrate, after hearing evidence on both sides, issued the warrant of ejectment, but the circuit court on appeal reversed the judgment of the magistrate, saying in the decree: "Upon full consideration of the case I find that, at the time the proceedings were instituted, the defendant had sent to the plaintiff a check for the rent alleged to be due. The plaintiff received this check, and held the same until it was put in evidence by the plaintiff in the proceedings of ejectment. Under these circumstances I hold, as a matter of law, that the plaintiff could not retain this check and maintain the proceedings which he sought under the provisions of the section of the statute invoked. He would be estopped, and the magistrate was in error in not so holding." The evidence of English, the landlord, was to the effect that McDowall contracted to pay as rent $125 per annum, in equal monthly installments in advance, and that he should have the option to purchase the property by May 1st, that McDowall told him just before May 1st he was trying to get the money from a building and loan association to pay the purchase money of the property, and that he himself was silent as to awaiting the result of McDowall's application, but that he did not demand possession. On May 28th McDowall sent English a check for $19.85, stating the same to be in full of the rent due for April and May, after deducting $1 for repairs on fence. English received the check, and, without returning it, on May 29th instituted this proceeding to eject McDowall. It was not until the trial that the check was tendered back, and then it was received and used by the respondent as evidence. The landlord testified on cross-examination, if he had not had an opportunity to sell the property, he would have presented the check for payment. The landlord was not obliged to accept the check as payment, but his retention of it was evidence that he accepted it as payment of the rent for April and May, on condition that it would be paid on presentation to the bank on which it was drawn, and that he assumed the obligation to present it within a reasonable time. The retention of the check was also evidence of an obligation assumed by the landlord to accept payment of the past-due rent, and not to insist on the right of ejectment for nonpayment for the months of April and May, if the check should be paid when presented at the bank. Therefore he could not legally institute ejectment proceedings while he retained the check.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

SEVIER v. SOUTHERN RY. CO.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. April 9, 1909.)

1. PLEADING (§ 248*)—AMENDMENTS—CHANGING CAUSE OF ACTION.

Where the complaint alleged that defendant negligently failed to stop a train at a station long enough for plaintiff, a passenger, to alight safely, and "negligently, * * * while plaintiff was endeavoring to get off the car, moved the same rapidly forward, causing plaintiff to fall," etc., and plaintiff's testimony was that the train did not stop a sufficient time to permit her to alight, and that while she was attempting to do so while the train was slowly moving she fell and was injured, an amendment substituting for the quoted words the words, "Defendant negligently started the car from the station before plaintiff had time to alight therefrom, and after defendant started the same and while it was moving slowly, plaintiff attempted to alight, and fell to the ground, defendant thus causing plaintiff to fall," etc., did not substantially change plaintiff's claim, and was proper under Code Civ. Proc. 1902, § 194.

2. CARRIERS (§ 347*)—INJURIES TO PASSENGER ALIGHTING FROM MOVING TRAIN—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—QUESTION FOR JURY.

It is not contributory negligence in law for a passenger to alight from a slowly moving train.

3. CARRIERS (§ 347*)—INJURIES TO PASSENGER ALIGHTING FROM MOVING TRAIN—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—QUESTIONS FOR JURY.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Greenville County; Geo. E. Prince, Judge.

Action by Elizabeth M. Sevier against the Southern Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Cothran, Dean & Cothran, for appellant. B. M. Shuman, for respondent.

JONES, J. Plaintiff recovered judgment against defendant for $500 for personal injuries alleged to have been sustained by her while a passenger on defendant's train from Spartanburg to Campobella on August 1, 1906. The plaintiff went to trial upon a complaint, in part alleging that defendant's servants, upon arrival of the train at said station, negligently, willfully, and recklessly failed to stop the train long enough for plaintiff to alight in safety, and "negligently, willfully, and recklessly, while plaintiff was endeavoring to get off of said car at said station, moved and caused the same to move rapidly forward and onward, thus causing plaintiff to fall and be thrown violently from said car to the ground." At the close of all the testimony, defendant moved to direct a verdict (1) because there was no evidence of willfulness to support punitive damages (as the court directed the jury not to find punitive damages this ground goes out of the case); (2) because there was no evidence to sustain the cause of action alleged in the complaint; (3) because the testimony shows conclusively that plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence in alighting from the moving train. Plaintiff moved to amend the complaint to conform to the facts proved, and the court granted an amendment striking out the words which we have quoted above, and inserting in lieu the words: "Defendant negligently started said car from said station before plaintiff had time to alight therefrom, and after defendant started the same, and while it was moving slowly, plaintiff attempted to alight therefrom, and fell violently to the ground from said car, defendant thus causing plaintiff to fall and be thrown violently from said car to the ground." The testimony for plaintiff tended to show that the train did not stop a sufficient time to permit plaintiff to alight, and that, when attempting to do so while the train was slowly moving forward, she fell to the ground, and was injured. We do not think that the amendment allowed substantially changed the claim of plaintiff, and therefore it was expressly permitted by section 194, Code Civ. Proc. 1902; Booth v. Langley Co., 51 S. C. 412, 29 S. E. 204; Roundtree v. Railway, 72 S. C. 478, 52 S. E. 231. Section 190 of the Code provides no variance between the allegation in a pleading and the proof shall be deemed material, unless it has actually misled the adverse party to his prejudice, and it appears that counsel for defendant upon the motion to direct a verdict stated that he had not been misled by the variance. The first and third exceptions therefore cannot be sustained.

Defendant's second, and remaining, exception, contends that the evidence warrants no other inference than that plaintiff negligently contributed to her injury by alighting from a moving train under circumstances making it obviously dangerous to do so. According to the testimony for plaintiff, the train was moving slowly, not over two miles per hour, and a witness for the defendant testified that the train had not moved more than the length of a car when plaintiff alighted. The authorities in this state hold it is not contributory negligence in law for a passenger to alight from a slowly moving train. Cooper v. Railway Co., 56 S. C. 94, 34 S. E. 16; Creech v. Railway, 66 S. C. 533, 45 S. E. 86. The rule is thus stated in Gyles v. Railway, 79 S. C. 177, 60 S. E. 433: "The rule of law declared in this state is that it is not negligence per se to board or alight from a moving train, unless the train is moving so fast as to make the danger of alighting or boarding obvious to a person of ordinary prudence, and that ordinarily it should be left to the jury to determine whether the passenger's act is negligent under the circumstances." If, however, it be admitted or conclusively shown that the speed of the train is high and dangerous, it is contributory negligence in law to alight therefrom; the danger being obvious to a person of ordinary prudence. Smith v. Southern Railway, 80 S. C. 1, 61 S. E. 205. Under these authorities, the matter of contributory negligence was properly submitted to the jury.

The judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

COUSAR MERCANTILE CO. v. SOUTHERN RY. CO.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. April 9, 1909.)

1. CARRIERS (§ 20*)—CARRIAGE OF GOODS—LOSS OF GOODS—PENALTIES—CONSTRUCTION OF STATUTE.

The act of 1903 (24 St. at Large, p. 81) provides that a claim for loss of or damage to property while in possession of a carrier shall be adjusted and paid within 90 days, in case of shipments from without the state, after the filing of the claim, and that the carrier shall be liable for the amount of such loss or damage with interest from the date of filing of claim until payment thereof, and for failure to adjust and pay the claim within the prescribed time shall be subject to a penalty to be recovered by the consignee, provided that, unless the consignee recover the full amount claimed, no penalty shall be recovered, but only the actual amount of loss or damage, with interest. Held, that, to recover under the statute, a consignee must show loss of or damage to the specific goods as distinguished from damage to him for delay in transportation, and, if the goods were delivered after the claim was filed and before expiration of the time for adjustment, they could not be treated as lost.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Dec. Dig. § 20.*]

2. CARRIERS (§ 20*)—CARRIAGE OF GOODS—LOSS OF GOODS—PENALTIES.

Under the act of 1903 (24 St. at Large, p. 81), allowing recovery for loss or damage, if the claim be filed for loss of goods and the proof show only damage thereto or vice versa, the court may allow recovery for whatever loss or damage be established, but, to recover the penalty, recovery must be had for the amount of the claim as filed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Dec. Dig. § 20.*]

3. CARRIERS (§ 20*)—CARRIAGE OF GOODS—DELAY IN DELIVERY—PENALTIES.

The act of 1904 (24 St. at Large, p. 671), to prevent delays in transportation of freight by railroads, provides a remedy, with a penalty, for delay in transportation, the act having no application to loss of or damage to the goods.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Dec. Dig. § 20.*]

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Chester County; John S. Wilson, Judge.

Action by the Cousar Mercantile Company against the Southern Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Abney & Miller and J. E. McDonald, for appellant. A. L. Gaston, for respondent.

JONES, J. The plaintiff recovered judgment against defendant for $80.84, for the value of a shipment of freight alleged to have been lost and $50 penalty for failure to adjust the claim filed for said loss within 90 days. It appeared that the freight was delivered to the defendant at South Boston, Va., on December 12, 1906, for delivery to the plaintiff, consignee, at Chester, S. C. The goods not having arrived by January 2, 1907, plaintiff on that day filed its claim as for lost goods valued at $80.84. There was some evidence that such a delay was unusual and unreasonable. The plaintiff's testimony was to the effect that notice of the arrival of the goods at Chester, S. C., was given plaintiff on February 19, 1907, and that plaintiff declined to receive the goods at full value; the goods being heavy winter dry goods. There was no evidence that the goods had been damaged in any way. The packages were not broken. The goods were not examined. John G. Cousar, secretary and treasurer of the plaintiff corporation, testified that plaintiff was liable for the price of the goods, and was "aggrieved" by the nondelivery of the goods $80.84, their value. A motion for nonsuit was made on the grounds (1) that no case under the statute had been made out; (2) that it appears from the undisputed testimony that the claim was filed for the loss of the goods, and that the goods were not lost, and that recovery for the penalty can be had only in case of loss of or damage to freight; (3) that the testimony shows that plaintiff as consignee has not been injured or aggrieved. The motion was overruled, and defendant excepts.

The terms of the penalty statute material to the issue are: "Sec. 2. That every claim for loss of or for damage to property while in possession of such common carrier shall be adjusted and paid within forty days, in case of shipments wholly within this state, and within ninety days, in case of shipments from without this state, after the filing of such claim with the agent of such carrier at the point of destination of such shipment: Provided, that no such claim shall be filed until after the arrival of the shipment, or of some part thereof, at the point of destination, or until after the lapse of a reasonable time for the arrival thereof. In every case such common carrier shall be liable for the amount of such loss or damage, together with interest thereon from the date of the filing of the claim therefor, until the payment thereof. Failure to adjust and pay such claim within the periods respectively herein prescribed shall subject each common carrier so failing to a penalty of fifty dollars for each and every such failure, to be recovered by any consignee or consignees aggrieved in any court of competent jurisdiction: Provided, that unless such consignee or consignees recover in such action the full amount claimed, no penalty shall be recovered, but only the actual amount of the loss or damage with interest as aforesaid. * * *" In order to recover under this statute, plaintiff must show loss of, or damage to, the specific freight as distinguished from damage to plaintiff in consequence of delay in its transportation. For delay in transportation, the act of 1904 (24 St. at Large, p. 671) provides a remedy with penalty, and it has been declared that such statute has no reference to loss of or damage to freight. Macon v. Southern Ry. Co., 81 S. C. 168, 62 S. E. 6. On the other hand, it has been declared that the act of 1903 (24 St. at Large, p. 81), the statute in question, provides for the adjustment of claims for loss of or damage to freight, and does not cover claim for delay in transportation. Moody v. Railway Co., 79 S. C. 300, 60 S. E. 711. This last case shows that, notwithstanding the delay, the plaintiff was bound to receive the goods, and that the carrier's liability was to compensate for the damages growing out of the delay, but not for loss; the court citing Nettles v. Railroad Co., 7 Rich. Law, 190, 62 Am. Dec. 409, and other cases. The penalty statute does not abrogate this well-established rule of law. The statute allows recovery for loss or damage, and, if the claim were filed for loss of freight and the proof showed only damage to freight, or vice versa, the court might not turn the plaintiff out, but might allow recovery for whatever loss of freight or damage to freight was established. But, in order to recover the penalty, it would be necessary to recover for loss or damage the amount of the claim as filed.

It appearing that there was no loss of freight, and, there being no testimony of any damage to the specific freight, nonsuit should have been granted. It is true there was testimony that the goods were seasonable goods, heavy winter dry goods, and that while shipped December 12, 1906, were not tendered until February 19, 1907, when the winter season had far advanced, but the goods were intact, and not shown to have been damaged in the least. It is true, also, that Mr. John G. Cousar testified that plaintiff was "aggrieved" to the amount of $80.84, the value of the goods, because of the nondelivery, but this merely meant that such was his estimate of the damages resulting from delay in shipment under the mistaken theory that plaintiff could treat the goods as lost. It was impossible for the jury on the testimony to conclude that the goods had been damaged to the full extent of their value.

After the refusal of the nonsuit, defendant offered testimony tending to show that the goods arrived at Chester, S. C., on January 5, 1907, a few days after the filing of the claim for their loss, and were immediately tendered to plaintiff, with a suggestion that claim be filed for delay in shipment, and that plaintiff declined to receive the goods. There was some testimony that the delay was due to a congestion of freight at all transfer points in the rush of business preceding the Christmas holidays. Defendant's counsel made requests for instruction to the jury in accordance with the view announced by this court above in discussing the motion for nonsuit, viz., in substance, that no recovery could be had under the statute upon proof of a delay in transportation, but that it must appear that there was loss of or damage to the freight. The court, however, instructed the jury that, if the claim for loss was filed after the lapse of a reasonable time for the arrival of the goods, it was filed in accordance with the statute, and that a tender of the goods thereafter would not prevent plaintiff from treating the goods as lost. This we think was error which would justify reversal, even if we were wrong in the view that there was no proof of loss of or damage to the freight. We adhere to the rule declared in Moody v. Railway, supra, and it follows there can be no recovery for loss of freight upon evidence that the freight had been tendered and refused, certainly if tendered before the expiration of the time allowed by statute for adjustment. Whether a different rule should prevail if tender is made after the expiration of the time allowed by statute for adjustment is not involved, and need not be discussed.

The judgment of the circuit court is reversed.

One, though prosecuting a claim against a decedent's estate, is not incompetent, under Code Civ. Proc. 1902, § 400, to testify to the transaction, which was not with decedent, but with his agent.

Even if W. be a trustee of an express trust as to money paid by P. to him on his agreement to pay it to a creditor of P., yet, on P. having notice from a statement of account by W. that W. had repudiated the trust by applying the money to P.'s debt to him, the statute of limitations commenced to run.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Barnwell County; R. W. Memminger, Judge.

Action by H. W. Montague, administrator of W. P. Wilcox, deceased, against Daniel R. Priester; the Bank of Barnwell intervening. From the judgment, plaintiff and defendant Priester appeal. Modified.

Q. L. Tobin and Bates & Simms, for appellants. Robert Aldrich, for respondent.

WOODS, J. In this case the plaintiff, H. W. Montague, administrator of the estate of W. P. Wilcox, and the defendant, Daniel R. Priester, both appeal from a decree of Judge Memminger for the foreclosure of a mortgage executed by Priester to Wilcox. The position relied on by counsel for Priester, the mortgagor, is that the mortgage was satisfied by a deed of conveyance of the mortgaged premises, made by Priester to Wilcox, the mortgagee, on the 18th January, 1905; and it is contended that the deed was adjudged to have that effect in the case of Wilcox v. Priester, 68 S. C. 106, 46 S. E. 553. The record in that case shows the position to be entirely untenable. There the action was brought by the heirs of Wilcox against Priester to recover possession of the land, in reliance on the deed from Priester to Wilcox now set up. Priester's defense to their claim was that he had executed the deed in consideration of a promise by Wilcox to satisfy his mortgage and to pay the remainder of the purchase price in cash, that Wilcox had breached his contract, and that thereupon he had "repudiated the transaction." On the issue made by this defense, the jury found a verdict in Priester's favor for the land in dispute, and the judgment on the verdict was affirmed by this court. The mortgagor having elected to repudiate his deed and to rescind the entire contract under which the mortgage was to be canceled, and on that election having succeeded in annulling the contract and in retaining the land, it is quite clear he cannot now set up the repudiated and rescinded contract to defeat the mortgage. He cannot have the benefit of a rescission of the contract and also of its enforcement. For the same reason, the mortgagor cannot allege the mortgage was canceled by being merged in the deed. When the deed fell by reason of the mortgagor's repudiation of it, all its incidents fell with it.

The respondent, Bank of Barnwell, intervened in this action for foreclosure, and as assignee set up a senior mortgage on the land, executed by Priester to Charles Pechman, alleging a balance of $100 and interest to be due thereon. The defendant Priester by formal plea alleged against the bank's mortgage that Wilcox, the holder of the junior mortgage, had agreed with him to pay the $100 due, that he had paid Wilcox that amount to be applied to the bank's mortgage, "and that the said Wilcox did pay the said Bank of Barnwell, or should have done so." The plaintiff, as administrator of the estate of Wilcox, replied to the matters alleged by the Bank of Barnwell and the defendant Priester by a general denial and by the allegation that "the said claim as against the estate of Wilcox did not accrue within six years prior to the commencement of the action." The president of the bank testified that, after several payments had been made on the mortgage, the officers of the bank made the mistake of supposing the mortgage fully paid, and so on November 3, 1891, surrendered it to Priester, marked "Paid"; but that very soon afterwards they discovered that there was a balance of $100 due, and notified Priester of the mistake. He testified further that the claim of the bank was for $100 principal and interest thereon at 8 per cent., together with attorney's commissions of 10 per cent. on the whole sum due. The bank amended its pleadings to conform to this proof. The defendant Priester then set up additional defenses, as follows: "First, it being alleged by the said defendant that the alleged mistake was made by it and without fault of the defendant Priester, no interest or attorney's commission can be charged on said mistake to this defendant; second, that the said alleged mistake having occurred more than six years before the filing of this action by the defendant the Bank of Barnwell, and more than 10 years from the said action taken by the Bank of Barnwell, and said mistake having been known to said Bank of Barnwell more than 6 years and more than 10 years from its alleged making, the remedying of said mistake at this time is barred by the statute of limitations." The mortgage to Pechman was then introduced, and, though it is not printed in the record, it seems to be conceded that it provided for 8 per cent. interest and 10 per cent. attorney's fees. The indorsement on the mortgage and its surrender to the mortgagor was nothing more than a receipt in full of the mortgage debt. A third party who had been misled by such a receipt might possibly set it up as conclusive. But between the original parties a receipt is not conclusive evidence of payment. Daniels v. Moses, 12 S. C. 130; Park v. So. Ry. Co., 78 S. C. 302, 58 S. E. 931. The fact that the receipt was placed on the mortgage makes no difference. 2 Jones on Mortgages, § 918. The Bank of Barnwell therefore is enforcing its original mortgage which had not been paid, and as 20 years from its date had not elapsed, it was not barred by the statute of limitations, and was enforceable as a lien on the land, for the amount of principal and interest and attorney's fees according to its terms.

The remaining question is whether the circuit court erred in granting to Priester the relief of requiring Montague, as administrator of the estate of Wilcox, to satisfy the balance due on the bank's mortgage. The testimony of Priester was that H. W. Montague was Wilcox's "head man" in the conduct of his business, that in the course of business Montague paid out and received money for Wilcox, and that he paid to Montague for Wilcox the sum of $100 which Montague for Wilcox received with the promise to pay it in satisfaction of the balance due on the bank mortgage. This testimony was all objected to by the attorney for the plaintiff on the ground that it was incompetent under section 400 of the Code of Civil Procedure of 1902. The objection seems quite groundless, for while Wilcox is dead, and Priester is prosecuting this claim against his estate, the transaction and communication to which Priester testified was with Montague, not Wilcox.

But assuming Priester's testimony to be true, his claim that Wilcox's estate should be required to discharge the bank mortgage is barred by the statute of limitations. He introduced the following, furnished him by Wilcox as an account of their transactions, and testified that the $100 which was to be paid on the bank mortgage is that mentioned in the first credit to him:

Allendale, S. C., Jan. 18-95.

Mr. D. R. Priester, in Account with W. P. Wilcox.
To balance of account 1893 and interest.....	$480 25
" " " N. & M. of Jan. 20-93.....	113 53
" " " N. & M. of Jan. 28-93.....	251 05
" " " N. & M. of July 10-91.....	29 81
	<hr/> $874 63

Or.

By amount in sale of John Bradley tract....	$100 00
By one (12-horse) boiler, one (16-horse) engine, one gin sprinkler, one 50-saw gin, 1 steam cotton press.....	774 63

There is no evidence that Priester ever made any objection to the credit of $100 on his general account with Wilcox, or demanded that it should be taken from the general account and paid to the bank. Thus the account introduced by Priester shows he has received the benefit of the $100, as a credit on his account with Wilcox. If it is now taken from that account, it is manifest there would be a balance due by Priester to Wilcox of $190, long since barred by the statute of limitations. Even regarding Wilcox the trustee of an express trust as to the $100 paid to Montague, Priester had notice from the above account, when he received it in 1895, that Wilcox had repudiated the trust by applying the $100 to his own debt. The statute began to run from that time, and Priester's demand that Wilcox or his administrator should apply the money to the bank's mortgage is barred by the statute of limitations. Boyd v. Munro, 82 S. C. 253, 10 S. E. 963.

The result is that the plaintiff, as the administrator of the estate of Wilcox, is not legally liable to Priester for the payment of the mortgage of the Bank of Barnwell, and that the proceeds of the sale of the mortgaged premises should be applied first to the payment of the balance of the $100, and interest at 8 per cent. from November 8, 1891, and 10 per cent. attorney's fees due to the Bank of Barnwell on its mortgage and then to the payment of the sum of $336.36, with interest thereon at the rate of 8 per cent. from November 15, 1892, found by the circuit judge to be due on the mortgage to Wilcox.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be modified accordingly.

3. CORPORATIONS (§ 493*)—TORTS—LIABILITY.

A railway company is liable for malicious slander of one employed by it as locomotive engineer, uttered by its general division superintendent within the scope of his authority, and in the discharge of his duties, though it does not appear that it ratified the slander.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Greenville County; J. C. Klugh, Judge.

Action by C. E. Hypes against the Southern Railway Company and another. From a judgment overruling a demurrer to the complaint, defendant the Southern Railway Company appeals. Affirmed.

Cothran, Dean & Cothran, for appellant.
J. J. McSwain, for respondent.

JONES, J. This is an action to recover damages, for alleged slander, against the defendant railway corporation and its general division superintendent. The defendant corporation interposed a demurrer to the complaint that it failed to state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, for the reason that a corporation cannot be held liable in damages for slander by one of its employees. The demurrer was overruled by Judge Klugh, and exception is now taken, in which it is contended that a corporation is not liable for slander uttered by one of its employees unless it affirmatively appear that such agent was expressly directed or authorized by the corporation to speak the words in question, of which there is no allegation in the complaint.

It appears that, some time previous to July 20, 1906, the plaintiff was a locomotive engineer of the defendant company, and at the end of May, 1906, turned in his time report showing the number of hours he had worked during the month. This claim was disallowed by defendant to the extent of $37. Plaintiff, after some correspondence, had an interview with P. L. McManus, the superintendent of the defendant corporation, in the division headquarters in Greenville, S. C., in which they took up the matter of plaintiff's unpaid time. In this interview it is alleged that McManus as superintendent declared in loud tones, in the hearing of several persons within the room, and referring to plaintiff, "I am going to stop you fellows from stealing from the company," and called plaintiff a "thief" several times. The complaint further alleged that a letter was immediately written to each of the defendants setting out the slander and demanding an apology, and that the letter was never acknowledged or answered, and that, after notice of the wrong, the defendant corporation by its silence and acquiescence has approved and ratified the conduct of its said superintendent. It was further alleged: "That the action of the said P. L. McManus in accusing plaintiff of 'stealing' and of being a 'thief' was done within the scope of his authority, and in the discharge of his duties as superintendent as such; that he was acting for the Southern Railway Company and for its interests, as indicated by his words, 'I am going to stop you fellows from stealing from the company'; that the tort against the plaintiff was committed in the office of the said superintendent, while going over the books, considering the question of plaintiff's time, which said P. L. McManus had full authority and power to settle; and, further, that the said defendant company has approved of the slander of its said agent and superintendent by failing to acknowledge said letter, and refusing to apologize to plaintiff for the insult offered him and the wrong and damage to his good name, and said injury was caused by the joint and concurrent act of the defendants." We think the demurrer was properly overruled.

It is established that corporations, as well as natural persons, are liable for the willful tort of an agent acting within the general scope of his employment, without previous express authority or subsequent ratification. Rucker v. Smoke, 37 S. C. 377, 16 S. E. 40, 34 Am. St. Rep. 758; Williams v. Tolbert, 76 S. C. 217, 56 S. E. 908; Schumpert v. Railway, 65 S. C. 332, 43 S. E. 813, 95 Am. St. Rep. 802; Gardner v. Railway, 65 S. C. 342, 43 S. E. 816; Riser v. Railway, 67 S. C. 419, 46 S. E. 47; Dagnall v. Railway, 69 S. C. 115, 48 S. E. 97; Fields v. Cotton Mills, 77 S. C. 549, 58 S. E. 608, 11 L. R. A. (N. S.) 822, 122 Am. St. Rep. 593. The old doctrine that a corporation, having no mind, cannot be liable for acts of agents involving malice has been completely exploded in modern jurisprudence. While a corporation is non-personal in its formal legal entity, it represents natural persons, and must necessarily perform its duties through natural persons as agents; hence must spring the correlative responsibility for the acts of its agents within the scope of their employment. The liability of a corporation for malicious libel published by its agent in the course of his employment is generally recognized. Philadelphia, etc., Ry. Co. v. Quigley, 21 How. 202, 16 L. Ed. 73; Johnson v. St. Louis Dispatch Co., 65 Mo. 539, 27 Am. Rep. 293; Bacon v. Michigan, etc., R. R. Co., 55 Mich. 224, 21 N. W. 324, 54 Am. Rep. 372; Maynard v. Fireman's Fund Ins. Co., 34 Cal. 48, 91 Am. Dec. 672; Fogg v. Boston, etc., R. R. Co., 148 Mass. 513, 20 N. E. 109, 12 Am. St. Rep. 583; Missouri Pacific Ry. v. Richmond, 73 Tex. 568, 11 S. W. 555, 4 L. R. A. 280, 15 Am. St. Rep. 794; 10 Cyc. 1215; 18 Ency. Law, 1058. We do not regard the distinction between written and unwritten slander to be of sufficient importance to warrant the application of a different rule. The written slander is not always or necessarily more public than the spoken; and if it may indicate more deliberation, and hence warrant more easily the inference of malice, the difference is merely in degree, not in kind. It may otherwise appear that the slander was willful, as in this case under the demurrer.

This view is supported by a recent decision by the Supreme Court of Mississippi (Rivers v. Yazoo & Mississippi Valley R. R. Co., 90 Miss. 196, 43 South. 471, 9 L. R. A. [N. S.] 931), which quotes from Lord Mansfield in Maloney v. Bartley, 3 Camp. 210, to the effect that there is no well-founded distinction between written and unwritten slander, and that the reasons given in the books for such a distinction are very insufficient. The Mississippi case held that a corporation is liable for slander spoken by its agent while acting within the scope of his employment, and in the actual performance of the duties of the corporation touching the matter in question, although it did not appear that the slanderous words were uttered and published with the knowledge, approval, consent, or ratification of the corporation. In the case of Singer Manufacturing Co. v. Taylor, 150 Ala. 574, 43 South. 210, 9 L. R. A. (N. S.) 929, the Supreme Court of Alabama held that, in the absence of contract relation between the master and the person slandered, the master is not liable for a slander uttered by his servant which the master does not authorize or ratify. In the case at bar the complaint shows a contract relation between the corporation and the person slandered, and that the slander was in reference to a matter growing out of such relation, a dispute as to the correctness of plaintiff's claim for wages, a matter within the duty of the agent to adjust. In the case of Behre v. National Cash Register Co., 100 Ga. 213, 27 S. E. 986, 62 Am. St. Rep. 320, the court held that, while a corporation may make a libelous publication, it is not liable for oral slander by one of its servants, though within the scope of the duties of the agency, unless it affirmatively appear that the agent was expressly authorized by the corporation to speak the slanderous words. The reason assigned for this conclusion is that there can be no agency in slander. We see no good ground for distinguishing slander from other willful torts in this regard. In 10 Cyc. 1216, it is stated that the liability of a corporation for oral slander seems to stand on a different footing, and that the corporation is exonerated unless it authorized, approved, or ratified the act of the agent. To support the text the only case cited is Redditt v. Singer Mfg. Co., 124 N. C. 100, 32 S. E. 292. An examination of that case, however, shows that a majority of the court were of the opinion that "a corporation is responsible for slanderous words uttered by its agents in the course and scope of such agents' employment, and in aid of the company's interest," but that under the circumstances of the case they concurred in holding the charge error because it excluded the right of possible justification. The case is really authority for our conclusion. The later case of Sawyer v. Norfolk & S. B. Co., 142 N. C. 1, 54 S. E. 793, 115 Am. St. Rep. 716, more fully shows the position of the North Carolina court. In that case the court was unanimous in holding that a corporation may be liable for slander committed by its agent, and that the test of liability depended upon the question whether injury was committed by the authority of the master expressly conferred, or fairly implied from the nature of the employment and the duties incident thereto. In applying the principles stated the court held that a corporation was not liable for slander by its superintendent against one voluntarily in its office, seeking employment which the superintendent was authorized to give, but which was refused, and then the superintendent slandered the person in regard to his former work for the company. In determining the question of implied authority the court considered, not only the relation between the corporation and its agent, but between the corporation and the person slandered, holding that at the time of the slander there was no special relation of duty between the corporation and the plaintiff. We have adverted to the fact that in the case at bar the special relation between the corporation and the plaintiff is shown. In the case of International Text-Book Co. v. Heartt, 136 Fed. 132, 69 C. C. A. 127, the slander was uttered by the agent after he had left plaintiff's premises, and gone to another locality where he was not engaged in the performance of any duty under the terms of his employment. Childs v. Bank, 17 Mo. 213, cited by appellant, held the early view, that a corporation is not capable of malice, but that conception is not now recognized in the law of Missouri, as appears by reference to Gillett v. Missouri Valley R. Co., 55 Mo. 315, 17 Am. Rep. 653, and Boogher v. Life Association, 75 Mo. 319, 42 Am. Rep. 413.

Our conclusion is that the complaint shows facts from which it may be inferred that the slander in question was uttered within the course and scope of the agent's employment, and under implied authority of the master. This view sustains the order overruling the demurrer, and it is unnecessary to consider whether the facts stated also show subsequent ratification of the alleged slander by the master.

The judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

BERLEY & KYZER v. COLUMBIA, N. & L. R. CO.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. April 9, 1909.)

1. CARRIERS (§ 134*)—CARRIAGE OF FREIGHT—ACTIONS FOR DAMAGES—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

In an action against a carrier for damages for freight injured, and for the statutory penalty for failure to pay the claim, evidence held to sustain a finding that the property was of no value after it was injured.

Since St. 1903, 24 St. at Large, p. 81, requiring that claims for damages to freight shall be presented to the agent at destination, does not provide for the place of payment, the carrier as the debtor must find the claimant and tender payment to him within the statutory period in order to avoid the penalty for nonpayment, but the carrier may require claimant to state where he desires payment to be made, when payment at that place within the required time will prevent the penalty from attaching.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Lexington County; J. W. De Vore, Judge.

Action by Berley & Kyzer against the Columbia, Newberry & Laurens Railroad Company. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appealed. Affirmed.

WOODS, J. The plaintiffs on November 15, 1906, filed with defendant's agent at Irmo, a station on defendant's railroad, a claim for $1.84 for 50 feet of iron piping, shipped from Columbia and consigned to the plaintiffs at Irmo. This action was brought for the amount of the claim and the statutory penalty of $50 for failure to adjust and pay the claim within 40 days from the date of filing it with the defendant. The judgment of the magistrate for the amount of the claim and penalty was affirmed by the circuit court.

The defendant first submits the point that the plaintiff could not recover $1.84, the entire amount of the claim, because the evidence for the plaintiff shows that the entire value of the piping was only $1.84; that it was not lost, but only injured; and that after the injury it was of some value. The plaintiff Kyzer testified the piping was so broken as to be of no value to him, though "it might have been worth something to somebody." This mere conjecture of value by the plaintiff does not warrant this court in holding there was no evidence to support the judgment of the magistrate that the piping was a complete loss, especially when it is considered that Hook, defendant's agent at Irmo, testified the defendant admitted and allowed the whole claim after investigation.

The defendant next contends the plaintiffs, at the expiration of the statutory period of 40 days allowed to the defendant to adjust and pay the claim, should have applied to the defendant's agent at Irmo for payment of the claim; and that, because of the failure of the plaintiffs to do so, this action for the penalty cannot be sustained. On this point Hook, the agent, testified: "Mr. Kyzer nor Mr. Berley has never been back to demand payment since the claim was filed. I would have paid Mr. Kyzer his claim in a week's time if he had called for it. I have been willing to pay it since that time. I have never refused to pay it. I have tried to locate them by mail. About a year ago I notified him that I could pay them. I wrote to them twice. I addressed them at Lexington, S. C., some time since Christmas. I received a letter from Berley & Kyzer (which) asked me the date and amount of the claim in question. I replied to the letter. I received a second letter from Berley & Kyzer. This letter is lost. To the best of my knowledge I burned it." On January 27, 1908, the agent sent a check through the mail for the amount of the claim, directing the letter to Lexington, S. C. On February 8, 1908, the plaintiff returned the check, refusing to accept the amount of the claim without the penalty. The general rule is that when the creditor is in the state, and no place of payment is fixed by law or the contract of the parties, the debtor must find the creditor and tender payment. 2 Parsons on Contracts, 751, note; 22 Am. & Eng. 533; 30 Cyc. 1185; Emlen v. Lehigh Coal & Navigation Co., 47

Pa. 76; 86 Am. Dec. note, 520. The statute of 1903 (24 St. at Large, p. 81) requires that the claim shall be presented to the agent at the point of destination, but it does not provide for the place of payment. The obligation, therefore, is on the carrier to find the claimant and tender payment to him within the period fixed by the statute.

It was earnestly pressed at the argument that the application of this rule to claims against carriers would impose upon them an oppressive and unreasonable burden on account of the difficulty of finding claimants who have no regular place of business or settled residence. But this hardship may be easily avoided. When a claim is presented, we think the carrier has the right to require the claimant to indicate where he desires payment to be made; and, of course, tender within the statutory period at that place will prevent the penalty from attaching.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

SIGWALD v. CITY BANK et al.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. April 9, 1909.)

1. CORPORATIONS (§ 206*)—SUIT BY STOCKHOLDERS IN BEHALF OF CORPORATION.

When directors or officers of a corporation have mismanaged the corporate property, the action for redress should usually be brought by the corporation, yet a stockholder may sue in his own name when an application for redress through corporate action would be obviously useless, and hence a stockholder's action will be permitted where the corporation is in a receiver's hands, so that application for redress could not be successfully made at a stockholder's meeting nor before the board of directors, who are themselves charged with mismanagement, and the receiver is one of the persons charged with wrongdoing, so that he would not and could not sue himself.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Dec. Dig. § 206.*]

2. RECEIVERS (§ 174*)—ACTIONS—LEAVE OF COURT TO SUE RECEIVERS.

If the absence of leave of the court appointing a receiver to sue him is a mere irregularity, and not jurisdictional, the leave may be given by the Supreme Court on appeal of the case.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Receivers, Dec. Dig. § 174.*]

3. RECEIVERS (§ 174*)—ACTIONS—LEAVE OF COURT TO SUE RECEIVER.

Where a stockholder's suit was brought nominally against a receiver of the corporation, but practically against the directors for mismanagement of corporation property, not to enforce any liability of the receiver as such, nor to recover or affect assets in the control of the court, but to augment the assets for distribution, so that a judgment against the receiver would not interfere with or embarrass the administration of the receiver's trust or give any advantage as against distributees, a failure to obtain leave to sue the receiver was not a jurisdictional defect.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Receivers, Cent. Dig. § 334; Dec. Dig. § 174.*]

4. CORPORATIONS (§ 320*)—ACTION BETWEEN STOCKHOLDER AND OFFICERS—NONJOINER OF DEFENDANTS—TORT-FEASORS.

The liability of one of several corporate directors who have mismanaged the corporate property is several as well as joint, and in a stockholder's suit for redress it is not necessary to join all the directors or their legal representatives.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Greenwood County; Geo. W. Gage, Judge.

Action by Lucy M. Sigwald against the City Bank and others. A demurrer to the complaint was overruled, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Grier & Park and Ellis G. Graydon, for appellants. Caldwell & Gaston, for respondent.

JONES, J. This appeal is from an order of Judge Gage overruling a demurrer to the complaint. The demurrer was based upon two grounds: (1) That plaintiff had not legal capacity to sue; (2) defect of parties defendant. The suit is by a stockholder of the City Bank of Greenwood, S. C., now insolvent and in the hands of a receiver, in behalf of herself and all other stockholders who shall come in, against the said bank and its directors, including James F. Davis, its president, who is also a receiver of the bank, charging gross negligence in the management of the bank to the loss of the stockholders, and demands an accounting by said directors. The complaint is quite lengthy, and we accept for the purpose of this appeal the following condensed statement of the material facts alleged as stated in the argument of appellants' counsel: (1) Plaintiff is a stockholder in City Bank. (2) The bank failed on May 20, 1903, and was placed in hands of receiver defendant James F. Davis on May 27, 1903, and is now in hands of said receiver. (3) The defendants Bailey, Marse, Tinsley, Klugh, and Davis were directors of the bank at the time of failure, and Davis was president. (4) Other persons than those defendants had been officers and directors of the bank at various times, during the period of time for which the defendants are asked to account, to wit, Jordan (who died December 7, 1901), Maxwell (who died July or August, 1899), Joel S. Bailey (who died September 3, 1900), and Barksdale (resigned, time not stated)—none of whom are parties to this action. (5) During this time certain statements were made by the officers of the bank showing the bank to be in good condition. (6) Dividends were paid regularly until the bank suspended. (7) Jordan, who is not a party, and Davis, who is, made returns for taxation showing the value of the capital stock to be above par. (8) That the assets of the bank will not pay stockholders over 25 per cent. of their holdings. (9) That Davis was elected a director and president, and was not the owner of stock in the bank, in violation of law. (10) That the directors never attended meetings of the board, and the defendant Davis was allowed to run the bank according to his own notions. (11) That during Jordan's presidency (who is not a party) and during Davis' presidency large unauthorized loans were made on insufficient security and on unrecorded mortgages of both real and personal property. (12) General charges of mismanagement, carelessness, and negligence on the part of the defendant directors, resulting in loss to the bank.

It is contended that plaintiff has no legal capacity to sue (1) because the alleged cause of action belongs to the corporation, and cannot be properly brought except by the receiver; (2) because the complaint fails to show that plaintiff obtained leave of the court to bring the action; (3) because the court, having appointed a receiver to manage the affairs of the corporation, should not grant plaintiff power to bring the action.

The general rule is that, when directors or officers of a corporation are charged with the mismanagement of the corporate property, the action to redress should be instituted by the corporation, but to this rule there is a well-established exception that a stockholder may be permitted to bring such action in his own name when it is apparent that an application for redress through corporate action would be useless. Latimer v. Railroad Co., 39 S. C. 44, 17 S. E. 258; Wenzel v. Brewing Co., 48 S. C. 80, 26 S. E. 1; Stahn v. Catawba Mills, 53 S. C. 523, 31 S. E. 498; Matthew v. Bank, 60 S. C. 183, 38 S. E. 437; Klugh v. Milling Co., 66 S. C. 106, 44 S. E. 566. Such is the situation in this case. The corporation is in the hands of a receiver, and therefore no application for redress could be successfully made at a meeting of stockholders or before the board of directors charged with mismanagement, and, as the receiver is one of the parties charged with wrongdoing, he would not and could not sue himself. The case is much like Brinckerhoff v. Bostwick, 88 N. Y. 52, wherein demurrer was overruled. Appellants contend plaintiff's only remedy was to have the receiver removed and a new one appointed who could be directed by the court to conduct the litigation. But the present suit is before the court which appointed the receiver, and the court may not care at this juncture to remove the receiver as no charges are made against him as such, and may consider that the ends of justice would as well be met by permitting the present action to continue with the receiver as a party defendant.

Judge Gage was of the opinion that such leave to maintain the action should now be given to plaintiff, and we see no want of power or impropriety in such determination, if the absence of previous leave is a mere irregularity and not jurisdictional. It will be observed that the suit is practically against the directors, and is not to enforce any liability of the receiver as such. It is not intended to recover or affect assets in the control of the court, but to augment the assets for distribution. Such considerations might well have moved the court to hold that leave to bring the action was unnecessary if the stockholders' right to sue was complete on the other ground mentioned. In Barton v. Barbour, Receiver, 104 U. S. 126, 26 L. Ed. 672, the court held that where the action was to recover specific property in the hands of the receiver, or a money judgment against the receiver, or generally where a judgment in the action would give the claimant some advantage over other claimants upon the assets in the receiver's hands, it was necessary to obtain leave to sue from the court appointing the receiver, and that failure to obtain such leave was jurisdictional; the suit being in the District of Columbia upon a cause of action arising in Virginia, where the receiver was appointed and the property situated. The distinction between that case and the one at bar is wide. There is considerable conflict among the authorities as to whether the failure to obtain leave to sue a receiver is jurisdictional. 17 Ency. Pl. & Pr. 776, 777. In 23 Ency. Law, 1125, cases are cited to support the text: "The failure to obtain leave to sue a receiver at law is not a jurisdictional omission, or a defense to the action, at least where there is no attempt to interfere with actual possession of property which the receiver holds under the order of the court of chancery. * * * Failure to obtain leave of court before suing a receiver is therefore merely an irregularity, which though punishable as a contempt may be cured or waived at any stage of the proceedings." We do not think the failure to obtain leave to sue the receiver in this case can be regarded a jurisdictional defect, since no assault is made on the receiver's possession, and no attempt is made which resulting in a judgment would interfere with or embarrass the administration of the receiver's trust or give any advantage as among distributees.

We agree, also, with the circuit court that there was no defect of parties defendant. The liability of a director for mismanagement of the corporate property is several as well as joint. The authorities generally hold that it is not necessary to join all the directors or their legal representatives in such a suit as this. 15 Ency. Pl. & Pr. 71; 10 Cyc. 826. The liability of a tort-feasor is both joint and several. Chanet v. Parker, 1 Mill, Const. 333; Gardner v. Railway Co., 65 S. C. 344, 43 S. E. 816.

The judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

HOLDEN v. ALEXANDER.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. April 13, 1909.)

On petition for rehearing. Denied.

For former opinion, see 62 S. E. 1108.

PER CURIAM. After careful consideration the court is of the opinion that no material question raised by the exception has been overlooked or disregarded and that there is no good ground for a rehearing of the case.

It is therefore ordered that the petition herein be dismissed, and that the order heretofore granted staying the remittitur be revoked.

GARY, A. J. (concurring). After careful consideration of the petition for a rehearing, I have reached the conclusion that it should be granted.

EASTERN MFG. CO. v. THOMAS, Sheriff.
(Supreme Court of South Carolina. May 4, 1906.)

EXEMPTIONS (§ 45*)—EXEMPTION OF PERSONAL PROPERTY INSTEAD OF HOMESTEAD — "TOOLS AND IMPLEMENTS OF TRADE"—AUTOMOBILE.

An automobile, not being a tool or an implement of trade, is not exempt from levy and attachment under 1 Civ. Code 1902, § 2631, as amended by the act approved February 20, 1904 (24 St. at Large, p. 412), exempting from attachment tools and implements of trade.

Petition by the Eastern Manufacturing Company for mandamus against W. W. Thomas, sheriff, to compel respondent to levy on certain property. Granted.

T. B. Butler, for petitioner.

PER CURIAM. This is an application for mandamus in the original jurisdiction of this court. The petitioners allege that the respondent as sheriff refuses to levy upon an automobile the property of one Walter Baker, with a proper execution in favor of petitioners. The return of the sheriff admits the allegations of the petition to be true, but says there is an apparent conflict between the statute and the Constitution with reference to homestead exemption for persons not the head of a family. While 1 Civ. Code 1902, § 2631, does appear to allow to such a person a homestead, not only in necessary wearing apparel and tools and implements of trade, but "other property," these words "or other property" have been stricken from the statute by an act of the General Assembly (24 St. at Large, p. 412) approved February 20, 1904. So there is no conflict between the Constitution and the statute, and, the petition having been admitted as true, it is the plain duty of the respondent, as sheriff, to make the levy as prayed for.

It is therefore ordered and adjudged the respondent do forthwith make the levy upon and enforce the petitioner's execution upon the said automobile of the said Walter Baker as it does not appear said automobile is a tool or an implement of trade, and is not exempt from levy and attachment under the homestead law to a person not the head of the family.

SUTTON v. SOUTHERN RY. CO. et al.
(Supreme Court of South Carolina. April 9, 1909.)

1. NEGLIGENCE (§ 119*)—PLEADING—EVIDENCE.

Under a complaint alleging negligence generally, plaintiff may introduce any competent evidence, in the absence of a motion to have the allegations made definite and certain, but, where the complaint alleges specific acts of negligence, plaintiff is restricted to proof of such acts.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Negligence, Cent. Dig. §§ 208, 208; Dec. Dig. § 119.*]

2. CARRIERS (§ 306*)—INJURIES TO PASSENGER—COLLISION—LIABILITY OF STATION AGENT.

A railroad station agent, under no duty to notify a train that another train is preceding it, is not liable for injuries to a passenger in a rear-end collision resulting from failure to give such notice.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Dec. Dig. § 306.*]

3. CARRIERS (§ 280*)—CARRIAGE OF PASSENGER—CARE REQUIRED.

A carrier must exercise the highest degree of care to transport its passengers safely.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. § 1087; Dec. Dig. § 280.*]

4. CARRIERS (§ 316*)—INJURIES TO PASSENGER—NEGLIGENCE—EVIDENCE—PRESUMPTIONS.

A presumption of negligence arises against a carrier on proof that a passenger on its train was injured by some agency of the carrier, or some act or omission of its servants or some defect in the instrumentalities of transportation.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. §§ 1283-1294; Dec. Dig. § 316.*]

5. CARRIERS (§ 315*)—INJURIES TO PASSENGER—NEGLIGENCE—PLEADING—PROOF.

Where, in an action for injuries to a passenger in a rear-end collision, plaintiff made out a prima facie case on proof of facts alleged in the complaint, he could not be defeated merely because he failed to prove other allegations not essential to his cause of action.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Dec. Dig. § 315.*]

6. NEGLIGENCE (§ 117*)—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—NECESSITY OF PLEADING.

Contributory negligence is not involved in a case when not pleaded.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Negligence, Cent. Dig. § 195; Dec. Dig. § 117.*]

7. CARRIERS (§ 321*)—INJURIES TO PASSENGER—COLLISIONS—NEGLIGENCE—PROXIMATE CAUSE—INSTRUCTIONS.

In an action for injuries to a passenger, an instruction that if a passenger is injured on a train, and the railroad does not exercise the highest degree of care, it is liable for the injury, etc., was not erroneous as eliminating the question of proximate cause, and making defendant an insurer.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Dec. Dig. § 321.*]

8. EVIDENCE (§ 127*)—RES GESTÆ.

In an action against a railroad for injuries to a passenger in a collision, a declaration of plaintiff as to his condition just after his restoration to consciousness, a minute or two after the collision, was properly admitted as part of the res gestæ.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 377-382; Dec. Dig. § 127.*]

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of York County; John S. Wilson, Judge.

Action by J. M. Sutton against the Southern Railway Company and F. G. Whitlock. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed as to the railway company, and reversed as to defendant Whitlock.

JONES, J. The plaintiff recovered judgment against the defendants for $1,350 as damages for personal injuries alleged to have been sustained by reason of a rear-end collision between two of defendant's trains at Pineville, N. C., on November 28, 1905, while plaintiff was a passenger on one of said trains. The defendants made a motion to direct a verdict and a motion for new trial on the ground that there was no testimony to sustain the allegations of negligence set forth in the complaint, which motions were refused, and these rulings are the main subject of exception. The complaint alleged that defendant Southern Railway Company was a common carrier of passengers operating a railroad from Columbia, S. C., to Charlotte, N. C.; that plaintiff was received in one of its trains as a passenger from Ft. Mill, S. C., to Charlotte, N. C.; that F. G. Whitlock was agent of defendant railway company at Ft. Mill, S. C. The allegations to which special attention is directed are in the fourth and fifth paragraphs, as follows:

"(4) That at the time aforesaid, to wit, on or about the 28th of November, 1905, the defendants herein negligently permitted one of the trains of the defendant railway company, following the train upon which plaintiff was being transported as a passenger, as aforesaid, to collide with the train upon which plaintiff had taken passage and was being transported, the collision being a rear-end collision, and the negligence of F. G. Whitlock, the agent and servant of his codefendant, consisting in his failure to give notice to the following train that the train upon which the plaintiff was riding was ahead of it upon the same track, preceding it in the direction of Charlotte, N. C., which negligence was also the negligence of the defendant railway company.

"(5) That in the collision which occurred as hereinbefore set forth a heavy lamp frame in the car upon and in which the plaintiff was riding, with a lamp in it, was forcibly wrenched by the shock from its fastening, and fell upon and struck the plaintiff on the head, rendering him unconscious; and in the jar incident to and produced by the collision the plaintiff was thrown about in the car, and was wounded and bruised. * * *

Appellants contend that the only specific act of negligence alleged is the failure of Whitlock "to give notice to the following train that the train upon which the plaintiff was riding was ahead of it upon the same track"; that no testimony was offered to prove that it was the duty of Whitlock to give such notice; that the general allegation of negligence was controlled by the specific act alleged; and that, therefore, plaintiff had failed to establish any case under the complaint. The general rule upon which appellant relies is thus stated in Goodwin v. Railway, 76 S. C. 560, 57 S. E. 531: "Where a complaint is general in its allegations of negligence, and the defendant does not move to have the allegations made definite and certain, the plaintiff may introduce under the general allegations any competent evidence to support the charge of negligence (Spire v. Railroad Co., 47 S. C. 80, 24 S. E. 992; Johnson v. Railroad Co., 53 S. C. 303, 31 S. E. 212, 69 Am. St. Rep. 849), but, where the complaint alleges specific acts of negligence, the plaintiff is restricted to proof of such acts of negligence (Fell v. Railroad Co., 33 S. C. 198, 11 S. E. 691; Jenkins v. McCarthy, 45 S. C. 278, 22 S. E. 883; Brown v. Railroad Co., 57 S. C. 435, 35 S. E. 731). So, when a complaint contains allegations of specific acts of negligence and also general allegations of negligence, the general allegations should be regarded as explained and controlled by the specific acts of negligence averred, in the absence of some clear indication in the complaint that the general allegations were intended to cover other acts of negligence than those alleged. This general subject is exhaustively discussed in a note to King v. Oregon, etc., R. R. Co., 59 L. R. A. 209." Under this rule a verdict should have been directed or new trial granted as to defendant Whitlock. He was a mere agent of defendant company in charge of its depot at Ft. Mill, S. C., and was not shown to have stood in any relation of duty to plaintiff. There was no testimony that it was his duty to give the notice alleged in the complaint, which was the only act of negligence alleged against him. Hence as against him there was no case.

But with respect to the defendant company a different relation appears. Under the allegations and testimony the relations of carrier and passenger existed between them, from which sprang the duty of defendant company to exercise the highest degree of care to transport plaintiff with safety. According to the rule in this state, a presumption of negligence arises against the carrier on proof that a passenger on its train was injured as the result of some agency or instrumentality of the carrier, some act of omission or commission of the servants of the carrier, or some defect in the instrumentalities of transportation. Steele v. Railroad Co., 55 S. C. 389, 33 S. E. 509, 74 Am. St. Rep. 756; Jarrell v. Railroad Co., 58 S. C. 494, 36 S. E. 910; Doolittle v. Railroad Co., 62 S. C. 139, 40 S. E. 133; Stembridge v. Railroad Co., 65 S. C. 447, 43 S. E. 968; Hunter v. Railroad Co., 72 S. C. 340, 51 S. E. 860, 110 Am. St. Rep. 605; Anderson v. Railroad Co., 77 S. C. 436, 58 S. E. 149, 122 Am. St. Rep. 591. Having made out a prima facie case upon proof of facts alleged in the complaint, plaintiff could rest upon such case, and could not be defeated merely because he failed to prove other allegations in the complaint not essential to his cause of action against the defendant carrier. Hence in the application of the general rule stated in Goodwin v. Railway, 76 S. C. 560, 57 S. E. 530, the material distinction must be observed between a suit by a passenger against a carrier, where the presumption mentioned applies, and a suit by some other person not a passenger, as employé, trespasser, or licensee, in which the presumption of negligence does not necessarily arise upon mere proof of injury by some agency or instrumentality of the carrier. The cases cited by appellant to sustain his contention were not cases by a passenger against a carrier, but were cases in which it was essential to recovery to show the specific act of negligence alleged.

The sixth exception complains of error in instructing the jury as follows: "If a man is injured on one of the railroad trains, being their passenger, and the railroad does not exercise the highest degree of care, he is entitled to compensation for that injury." It is contended this instruction made a common carrier an insurer, and eliminated the questions of proximate cause and contributory negligence. Contributory negligence, not having been pleaded, is not involved in the case. The instruction given to the jury, construed as a whole, made it clear that defendants were to be held liable only for injury proximately caused by their negligence as alleged. The foregoing conclusions dispose of the first exception as to the admissibility of testimony.

The remaining exception as to the admissibility of testimony cannot be sustained. The declaration of plaintiff as to his condition just after his restoration to consciousness, a minute or two after the collision, was properly admitted as falling within the rule of res gestæ.

The judgment of the circuit court as to the defendant Southern Railway Company is affirmed, but as to defendant Whitlock it is reversed.

WHITTLE v. JONES et al.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. April 18, 1909. Rehearing Denied May 11, 1909.)

COURTS (§ 90*)—PREVIOUS DECISIONS AS CONTROLLING.

An order of a judge refusing to send a case back to a referee for further evidence is not binding upon another judge to whom the case has been sent after appeal and remand, and it is within the discretion of the latter judge to send the case back to the referee for the taking of further testimony.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Courts, Cent. Dig. § 340; Dec. Dig. § 90*]

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Edgefield County; J. W. De Vore, Judge.

Action by J. D. Whittle against Ellie Brooks Jones and others. From an order of reference to take further testimony, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

See, also, 79 S. C. 205, 60 S. E. 522.

B. E. Nicholson, De Pass & De Pass, and John S. Reynolds, for appellants. W. G. Evans, for respondent.

WOODS, J. This action was brought by J. D. Whittle, the assignee of F. M. Mixson, upon a sealed note and mortgage of real estate, given as security, made by Mrs. Ellie Brooks Jones, for the purchase money of a pressing club, its equipment, and good will. This note was dishonored by the defendant Mrs. Jones, who claimed that Mixson had misrepresented the value of the business, and hence that there was failure of consideration. The cause was referred to the master, and after the filing of his report the plaintiff applied to the circuit court for an order referring the case back to the master for further evidence. This motion was denied. Thereafter the cause was heard by Judge Gary on the pleadings and the evidence; and though his honor found that, had Mrs. Jones proceeded differently, she would have been entitled to relief, he held that she had put herself beyond the aid of the court by failing to rescind the contract and gave judgment for the plaintiff for the full amount of the note and mortgage. On appeal this court, holding that the omission of Mrs. Jones to seek a rescission of the contract and of her sale of the property to Mixson did not deprive her of the right to rely upon the defense of misrepresentation, modified the judgment of the circuit court and remanded the case to that court for the purpose of determining the amount due on the plaintiff's mortgage. 79 S. C. 208, 60 S. E. 522. On the call of the case by Judge De Vore after remand, Mrs. Jones and A. C. De Pass, the defendants, demanded judgment on the record, contending that they were entitled to it under the decision of this court; but the plaintiff moved that the cause be referred to the master for the taking of further testimony. The order of Judge Gary refusing a similar motion was brought to the attention of Judge De Vore, but after a review of the testimony he granted plaintiff's motion. The rights of the Scottish-American Mortgage Company, Limited, are not involved in this appeal.

The appeal turns on the question whether Judge Gary's order refusing to refer the case back to the master to take further testimony was binding on Judge De Vore, when the cause came up before him for trial. In Wilson v. York, 43 S. C. 303, 21 S. E. 82, Judge Gary made an order striking the case from calendar 2, and placing it on calendar 1, on the ground that the defendants were entitled to a trial by jury. Subsequently Judge Watts made an order of reference to take the testimony. On appeal from this latter order, it was held that the order of Judge Gary "was the law of the case, and could not be disregarded by any subsequent circuit judge, unless, perhaps, the subsequent developments made by the trial put upon the case such a different aspect from that presented by the pleadings, which alone were before Judge Gary, as to show that the order of reference was proper." Even if the same general principle applied to an order like that under consideration, a subsequent judge would not be bound by such a mere ministerial order where there had been a material change in the aspect of the case. We think there was such a change here. Judge Gary entertained the opinion that the defense set up by Mrs. Jones could not avail, even assuming the allegations of her answer and the evidence offered by her to be true, and therefore he could not do otherwise than refuse to order a reference to enable the plaintiff to submit evidence; but afterwards this court held that Mrs. Jones had set up a good defense and had offered evidence tending to establish it, and remanded the case for the purpose of ascertaining the amount due on the mortgage in view of the mortgagor's defense. The aspect of the case, as presented to Judge De Vore, by reason of the decision of this court, was very different from that presented to Judge Gary. Judge De Vore could not therefore be bound by the order of Judge Gary, and the order of reference made by him was within his discretion; but, without respect to any change in the aspect of the case, Judge De Vore was not bound by the order of Judge Gary. The point was expressly decided in Farmers, etc., Association v. Berry, 53 S. C. 129, 31 S. E. 53, and Gregory v. Perry, 66 S. C. 455, 45 S. E. 4. In affirming this order, we express no opinion as to whether discretion was wisely exercised by the circuit judge.

There can be no doubt that the defendant Mrs. Jones is entitled to the benefit of the evidence already introduced by her. The order of Judge De Vore does not contemplate that she shall be required to re-introduce that testimony, but that both parties may introduce additional evidence.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

LAIRD v. PIEDMONT MUT. FIRE INS. CO.
(Supreme Court of South Carolina. April 13, 1909.)

INSURANCE (§ 668*)—FORFEITURE—REPRESENTATIONS IN APPLICATION—QUESTION FOR JURY.

In an action on a fire policy, held a question for the jury whether the policy was void on the ground that plaintiff had committed a fraud, or put it in the power of defendant's agent to do so, by overvaluing the property in the application.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. § 1737; Dec. Dig. § 668.*]

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Lexington County; John S. Wilson, Judge.

Action by W. M. Laird against the Piedmont Mutual Fire Insurance Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Efird & Dreher, for appellant. Graham & Sturkle, for respondent.

WOODS, J. In this action on a fire insurance policy of $1,618, the plaintiff recovered judgment for $1,468, the full amount claimed. The defendant's motion for the direction of a verdict in its favor on the ground that the evidence admitted of no other inference than that the plaintiff had committed a fraud in his application for insurance was refused, as was also his subsequent motion for a new trial on the same ground. The correctness of these rulings is involved in the first and second exceptions.

The first exception rests on the proposition that the circuit judge erred "in refusing to direct a verdict in favor of the defendant, on the ground that the proof showed that the plaintiff signed the applications for insurance in blank, and thereby committed a fraud on the defendant by putting it in the power of James Dodd to fraudulently and falsely represent the facts to the insurance company as to the values, risks, and as to the incumbrances by giving false answers to those questions in the applications."

The second exception alleges similar error in the refusal to grant a new trial.

The written application for the policy contains a statement that the valuations therein contained are estimated and fixed by the applicant; and in the application the valuations and the insurance desired are thus stated: "On two-story, shingle roof, frame building, while occupied by W. M. Laird as a ginhouse, situated on west side of Wagner road, in Lexington county, S. C., 9 miles west of Swansea, S. C., on Wagner and Swansea road. Present value of property $800; amount insurance wanted, $534. On machinery consisting of two gins, pulleys, belting, shafting, feeder, condenser, flues, press, and scales: Present value $650; amount insurance wanted, $534. On engines and boilers: Present value of property, $600; amount insurance wanted, $400." Testimony on behalf of plaintiff, which is uncontradicted, tends to prove that the plaintiff consented to take out the insurance at the urgent solicitation of one Dodd, the agent of the defendant company; that the application was made out by Dodd, the plaintiff signing it without reading; that, when the application was made out and signed, Dodd and the plaintiff were together at the plaintiff's place of business, where all the insured property was under Dodd's observation; and that the valuation was agreed on by Dodd and the plaintiff. These valuations were no doubt high, but they necessarily rested on opinion, and there was evidence tending to show that they were not excessive. It is true the plaintiff admitted he had paid only $300 for machinery valued at $600, but this is not conclusive of the true value, for the purchase might have been made for less than the market value. The circuit court was not in error in refusing to hold the policy to be void as a matter of law either on the ground that the plaintiff himself had committed a fraud or had put it in the power of Dodd to do so in the overvaluation of the property. The evidence on this subject made an issue for the jury. There was no evidence whatever of fraud by false representation as to incumbrances on the property; for in the application there was no answer to the question on that point. The fact that the policy provides that the insurance company shall not be liable if any part of the property be incumbered does not affect the question because the appeal does not rest on that provision of the policy; on the contrary, defendant rests its case on the position that the plaintiff by signing the application in blank put it in the power of Dodd to commit a fraud on the insurance company by representing the property to be unincumbered. There was no evidence of anything said or done by the plaintiff on which Dodd could base any representation to the defendant, except the written application signed by him, and that contained no representation at all as to incumbrances. There is therefore no ground to say the plaintiff enabled Dodd to deceive the defendant into believing there was no incumbrance on the property.

By the third exception it is submitted the circuit judge erred in refusing to grant a new trial on the ground that the verdict was clearly excessive. The insurance company was liable by the terms of the policy for only three-fourths of the value of the personal property. The defendant contends the evidence shows conclusively the value of the entire personal property was not over $390, and that, therefore, the verdict based on an insurance of $934 was necessarily excessive. As already said, there was some evidence that the value stated in the application was the true value. This being so, it was not error of law on the part of the circuit judge to refuse to set aside the finding of the jury as excessive.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

FORT v. FIRST NAT. BANK OF BATESBURG.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. April 13, 1909.)

1. BANKS AND BANKING (§ 153*)—CONDITIONAL DEPOSIT—CLAIM OF THIRD PERSON.

Plaintiff deposited the purchase price of land with a bank under an agreement with the grantor that the deposit was to be subject to the payment of a mechanic's lien claim against the property, if such claim was established in a suit then pending. The bank was informed of the agreement, but subsequently paid out all of the deposit on the order of the grantor. Held, that the agreement made the deposit special to the extent of the lien claim, and the bank was liable to the purchaser for the amount of the judgment recovered in the lien suit, and which was paid by the grantor.

2. EVIDENCE (§ 171*)—BEST AND SECONDARY EVIDENCE—CONTENTS OF WRITING—CHECKS.

In an action against a bank on its liability on a deposit made by plaintiff for the vendor of property, on condition that the deposit be subject to a mechanic's lien claim against the property, evidence to show the money was paid to the bank by a check is not inadmissible as evidence tending to prove its contents without proof of the loss of the check, as the check is a collateral matter, and a question as to its contents or form is not the principal matter in dispute.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 460, 528; Dec. Dig. § 171.*]

3. BANKS AND BANKING (§ 153*)—SPECIAL DEPOSITS—EFFECT OF DEPOSIT SLIP.

A deposit slip is a mere acknowledgment by the bank that the amount named has been received, and does not purport to embody the contract between the parties, and cannot affect the rights of a person depositing money with the bank for another under an agreement between the depositor and the person for whose benefit the deposit was made that the deposit should be subject to a lien against property purchased by the depositor, where the bank has knowledge of the agreement and receives the deposit subject to the payment of the lien.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Banks and Banking, Dec. Dig. § 153.*]

4. BANKS AND BANKING (§ 227*)—DEPOSITS—ACTIONS AGAINST BANK—EVIDENCE—AMOUNT OF RECOVERY.

Evidence, in an action against a bank to recover on a contract between the depositor, who was the purchaser of property, and the grantor, under which the deposit was to be subject to the payment of a mechanic's lien against the property, held to show that the contract was for the payment, not only of the original amount of the mechanic's lien, but for the costs and fees incident to a suit to enforce the lien.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Lexington County.

Action by James C. Fort against the First National Bank of Batesburg. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Barrett Jones and Efrid & Dreher, for appellant. Graham & Sturkie and E. L. Asbill, for respondent.

JONES, J. The testimony tends to show these facts: In December, 1903, S. B. Coats offered to sell James C. Fort a house and lot in Batesburg, S. C., for $850, and Fort was informed that the First National Bank of Batesburg had a mortgage on the premises, and that Rogers Bayly was claiming a mechanic's lien thereon for $58. A suit was then pending in the common pleas court for Lexington county by Bayly as plaintiff against Coats and the First National Bank as defendants for the enforcement of the alleged mechanic's lien. Not desiring to assume the risk of this controversy, on December 8, 1903, plaintiff with Coats went to the defendant bank, and the parties, at the suggestion and approval of the president of the bank, Dr. W. H. Timmerman, agreed that the purchase money should be paid into the bank, and that the bank should retain a sufficient amount of the funds to pay the Bayly claim after the settlement of the controversy. At this meeting Bayly notified plaintiff of his claim. The cashier at that time, Mr. W. W. Watson, was informed of the situation, and was asked by the president whether a portion of the purchase money could be left in the bank pending the settlement of the alleged mechanic's lien, to which the cashier replied that it could be done, provided the parties agreed, and he was instructed to that effect. The cashier then knew that Coats was willing to make such agreement, but he testified that Fort said he did not attach any importance to the Bayly claim. After the agreement mentioned, the plaintiff accepted the deed of the premises, and in the presence of the cashier delivered to Coats a check drawn by himself on the National Loan & Exchange Bank of Columbia for $850, payable to the order of Coats. Coats immediately indorsed this check, and deposited it with the bank, after signing his name to the usual deposit slip, which recited the deposit of the check and its amount, and contained at the foot these words: "Paid Dec. 8, 1903,—First National Bank of Batesburg, S. C." There was other testimony showing that the check was promptly paid. Coats thereupon gave his check on the fund to the cashier for $76.55 in settlement of the mortgage on the premises held by the bank. On December 16, 1903, the bank cashed his check on the fund for $50, and on December 23, 1903, cashed his check for the remainder of the fund, $723.45. Afterwards judgment was recovered in favor of Bayly establishing a mechanic's lien upon the premises to the amount of $122.42, which plaintiff was compelled to pay to prevent sale of the premises. This action was brought to recover that sum from the defendant bank upon its agreement above mentioned, and resulted in a judgment for plaintiff for $100.

From the foregoing statement it is manifest that there was no error, as alleged in the second exception, in refusing to direct a verdict in favor of the defendant. There can be no doubt of the bank's liability if it accepted the deposit with knowledge of and assent to the alleged agreement subjecting it to the claim of Bayly. The agreement made the deposit special to the extent of the Bayly claim, and it was the duty of the bank to retain of the deposit a sum sufficient to pay the Bayly claim.

Nor was there error, as alleged in the first exception, in admitting parol evidence tending to show that money was paid defendant bank by a check. The objection that the check is a written instrument, and evidence of its contents cannot be given without proof of loss, is not tenable as applied to this case. The check is a collateral matter, and the question is not as to the contents or form of a check, but as to the making of a special or conditional deposit to protect plaintiff against the Bayly claim. It is not disputed that the deposit was made of a check for $850, which was in fact duly cashed.

The third exception alleges error in the court's instruction to the jury substantially that, if the bank officer knew of the alleged agreement to subject the deposit to the payment of a particular claim, the mere fact that the deposit slip may be in the name of the depositor would not compel the bank officer to honor the checks of the depositor to the extent of the whole fund without retention for such claim.

Appellant's contention is that the deposit slip is the contract between the bank and the depositor, and the bank is bound to honor the depositor's checks to the extent of the deposit. The deposit slip is a mere acknowledgment by the bank that the amount named has been received (3 Ency. Law, 830), and does not purport to embody the contract between the parties, and cannot affect the rights of plaintiff under his alleged agreement with the depositor and the bank officers. The contemporaneous agreement among the plaintiff, the depositor, and the bank officers affected the deposit, with the trust assumed by the bank to hold sufficient of it to protect plaintiff against the Bayly claim. This case differs from Bank v. Mahon, 78 S. C. 412, 59 S. E. 31, as in that case the bank had no control over the deposit as it was in the name of parties not bound by any contract affecting the disposition of the deposit, whereas in this case the depositor and the bank agreed to protect the plaintiff, and thus induced the plaintiff to pay over the money deposited. The principle of Livingstain v. Banking Co., 77 S. C. 309, 57 S. E. 182, 122 Am. St. Rep. 568, is more applicable, as it affirms the right of a depositor to make an express contract with the bank that his deposit account shall be applied to his debts to the bank and to any other legitimate purpose. Under the last exception, it is contended that the court erred in not charging the jury plaintiff's request: "That, if the jury come to the conclusion that the bank is liable at all, then it is liable only for the amount of which Fort had notice, $58, and not for the amount sued for, $122.42." The amount of the recovery on the Bayly claim included, not only the original claim of $58, but the costs and fees of the suit. Dr. Timmerman, the president of the bank, testified that the money was left in the bank "subject to the adjudication of the Bayly claim." W. H. Sill testified that the parties agreed to leave "the amount in the bank, and let Mr. Bayly and Mr. Coats fight it out to get Mr. Fort a clear title to the place." The plaintiff testified that Mr. Watson, the cashier, filled out the check given by him in payment of the premises; that he told the cashier to be sure to hold enough money to pay the Bayly claim; that "he put it (the check) in with the condition that they would hold him clear and have no further trouble about the Bayly claim." It is true there was evidence that the Bayly claim was $58, but the suit thereon was pending and the bank was a party thereto, and all parties were bound to know that, if judgment was recovered, it would include the incidental costs and fees. In the situation of the testimony the court was correct in declining to limit the bank's liability to $58.

The judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

1. MORTGAGES (§ 300*)—PAYMENT—TENDER BEFORE MATURITY.

A tender before maturity of the amount of a mortgage, with interest to maturity, which the mortgagee refuses to accept, is not a legal tender so as to discharge the lien.

2. MORTGAGES (§ 300*)—PAYMENT—TIME OF TENDER.

3. MORTGAGES (§ 300*)—PAYMENT—TENDER BEFORE MATURITY.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Georgetown County.

Action by Richard Pyross against John W. Fraser. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

T. St. Mark Sasportas, for appellant. M. W. Pyatt, for respondent.

WOODS, J. This action was brought for the foreclosure of a mortgage on land in the city of Georgetown given by the defendant to the plaintiff to secure a bond for the sum of $250, the purchase money of the land. The complaint alleged the balance due at the time of the commencement of the action to be $117, with interest and attorney's fees. The defense alleged in the answer was tender on March 14, 1905, of the sum of $67, as the full amount then unpaid. The issues were referred to a referee, who reported that the last installment of the bond became due on July 20, 1905, and on that day the entire sum due by the defendant was $47, and that the defendant's tender on March 14, 1905, was not a legal tender, and did not discharge the lien of the mortgage, because the tender was made before the last installment fell due, and the mortgages could not be compelled to accept his debt until maturity. The circuit court sustained the referee and made a decree of foreclosure.

Few adjudications of the question here made as to the right of a debtor to pay his debt before maturity are to be found, for the reason that a creditor rarely refuses to accept a premature tender of his debt when it includes interest to the date of maturity. In all the cases, however, where the question has been decided under the common law, it has been held that the creditor cannot be compelled to give up his investment before maturity. Quynn v. Whetcroft (Md.) 3 Har. & McH. 136, 1 Am. Dec. 375; Abbe v. Goodwin, 7 Conn. 377; Brown v. Cole, 14 Sim. 427, 60 Eng. Reprint. 424. To hold otherwise would be to change the contract of the parties. The creditor may, however, waive his right to insist on strict compliance with the contract.

In this case it was admitted the plaintiff received from the defendant without objection a partial payment of $15 of the last installment on 15th February, 1904, long before it became due. The argument is that this showed waiver of right to insist on postponement of payment of the remainder until maturity. But this favor, extended to the defendant as to part of the debt, did not bind the creditor to extend a like favor as to the remainder. Each party had an equal right to require the other to perform the contract as it was written. Paying a part of the debt before maturity would not have been a waiver by the debtor of his right to postpone payment of the remainder until maturity. So receiving a part of the debt before maturity was not a waiver of the right of the creditor to hold the remainder of his investment until maturity. The provisions of section 2375 of Civil Code of 1902, requiring satisfaction of mortgages on payment or legal tender of the debt, though relied on by the appellant, does not affect the matter, for the reason that the tender before maturity was not a legal tender.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

PEARSON v. MILLS MFG. CO.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. May 4, 1909.)

1. STATUTES (§ 158*)—REPEALS BY IMPLICATION.

Repeals of statutes by implication are not favored.

2. STATUTES (§ 159*)—REPEALS BY IMPLICATION—REPUGNANCY.

To effect a repeal of a statute by implication on account of repugnancy, the repugnancy cy must not only be plain, but the provisions of the two statutes must be incapable of any reasonable reconciliation.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Statutes, Cent. Dig. §§ 229, 231; Dec. Dig. § 159.*]

8. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 83*)—WAGES—PAYMENT—STATUTES—CONSTRUCTION.

Civ. Code 1902, § 2719, requires every corporation, person, or firm issuing any evidence of indebtedness in payment of wages to redeem the same in goods or money on demand within 30 days from delivery, provided that if such corporation, etc., has a regular pay day once in every 30 days, it need not redeem such token in cash until the first pay day after the same becomes payable. Section 2720 provided that any person, firm, or company engaged in manufacturing or mining who shall issue any check or token not payable at the option of the holder in goods or money as required by section 2719, or who shall fail to redeem the same on presentation within 30 days after delivery, shall forfeit to the employé $50, etc. This was amended by Acts 1904 (24 Stat. at Large, p. 442), which added the words: "Provided, that in establishments for manufacturing lumber or brick such checks shall not be redeemable in cash except on regular pay days." Held, that the proviso to section 2720 is not repugnant to the proviso to section 2719, and did not repeal it by implication, and hence an employé in a cotton factory was not entitled to recover the penalty provided by section 2720 on the ground that a discount had been deducted from checks given him on tender on other than a regular pay day.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Greenville County; J. C. Klugh, Judge.

Action by B. F. Pearson against the Mills Manufacturing Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

J. R. Martin, for appellant. Cothran, Dean & Cothran, for respondent.

HYDRICK, J. Plaintiff brought this action under sections 2719 and 2720 of Civil Code of 1902 to recover of defendant $50, the penalty provided by section 2720, and $1.13 discount, which had been deducted from the face value of certain memoranda, tokens, or evidences of indebtedness, commonly called merchandise checks, which had been issued to him by defendant in payment for the labor of his minor children in the defendant's cotton factory. Plaintiff testified, in substance, as follows: In the fall of 1906 he had four children working in defendant's mill. Some dissatisfaction arose, and he gave two weeks' notice of his intention to quit, and did quit accordingly. He applied to defendant's bookkeeper for his time, and the bookkeeper gave him $11.25 in metal checks, which were good for merchandise only at defendant's store. He took them to the manager of defendant's store, who gave him $10.12 in cash for them. Defendant had two regular pay days in each month. This transaction did not occur on a regular pay day. He did not present the checks on a regular pay day, and demand cash for them. He did not demand their face value in merchandise. He was not required to take the checks, but took them rather than go back to the mill on a regular pay day, and get the money due him. Upon the close of plaintiff's testimony the trial judge granted defendant's motion for nonsuit.

The sections of the Code referred to are as follows: Section 2719: "It will not be lawful for any corporation, person or firm in this state to issue, pay out or circulate for payment of the wages of labor, any order, check, memorandum, token or evidence of indebtedness, payable in whole or in part otherwise than in lawful money of the United States, unless the same is negotiable or redeemable at its face value, without discount, in cash or goods, wares or merchandise or supplies, at the option of the holder, at the store or place of business of such firm, person or corporation, or at the store of any other person on whom such paper may be drawn, where goods, wares or merchandise are kept for sale; sold or exchanged, and the person who, or corporation, firm or company which, may issue any such order, check, memorandum, token or other evidence of indebtedness, shall, upon presentation and demand, within thirty days from the date of delivery thereof, redeem the same in goods, wares, merchandise or supplies, at the current cash market price for like goods, wares, merchandise or supplies, or in lawful money of the United States, as may be demanded by the holder of any such order, memorandum, token or other evidence of indebtedness: Provided, that if said corporation, person or firm engaged as specified in this section have a regular pay day once in every thirty days, then said corporation, person or firm shall not be required to redeem such token or evidence of indebtedness in cash until the first pay day after the same becomes payable, as herein provided, and such token or evidence of indebtedness shall be presented for payment in cash only on such pay days: Provided that the provisions of this section shall not apply to agricultural contracts, or advances made for agricultural purposes." Section 2720: "Any officer or agent of any corporation, or any person, firm or company, engaged in the business of manufacturing or mining in this state, who by themselves or agent shall issue or circulate in payment for wages of labor any order, check, memorandum, token or evidence of indebtedness, payable in whole or in part otherwise than in lawful money of the United States without being negotiable and payable at the option of holder in goods, wares, merchandise, supplies or lawful money of the United States as required by section 2719, or shall fail to redeem the same when presented for payment within thirty days from date of delivery thereof, by said company or its agents, at his or their office or place of business, in lawful money of the United States, or who shall compel or attempt to coerce any employé of any such corporation, shall forfeit to the employé or legal owner and holder of such order, check, memorandum, token or evidence of indebtedness, fifty dollars, to be recovered in any court of competent jurisdiction: Provided, that in establishments for manufacturing lumber or brick such checks shall not be redeemable in cash except on regular pay days." As was originally enacted, section 2720 did not contain the words which have been italicized. These were introduced by way of amendment by the act of 1904 (24 Stat. at Large, p. 442).

The plaintiff contends that the proviso to section 2720 is repugnant to the proviso to section 2719, and, being the later statute, repeals the former by implication. This contention is clearly untenable. Repeals by implication are not favored. In State v. Alexander, 14 Rich. Law, 251, the court quotes with approval from Goddard v. Boston, 20 Pick. (Mass.) 407, as follows: "A later statute on a given subject, not repealing an earlier one in terms, is not to be taken as a repeal by implication, unless it is plainly repugnant to the former, or unless it fully embraces the whole subject-matter." The authorities agree that, to effect a repeal by implication on account of repugnancy, the repugnancy must not only be plain, but the provisions of the two statutes must be incapable of any reasonable reconciliation; for, if they can be construed so that both can stand, the court will so construe them. We are unable to see any repugnancy between the provisos to the two sections above quoted, and hence there is no room for the application of the principle of repeal by implication.

There is no testimony tending to sustain either of the other points made by appellant, to wit, that defendant did not have regular pay days, or that the defendant compelled or attempted to coerce the plaintiff to receive the checks.

The judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

LYLES v. KINARD et al.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. April 13, 1909.)

1. PLEADING (§ 51*)—SEPARATE CAUSES OF ACTION.

A complaint alleged that plaintiff delivered her mare to defendant K., authorizing him to sell it for cash; that K. sold the mare to the other defendants, members of a firm of which K. was a member, agreeing to allow them as a credit a bill then due from K. to the other defendants without plaintiff's knowledge; that the other defendants thereafter sold the mare to another, and offered to pay to K. the difference between the supposed price of the mare and the amount due from K. to them without plaintiff's authority; and that defendants refuse to pay plaintiff the value of the mare. Held, that only one cause of action against all the defendants was alleged; the allegation that the defendants other than K. paid a part of the price by allowing credit to K. on a debt being only an allegation of the method by which the primary wrong was accomplished.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. § 112; Dec. Dig. § 51.*]

2. PLEADING (§ 367*)—DEMURRER—MOTION TO MAKE DEFINITE AND CERTAIN.

Where a complaint did not state a cause of action against the defendants other than one K., the remedy was by demurrer, and not by motion to make the complaint more definite and certain.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. § 1173; Dec. Dig. § 367.*]

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Richland County; Ernest Gary, Judge.

Action by Mary E. Lyles against J. M. Kinard and others, copartners. A motion was granted requiring the complaint to be made more definite and certain, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

El. L. Craig, for appellant. J. Wm. Thurmond, for respondents.

WOODS, J. The defendants H. C. Watson and W. C. Tompkins, copartners trading as Watson & Tompkins, contending that the plaintiff had blended two causes of action, one against the defendant Kinard and the other against Watson & Tompkins, made a motion to require the complaint to be made more definite and certain by the statement of the alleged causes of action against the defendants separately. The circuit judge took the defendant's view, and granted the motion. The plaintiff appeals.

We think only one cause of action is stated in the complaint, and that the motion should have been refused. The complaint alleges: "That heretofore, to wit, on the _____ day of December, 1907, the plaintiff was the owner of a certain bay mare of the value of one hundred and fifty dollars ($150), which she was desirous of selling, and for that purpose put it into the hands of the defendant J. M. Kinard, then the manager of Martin's Livery Stables, in the city of Columbia, authorizing and directing him to sell the same for her account. That this plaintiff is informed and believes that the said J. M. Kinard offered to sell the said mare to the defendants Watson & Tompkins, but, without the knowledge and approval of this plaintiff, agreed to allow the said Watson & Tompkins a credit on account of said purchase a certain bill that was then due by the said J. M. Kinard to the said Watson & Tompkins, which said agreement was entirely without the knowledge or authority of this plaintiff, the said horse being put in the hands of said J. M. Kinard for sale for cash, and, in pursuance of said agreement between said Kinard and said Watson & Tompkins, said mare was turned over to said Watson & Tompkins, who thereafter, as the plaintiff is informed and believes, sold the said bay mare to some person unknown to this plaintiff, and offered to pay over to the said Kinard a small sum of money, which is alleged to be the difference between the supposed figure at which the said mare was sold and the amount due by the said J. M. Kinard to the said Watson & Tompkins, which transaction was wholly without the authority or consent of this plaintiff, and the defendants now neglect and refuse to pay over to this plaintiff the value of the said mare sold."

The only primary right of the plaintiff stated in the complaint is the right to have the value of her bay mare which the defendant Kinard was authorized to sell as her agent for cash. The only primary wrong of the defendants is the sale of the mare by Kinard in violation of his contract to sell as agent of the plaintiff for cash, and the alleged participation of Watson & Tompkins in Kinard's breach of his contract. The allegation that Watson & Tompkins paid a part of the purchase price by allowing credit to Kinard on a debt due to them is nothing more than an allegation of the method by which the primary wrong was accomplished. Du Bose v. Kell, 72 S. C. 208, 51 S. E. 692; Wright v. Willoughby, 79 S. C. 438, 60 S. E. 971. If the complaint does not allege facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action against the defendants Watson & Tompkins, the remedy is by demurrer. On that point we express no opinion.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be reversed.

WILLIS v. WHITTLE et al.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. April 26, 1909.)

CHattel Mortgages (§ 261*) — BREACH OF CONDITIONS—RIGHT OF SEIZURE.

The authority in a chattel mortgage to seize and sell the property on default in payment is a license, coupled with an interest, which cannot be revoked after breach of condition, and includes, by necessary implication, the right to take the property from the mortgagor's premises, provided it can be done without a breach of the peace.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Chattel Mortgages, Dec. Dig. § 261.*]

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Barnwell County; Geo. E. Prince, Judge.

Action by D. F. Willis against J. D. Whittle and another. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

T. R. Morgan and Davis & Best, for appellant. R. C. Holman and J. E. Hardey, for respondents.

HYDRICK, J. This is an appeal from a judgment of nonsuit in an action of damages for trespass.

The plaintiff gave the defendant Whittle a chattel mortgage over a horse. The mortgage contained the usual clause, authorizing the mortgagee or his agent to seize and sell the property on default of payment of the debt, and deduct from the proceeds of sale the costs and expenses of seizure, etc. The condition of the mortgage having been broken, the defendant Sprawls was appointed by the defendant Whittle as his agent to seize the horse. Before the seizure, Sprawls went to plaintiff and demanded payment of the debt, and, on plaintiff's failure to pay, told him that he was going to seize the horse. Plaintiff objected to his doing so, without his taking out claim and delivery proceedings. Nevertheless Sprawls went to plaintiff's house during his absence, and told plaintiff's mother, who was living with plaintiff, that he had come to seize the horse. She told him that both her sons and her husband were absent from home, and that her son, the plaintiff, had instructed her to object to any one taking the horse, and she did object to his doing so. Notwithstanding her objection and the previous objection of the plaintiff, Sprawls went to the stable, took the horse out, and carried him away. A few days afterwards the plaintiff paid the balance due on the mortgage debt, and $10 in addition, the amount charged by the defendants as the costs and expenses of collection and seizure, whereupon the defendants returned the horse to him. The plaintiff then brought this action to recover $1,000 damages for the alleged trespass in seizing the horse, and compelling him to pay $10, besides the mortgage debt, to regain possession of him. There is no testimony tending to show that the charge of $10 was unreasonable. On the other hand, it showed that the plaintiff voluntarily paid it.

It is well settled that, after condition broken, the legal title to mortgaged chattels vests in the mortgagee. The right of the mortgagee to seize mortgaged chattels after condition broken is a license coupled with an interest, which cannot be revoked by the mortgagor. It is a part of the consideration of the mortgage, and to allow the mortgagor to revoke it would be a fraud upon the rights of the mortgagee, and would very much impair the value of chattel mortgages as securities. The right to seize carries with it by necessary implication the right to do whatever is reasonably necessary to make the seizure, including the right to peaceably enter upon the premises of the mortgagor. There is one restriction, however, which the law imposes upon this right. It must be exercised without provoking a breach of the peace; and, if the mortgagee finds that he cannot get possession without committing a breach of the peace, he must stay his hand, and resort to the law, for the preservation of the public peace is of more importance to society than the right of the owner of a chattel to get possession of it.

Satterwhite v. Kennedy, 3 Strob. 457; Harris v. Marco, 16 S. C. 573. In this case there was no breach of the peace, and, as we have seen, the defendants had an irrevocable license to enter upon the plaintiff's premises to make the seizure. They did so in an orderly manner, and were not trespassers. The judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

ATHERTON v. ATLANTIC COAST LINE R. CO.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. April 20, 1909.)

1. COSTS (§ 184*)—WITNESS FEES—NECESSITY OF SUBPOENAING WITNESS.

Civ. Code 1902, §§ 2863, 3130, provides for the payment of certain fees to persons "summoned" as witnesses. Section 2861 authorizes the issuance of subpoenas for witnesses, and requires a subpoena to state at whose request the witness is "summoned." Held, that a party may not tax witness fees against the adverse party unless the witnesses were subpoenaed.

2. COSTS (§ 205*)—WITNESS FEES.

Witness fees which have not been paid by the party seeking to tax them against the adverse party are not taxable, in the absence of affidavit of the witnesses as to their per diem and mileage; the affidavit of counsel not being sufficient.

3. COSTS (§ 184*)—WITNESS FEES—MATERIALITY OF TESTIMONY.

Fees of witnesses may not be taxed against the adverse party, where they were not sworn, unless it appears by affidavit that their attendance was procured in good faith, and, if required, it should be made to appear at least prima facie that they were material, or intended to be so.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Charleston County; D. E. Hydrick, Judge.

Action by Thomas H. Atherton, Jr., against the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company. From an order setting aside a taxation of costs by the clerk, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

T. Moultrie Mordecai, for appellant. J. P. K. Bryan, for respondent.

JONES, C. J. This appeal is from an order of Judge Hydrick setting aside the clerk's taxation of costs in the above-stated case.

On plaintiff's motion a nonsuit had been ordered, with costs taxable against plaintiff. The clerk taxed, among other things, the per diem and mileage of nine witnesses, aggregating $158.10, the matter in dispute. The claim was supported by the affidavit of one of the counsel for defendant declaring the number of days each witness had been in attendance upon court and the number of miles each one had traveled in so doing. It appears that none of the witnesses were summoned by subpoena, and it also appears that none of them were sworn, as the nonsuit was ordered upon the call of the case for trial. Counsel for plaintiff contended before the clerk that the affidavit of each witness should be required to show the per diem and mileage to which he is entitled. The clerk held that the affidavit submitted was sufficient and taxed the costs as claimed. Defendant moved the circuit court to set aside said taxation: (1) Because the witnesses were not summoned by subpoena; (2) because there were no affidavits of the several witnesses as to their per diem and mileage; (3) because it was not shown that the witnesses were material; (4) because the affidavit of counsel was not the best evidence.

Judge Hydrick overruled the first contention, holding that, when a witness has attended court voluntarily at the request of a party, he is entitled to his costs upon proof of the fact, and cites the opinion of Chief Justice McIVER in Lewis v. Brown, 16 S. C. 63. While this ruling is not brought under direct review by any exception, both parties have argued it in this court as if involved, and, it being important to indicate the law on this subject, we will not decline to consider it. The right to tax fees and costs depends wholly upon statute. Section 2863, Civ. Code 1902, provides: "Every person summoned to appear as a witness in the common pleas or probate court shall be paid by the person or persons at whose suit the summons is issued one dollar for every day's attendance on such summons. . . ." Section 3130 provides for fees of witnesses in the courts of common pleas and probate "one dollar for every day's attendance on summons." The summons here referred to is not a mere verbal or written notice from the party, but is the subpoena referred to in section 2861, authorizing the clerk of the circuit court, at the request of either party, to issue subpoenas for the attendance of witnesses, directing what shall be expressed in the subpoena, and stating "at whose request they are summoned," showing that "subpoena" and "summons" in this connection mean the same thing. The statute allows $1 for every day's "attendance on such summons." It is therefore manifest that a voluntary attendance on court by a witness at the mere request of a party is not an attendance on the summons or subpoena required by the statute. The object of the statute is to give the court greater control over the attendance of witnesses under subpoena and in some measure to check improper taxation for witness fees. In the case of Lewis v. Brown, supra, the question before the court was whether the production of a subpoena writ is essential to entitle a witness to the taxation of his fees, and the court said: "In the absence of any showing to the contrary, we would, of course, take it for granted that the clerk had satisfactory evidence before him that the witnesses had been subpoenaed and had attended court in obedience to such mandate. The production of the subpoena writ was not essential, as it may have been lost, and, if so, secondary evidence would have been competent and sufficient." The court then proceeds to use the language relied on by the circuit judge: "Indeed, we are not prepared to say that it is necessary that a witness who has attended court should be able to show that he has been duly subpoenaed in order to entitle him to charge the fees allowed by law, for if he attends voluntarily we do not see why he should not be just as much entitled to his fees as if he had been compelled to attend." Notwithstanding this view of the learned Chief Justice McIver, we are constrained to think that, whatever may be the right of a witness attending voluntarily at the request of a party as against that party for compensation, it is a different question when attempt is made to tax fees against the adverse party, in which case the claimant must bring himself strictly within the terms of the statute. Under the practice before the adoption of the present statute, in order to tax the costs of a witness, it was necessary that the witness be subpoenaed. Clark v. Linsser, 1 Bailey, 190; Love v. Ingram, 2 Speer, 87. We know of no statute authorizing a different rule, and there is no good reason for departing from it now.

The circuit court sustained the second contention of plaintiff under the authority of Clark v. Linsser, 1 Bailey, 187, in the absence of any showing as to why the affidavits of the witnesses could not be obtained, and we concur in this ruling. The witness knows better than any one else how many days he attended court pursuant to the summons or subpoena, and how many miles he traveled, and the law requires the best evidence available. The affidavit of some one else would likely be based more or less upon the information and belief. The affidavit of the witness would tend to purge his conscience and be the best evidence that he intended to make claim for his fees. It is not contended that the defendant has paid these fees, and is claiming them, as disbursements.

Upon the third ground of objection to the taxation of costs, the circuit court held that, if it appeared that the witnesses were not sworn, then it should appear by affidavit that their attendance was procured in good faith, and, if required, it should be made to appear at least prima facie that they were material, or intended to be so. The ruling was correct and is supported by Love v. Ingram, 2 Speer, 87; Farr v. Farr, 2 Hill, 554; Taylor v. McMahan, 2 Bailey, 181; Winsmith v. Dewberry, 14 S. C. 554.

The remaining ground of objection is involved and disposed of in the foregoing considerations.

The judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

TURNER v. BOLTON et ux.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. April 28, 1909.)

1. JUDGMENT (§ 143*)—OPENING DEFAULT—EXCUSE FOR DEFAULT.

Under Code Civ. Proc. 1902, § 195, providing that the court may in its discretion "within one year after notice thereof relieve a party from a judgment * * * taken against him through his inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect," a default judgment should be opened on application of the wife, where it appears that the summons and complaint against husband and wife were delivered to the husband while sick with a disease from which he died two months later, that the husband instructed the wife to keep the papers until he was able to examine them; but the wife, not knowing the nature of the papers or that she was a party thereto, kept the papers in a trunk until after the husband's death and execution was issued on the judgment.

2. JUDGMENT (§ 143*)—SETTING ASIDE DEFAULT—"EXCUSABLE NEGLECT."

The failure of the wife to examine papers served on her husband while he was sick and incapable of attending to business, and thereby learn that they were a summons and complaint in commencement of an action in which she was a party, is "excusable neglect" within Code Civ. Proc. 1902, § 195, entitling her to have a default judgment in such action set aside.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court, Edgefield County; J. W. De Vore, Judge.

Action by M. Toney Turner against W. L. Bolton and Annie H. Bolton. From an order setting aside a default judgment, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

N. G. Evans and E. H. Folk, for appellant. J. Wm. Thurmond, for respondents.

HYDRICK, J. This action was brought against W. L. Bolton and his wife, the defendant Annie H. Bolton, for $500 damages for breach of contract. The defendants failed to demur or answer, and the plaintiff proved his case in open court at the Spring term, 1908, of the circuit court for Edgefield, and obtained a verdict for the full amount claimed, upon which judgment was entered and execution issued. After levy by the sheriff the defendant Annie H. Bolton moved the court, on affidavits, at the Summer term, 1908, to set aside the judgment and allow her to answer. Her motion was granted, and the plaintiff appealed. The exceptions charge error in the findings and conclusions of the circuit court, and abuse of discretion.

Numerous affidavits were submitted in support of the motion and in opposition thereto. For the consideration of the appeal it will be necessary to state, in substance, only the undisputed facts as found by the circuit court, and as they appear in the affidavits submitted, and the contentions of the parties upon the points involved in the motion. On February 8, 1908, copies of the summons and complaint for each of the defendants were delivered by the deputy sheriff to W. L. Bolton at his residence. At that time he was sick, suffering from nervous indigestion, from which he afterwards, on April 8, 1908, died. He went to the door and received the papers, and went back to his room and handed them to his wife, and told her to put them up, and, when he got well enough, he would examine them. He told her nothing as to the nature of the papers. She did not examine them, but, in obedience to his instructions, put them in a trunk, where they remained until after his death. She knew nothing of the nature of the papers, or that either of them was intended for her, or that it was intended thereby to institute suit against her or her husband. She did not know that she had been sued until April 11, 1908, when the sheriff went to her residence to levy the execution. She is a woman of limited education, and had had no experience in legal matters. At the time of the service she was greatly distressed on account of the condition of her husband. The respondent also submitted affidavits tending to show that at the time of the service, and for some time prior thereto and thereafter, until the time of his death, her husband's mind had become affected, so that he was non compos mentis, and also that she had a good defense to the action on the merits. Upon the last two grounds there was conflicting evidence. The circuit court found against her contention as to the condition of her husband's mind, but held under the undisputed facts and circumstances above stated as to the service and the manner thereof, and the conditions then existing, that she was entitled to the relief prayed for.

Section 195, Code Civ. Proc. 1902, gives the circuit court power, "in its discretion, and upon such terms as may be just, at any time within one year after notice thereof, to relieve a party from a judgment, order, or other proceeding, taken against him through his mistake, inadvertence, surprise or excusable neglect. * * * This court had frequently held that it will not review the findings of fact in the circuit court in cases like this, and that the granting or refusing of motions made under section 195 of the Code is within the discretion of the circuit court, and that it will not interfere with the exercise of that discretion, unless it is made to appear that it has been abused. See Manufacturing Co. v. Smith, 70 S. C. 160, 49 S. E. 226; Dunton v. Harper, 64 S. C. 338, 42 S. E. 153, and cases cited by the court.

The appellant contends that from the findings of fact that W. L. Bolton was of sound mind it necessarily followed that the service was legal and valid; and also, from the respondent's own showing as to the condition of her husband's mind, it necessarily followed that she was under the circumstances guilty of negligence. Admitting both contentions, it does not follow that she was not entitled to relief. Clearly it was not the intention of the Legislature to limit relief to cases where the service was bad or defective; nor was it intended to confine the relief to cases where the parties had exercised proper diligence, for one of the grounds of relief mentioned in the statute is "excusable neglect." So that the question is not so much whether the party was negligent, but whether his negligence was "excusable." In this case the circuit court finds, as a fact, that the respondent was not guilty of negligence at all, but, on the contrary, finds that under the circumstances her conduct was natural; that is, that of an ordinarily prudent person.

The order appealed from is therefore affirmed.

McMEEKIN v. SOUTHERN RY. CO.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. April 15, 1909.)

1. CARRIERS (§ 51*) — BILL OF LADING — RECEIPT — CONSTRUCTION.

A bill of lading is in form nothing more than a receipt for freight, issued to the consignor by the carrier, containing the contract of shipment, so that, in an action against a carrier for failure to deliver part of the shipment, a paper, which had been recognized as valid by the carrier's agent at destination, all the goods which had arrived being turned over on its presentation, and which was of the same effect as a regular printed bill of lading, it, in addition to being a receipt, containing the specification, "as per conditions company's bill of lading," thus supplying the essential that a mere receipt might lack, was properly admitted against the carrier.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Dec. Dig. § 51.*]

2. EVIDENCE (§ 179*)—SECONDARY EVIDENCE —FAILURE OF OTHER PARTY TO PRODUCE ORIGINAL.

A paper, purporting to be notice to a carrier of special damages to plaintiff, though only a copy, being identified by the carrier's agent, is admissible against it, on its failure to produce the original.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 595-599; Dec. Dig. § 179.*]

3. CARRIERS (§ 56*)—BILL OF LADING—TRANSFER OF TITLE.

The general rule is that the delivery, without indorsement, of a bill of lading, by the one of special damages. Taking the view most favorable to the plaintiff, and assuming the date to be 14th August, it was only 23 days from that time to the arrival of the freight on 6th September. The plaintiff employed six hands, and paid them $10 a month and board. There was nothing in the record to show that the interest on the capital invested in the sawmill outfit was very large; and the sum of these losses, even leaving out of consideration a reasonable return which the plaintiff might have derived by ordinary diligence in engaging his laborers in other work, must have been far less than $617, and that finding by the jury was plainly excessive.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

MAYRANT v. CITY OF COLUMBIA.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. April 9, 1909.)

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 845*)—INJURY FROM RAISING GRADE OF STREET—ACTIONS—ADMISSIBILITY OF EVIDENCE.

In an action against a city for flooding a lot by raising the grade of adjacent streets, and by insufficient drains, testimony as to the quantity of earth and cost of work which would be required to fill in the lot to the level of the street pavement, so that surface water flowing upon the lot from land above would pass into the street, was incompetent; the method being the most expensive one, and one that due care would not require the lot owner or the city to adopt.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. § 1799; Dec. Dig. § 845.*]

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1050*)—REVIEW—HARMLESS ERROR—ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE.

It being so obvious that the method of filling in the entire lot was unnecessary, and that throwing up the edges of the lot would be sufficient, the admission of the evidence was not prejudicial, as it would be unreasonable to impute to the jury a conclusion that the expense of filling in the lot should be charged to the city.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4153-4160; Dec. Dig. § 1050.*]

3. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 845*) — INJURY FROM RAISING GRADE OF STREET — PLEADING AND PROOF.

Where the complaint, in an action against a city for flooding a lot by raising the grade of streets, and by insufficient drains, alleged as items of damage the loss of tenants, the effect of the flooding on the property itself, and the injury to the health of plaintiff and her family, and no motion was made to strike the items out, defendant could not complain of the admission of testimony to show such damage.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Dec. Dig. § 845.*]

4. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1053*)—REVIEW—HARMLESS ERROR—ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE—ERROR CURED BY INSTRUCTION.

If there was error in admitting the testimony, it was cured, where the court charged that the measure of damages was the actual injury to the property, and not consequential damages.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4180-4182; Dec. Dig. § 1053.*]

5. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 845*) — INJURY FROM RAISING GRADE OF STREET—ACTIONS—INSTRUCTIONS.

In an action against a city for flooding a lot by the raising of the grade of streets and by insufficient drains, a charge that, if the city in changing its streets caused water that would not have otherwise flowed onto plaintiff's land to flow there, it was liable, and that for plaintiff to recover, the injury must be shown to have been caused by the casting of the waters from the city's drains onto plaintiff's property, and that such casting of the water was the direct and natural result of the negligent construction of the drains or streets, when considered as a whole was not objectionable as permitting a recovery by plaintiff without any showing of negligence or mismanagement by the city.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. § 1801; Dec. Dig. § 845.*]

6. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 845*) — INJURY FROM CHANGING GRADE OF STREET—ACTIONS — INSTRUCTIONS — CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

In an action against a city for flooding a lot by raising the grade of streets and by insufficient drains, a charge that the statute under which the action was brought permits a recovery for the actual damages suffered by plaintiff in case she has not contributed to, or in any way brought about, the injury by negligent action or nonaction on her part was a sufficient charge on contributory negligence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Dec. Dig. § 845.*]

7. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 845*)—INJURIES FROM CHANGING GRADE OF STREET—ACTIONS—DAMAGES.

In an action against a city for flooding a lot by raising the grade of streets and by insufficient drains, the city could not offset, against any liability for negligence in that respect, the increase in the market value of the property, due to the general advance in real estate values in the city.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Dec. Dig. § 845.*]

8. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 845*)—INJURIES FROM CHANGING GRADE OF STREETS—ACTIONS—QUESTIONS FOR JURY—DAMAGES.

In an action against a city for flooding a lot by raising the grade of streets and by insufficient drains, the extent of damage, being a matter of judgment dependent upon knowledge of the property and all the surrounding conditions appearing from the evidence, rather than definite estimates of witnesses, is peculiarly within the province of the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. § 1800; Dec. Dig. § 845.*]

9. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 841*) — ACTIONS FOR INJURIES—SPECIAL DAMAGES.

Where it did not appear that the community at large had suffered any damage from the flooding of land caused by the change of grade of streets by a city and its insufficient drains, the fact that three or four neighboring property holders of plaintiff whose lot was flooded suffered the same injury from the same cause would not preclude plaintiff's right to sue as for special damages.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. § 1790; Dec. Dig. § 841.*]

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Richland County; Geo. Johnstone, Special Judge.

Action by Mary G. Mayrant against the City of Columbia. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Allen J. Green, for appellant. Thomas & Thomas, for respondent.

WOODS, J. An order of the circuit court overruling a demurrer to the complaint having been affirmed on appeal (77 S. C. 281, 57 S. E. 857, 10 L. R. A. [N. S.] 1094), this cause was brought to trial at the November term of the court of common pleas for Richland county before a jury, and a verdict was rendered in favor of the plaintiff for $1,600. The respondent appeals, assigning error in the admission of testimony, in the instructions to the jury, and in the refusal of a new trial.

A statement of the pleadings will be found in the opinion rendered in the former appeal. It is sufficient to say here that the plaintiff, as the owner of a lot of land in the city of Columbia, seeks to recover damages for the flooding of her land, the allegation being that the city of Columbia so altered the surface drains and raised the sidewalks on the adjacent street that the water is collected from the lots and street above, and thrown on plaintiff's property, where it remains for some time because the drains on the street are not large enough, and not so constructed as to permit its escape. The allegation is that this defective grading of the street and defective and insufficient drainage is due to the negligence and mismanagement of the defendant, and, without fault of the plaintiff, has resulted, using the language of the complaint, "in rendering plaintiff's houses uninhabitable, thereby causing plaintiff's tenants, from time to time, to vacate the said houses, thereby causing loss of rentals to plaintiff, and thereby causing the plaintiff and the members of her family dependent upon her to become sick and unhealthy." The answer was a general denial.

The first point made by the appeal is that there was error in allowing the witness Hasell Thomas to testify as to the quantity of earth and the cost of the work which would be required to fill in plaintiff's lot to the level of the pavement as raised by the city, so that the surface water flowing upon plaintiff's land from the lands above would flow over her land into the street. We think this evidence was not competent. It is true the filling in of the whole lot above the level of the pavement would have effectually prevented the flow of the water from the street into and over the lot, and that was one way in which either the plaintiff or the city of Columbia might have protected the property. But it was the most expensive method, and clearly one that due care did not require either party to adopt. Indeed it was so very obvious that this was unnecessary, and that throwing up the edges of the lot next to the street would have warded off the water from the street, that it would be unreasonable to impute to the jury a conclusion that the expense of filling in the lot should be charged to the defendant. For this reason we think the admission of the evidence was not material error.

The next exception must be overruled for two reasons. Objection was made to this question: "Taking into consideration the loss of your tenants, the effect on the property itself, and the injury to your health and to the health of your family, how many dollars have you been injured?" In the first place the defendant could not complain of the question, because the items of damage here spoken of were all alleged in the complaint, and no motion was made to strike them out. Martin v. Ry. Co., 70 S. C. 11, 48 S. E. 616; Elms v. Power Co., 79 S. C. 502, 60 S. E. 1110. In the second place the circuit judge charged the jury that the measure of damages was the actual injury to the property, and not consequential damages; and, if there was error in allowing the question to be answered, it was cured by this instruction. Hipp v. So. Ry. Co., 50 S. C. 129, 27 S. E. 623.

There are numerous exceptions imputing error to the circuit judge in instructing the jury that the defendant would be liable if, by its work on the street and its drains, it collected water that otherwise would not have flowed there, and cast it on plaintiff's property to her injury, without giving the further instruction that the defendant would not be liable unless the injury was due to defendant's negligence or mismanagement. The action was founded on section 2023, Civ. Code 1902, and under that statute it was essential to plaintiff's recovery that she should prove a defect from which the injury resulted, caused by the negligence or mismanagement of the city.

The trial was concluded under circumstances most distressing to the presiding judge and all others concerned, owing to the sudden death of Mr. Crawford, the eminent counsel for the plaintiff, while conducting the cause. If the part of the charge given to the jury on the 21st of November be considered alone, it would be subject to the criticism made in these exceptions; but, on the following morning, when the charge was resumed, the circuit judge explicitly and repeatedly charged that the plaintiff could not recover unless the evidence showed that injury to her property was due to a defect caused by the negligence or mismanagement of the defendant. The last instruction given on this subject at the conclusion of the charge was in this language, submitted as one of the defendant's requests: "In order for the plaintiff to recover the jury must be satisfied by the preponderance of the evidence that the injury complained of was caused by the casting of the water from defendant's drains onto plaintiff's property, and that such casting of the water was the direct and natural result of the negligent construction of the drains or streets."

The exception alleging failure properly to charge on the subject of contributory negligence is also without foundation, for, on the request of defendant's counsel, this instruction was given to the jury: "The statute under which this action is brought limits the recovery to the actual damages suffered by the party injured, and only permits a recovery of such damages in case the party injured has not contributed to, or in any way brought about, the injury by negligent action or nonaction on her part."

There was no error of law in refusing the motion for a new trial on any of the grounds set out in the exceptions. There was evidence that the value of the property was lessened by flooding, due to defendant's defective pavement grade and insufficient drains, and obviously the defendant could not offset against any liability for negligence in this respect the increase in the market value of the property, due to the general advance in real estate values in the city.

There was evidence to support a substantial verdict against the defendant, and a careful examination of the testimony does not lead to the conviction that the amount was capriciously fixed. The extent of the damage was a matter of judgment, dependent upon knowledge of the property and all the surrounding conditions appearing from the evidence, rather than definite estimates of the witnesses, and was therefore peculiarly within the province of the jury.

The fact that three or four neighboring property holders suffered from the same causes and in the same way does not bring the case within the principle of S. C. Steamboat Co. v. Wilmington, C. & A. R. R. Co., 46 S. C. 327, 24 S. E. 337, 33 L. R. A. 541, 57 Am. St. Rep. 688, and other similar cases. There was no evidence here that the community at large suffered any damage at all, or was in anywise concerned in the matter.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

BLACK v. ATLANTIC COAST LINE R. CO.
(Supreme Court of South Carolina. April 22, 1909.)

1. DAMAGES (§ 49*)—MENTAL SUFFERING.

The common law in force in this state does not allow recovery for mental suffering in the absence of bodily injury.

2. CARRIERS (§ 277*)—PERFORMANCE OF CONTRACT OF TRANSPORTATION—ACTION FOR BREACH—DAMAGES—MENTAL SUFFERING.

Where plaintiff, a passenger, was merely required to transfer at Y. from a train of defendant railroad not scheduled to stop at P., the station for which she bought a ticket, was delayed only 1 hour and 13 minutes in reaching P., and was not delayed in reaching her ultimate destination, and it appeared that the waiting room accommodations at Y. were superior to those at P., and that plaintiff suffered no bodily injury, and was not subjected to any discourtesy, and there was no evidence of wanton or willful misconduct on the part of defendant railroad's servants, plaintiff was not entitled to recover for mental suffering.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. §§ 1062-1084; Dec. Dig. § 277.*]

3. CARRIERS (§ 408*)—PASSENGER'S EFFECTS—DELAY IN DELIVERY—DAMAGES—PUNITIVE DAMAGES.

Where defendant railroad made an earnest effort to trace and deliver plaintiff's baggage which had miscarried, an inference of willful misconduct was not warranted, and plaintiff could not recover punitive damages for the delay in delivery.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. § 1569; Dec. Dig. § 408.*]

4. CARRIERS (§ 271*)—PERFORMANCE OF CONTRACT OF TRANSPORTATION—STOPPING AT DESTINATION—DUTY OF PASSENGER TO INQUIRE.

A railroad company may adopt a rule that a certain train shall not stop at designated stations, and a passenger is bound to inquire whether the train on which he takes passage stops at his destination.

5. TRIAL (§ 191*)—ASSUMPTIONS BY JUDGE AS TO FACTS.

Where, in an action against a railroad for damages to plaintiff's baggage, plaintiff raised no issue as to the identity of the ticket issued to her as a passenger, and it was identified by the agent who issued it, and by the conductor who punched it, and was introduced in evidence without objection, the court had a right to assume that it was the ticket issued to plaintiff.

6. CARRIERS (§ 408*)—PASSENGER'S BAGGAGE—INJURY—ACTION—QUESTION FOR JURY—CONSTRUCTION OF TICKET.

Where the complaint, in an action against a railroad for damages to plaintiff's baggage, alleged that defendant issued to plaintiff a ticket authorizing her to ride on its trains, as a part of her cause of action, and the ticket was introduced in evidence without objection, and its identity was not disputed, it was the province of the court to construe its terms as a matter of law responsive to the testimony, even if strict pleading required defendant to plead a limitation of liability stated in the ticket.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. § 1571; Dec. Dig. § 408.*]

7. CARRIERS (§ 153*)—CONTRACTS LIMITING LIABILITY.

While a carrier cannot by contract exempt itself from liability for its own negligence, the carrier and shipper may make a special contract upon consideration, agreeing on a valuation of property shipped in case of loss or damage.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. § 663; Dec. Dig. § 158.*]

8. CARRIERS (§ 405*)—PASSENGER'S EFFECTS—LOSS OR DAMAGE—CONTRACTS LIMITING LIABILITY.

A passenger, not assenting to or receiving any consideration for a contract limiting the carrier's liability for baggage, is not bound thereby, even though the limitation be reasonable.

9. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1068*)—HARMLESS ERROR—ERROR CURED BY VERDICT.

In an action against a railroad for damages to plaintiff's baggage, error in holding plaintiff bound by a contract limiting defendant's liability, to which plaintiff did not assent, and for which she received no consideration, provided the jury believed the limitation reasonable, was harmless; the verdict in plaintiff's favor showing that the jury did not deem the limitation reasonable, and were not governed by it.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Colleton County; Geo. W. Gage, Judge.

Action by Mamie Black against the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company. Judgment for plaintiff for less than amount claimed, and she appeals. Affirmed.

J. G. Padgett and Howell & Gruber, for appellant. W. Huger Fitzsimons and Peunfoy Bros., for respondent.

JONES, C. J. On December 6, 1905, at Jacksonville, Fla., plaintiff became a passenger on defendant's fast train No. 82, with a full fare ticket from Jacksonville to Green Pond, S. C., and with check to her trunk to that point issued by defendant. The trunk never reached Green Pond, and when finally traced, it was found in defendant's depot at Hague, Fla., and was delivered to plaintiff March 4, 1906, with the contents badly damaged. When the train left Savannah, the conductor informed plaintiff that train No. 82 would not stop at Green Pond, and that she would have to get off at Yemassee and there await the local train No. 42 from Augusta to Charleston. Plaintiff demurred to this, and told the conductor that she wanted to go on to Green Pond by that train. On reaching Yemassee the porter came in and picked up her grip, and told her that was the place for her to get off, and walked out, and the plaintiff followed and got off the train. She remained at Yemassee about 73 minutes, and boarded the local train, and was carried to Green Pond on the original ticket, reaching Green Pond in time to take the train to Walterboro, her final destination. No. 82 was not scheduled to stop at Green Pond, but occasionally had done so for some reason of emergency, as for water, to let off a sick passenger, to pass another train, or when it was behind local train No. 42. Plaintiff brought this action in January, 1906, to recover $5,000 as damages for alleged negligent and willful breach of duty in failing to carry plaintiff and her baggage to Green Pond, alleging that she was subjected to anxiety and humiliation in being required to leave the train at Yemassee, and remain there for some time; and that the defendant's agent at Jacksonville informed her when she bought her ticket that her train would stop at Green Pond. The value of the trunk and contents was alleged to be $500, and at the time of the commencement of the action the trunk had not been found and delivered. Plaintiff found in the trunk her money, about $30, and her gold watch, but testified that the clothing was so damaged as to be practically worthless, and estimated her loss at $900 or $1,000. When the trunk was delivered, the defendant's agent at Hague, in presence of plaintiff and her father, made a list of the articles in the trunk, estimating their value, exclusive of money and watch, at $304.80. About one dozen oranges were also in the trunk, and had become rotten, and this probably contributed to damage the clothing. The jury rendered a verdict in favor of plaintiff for $300. Plaintiff moved for a new trial for alleged error in the charge to the jury, but the motion was refused, and plaintiff now appeals from the order refusing a new trial, and from the judgment upon exceptions to the charge.

1. It is contended that the court erred in charging the jury that plaintiff, having received no physical injury, and none having been alleged in the complaint, could recover no damages for worry and mental anguish caused by the alleged delay. The exception does not specify wherein there was error. The charge was in accordance with the common law enforced in this state, which does not allow recovery for mental suffering in the absence of bodily injury. Mack v. R. R. Co., 52 S. C. 323, 29 S. E. 905, 40 L. R. A. 679, 68 Am. St. Rep. 913; Lewis v. Tel. Co., 57 S. C. 330, 35 S. E. 556; Taylor v. R. R. Co., 78 S. C. 559, 59 S. E. 641. It is argued that this rule does not apply when the carrier's breach of duty was willful, as alleged in this case. There was not a scintilla of evidence of any reckless, wanton, or willful misconduct on the part of defendant's servants in the treatment of plaintiff as passenger. At most plaintiff was subjected to a mere transfer, from a train not scheduled to stop at her station, to one scheduled to stop there, done without any rudeness, and with the least possible inconvenience to plaintiff, involving a delay in reaching Green Pond of only 1 hour and 13 minutes, and no delay whatever in her connection for Walterboro, her destination. She would have had the same wait at Green Pond as she had at Yemassee, and the waiting room accommodations at Yemassee were superior to those at Green Pond. But, if it be conceded that there was evidence of willfulness, the court covered that aspect fully in the general charge. In the particular charge complained of the court was instructing the jury as to whether they could give compensatory damages for wounded feelings in the absence of bodily injury.

2. The court charged that, defendant having made reasonable effort to trace and deliver the trunk, no punitive damages could be recovered on that account, but only such actual damages, from injury to its contents and inconvenience from delay, as plaintiff sustained could be recovered. We think there was no error in withdrawing from the jury the question of punitive damages with respect to the trunk. On the morning of December 6, 1905, plaintiff and her husband traveled on the Seaboard Air Line from Highland to Jacksonville, and, while on board train, received baggage check No. 7,063 of that company for the trunk. On reaching Jacksonville plaintiff's husband, through a negro employé of the Union Station Company, procured in exchange for the Seaboard check, the Atlantic Coast Line baggage check No. 37,288. There was testimony that the baggage was never actually delivered to the defendant company, but we assume that it was, since it issued its check therefor, and the trunk was finally found to be in its possession. But immediately upon demand of plaintiff for the baggage an earnest effort was made to trace and deliver it. When finally located at Hague, Fla., the trunk had on it the Seaboard check, and no check of the Atlantic Coast Line, and no mark to indicate its origin or destination, and this, no doubt, rendered the tracing for baggage with the Atlantic Coast Line check more difficult. While the circumstances may warrant an inference of negligence in the transfer of the baggage at Jacksonville and its transportation to Hague, there is nothing to show any reckless or wanton disregard of plaintiff's rights. The delay in locating and delivering the baggage would not warrant an inference of willfulness, in view of the undisputed evidence of effort to trace and deliver. Roberts v. Tel. Co., 73 S. C. 523, 53 S. E. 985, 114 Am. St. Rep. 100; Butler v. Tel. Co., 77 S. C. 148, 57 S. E. 757.

3. It is excepted that the court erred in charging the jury that a railroad company has a right to adopt a regulation that a certain train shall not stop at designated stations, and one traveling as a passenger on such road is bound to inquire whether the train upon which he takes passage stops at the place to which he is going; the contention being that it is not the duty of the passenger to make such inquiry. There was conflict in the testimony as to whether plaintiff made any such inquiry. The instruction given is sustained by the case of Carter v. Railway, 75 S. C. 360, 55 S. E. 771, in which the court said: "There can be no doubt of the right of railroad companies to run passenger trains stopping only at important stations, provided reasonably adequate provision is made by other trains for the accommodation of local travel. Incident to this right of a railroad company is the duty of a passenger, be- fore boarding a train, to use diligence to ascertain if it stops at his destination; and, if the passenger fails to use the means of information at his command, he cannot complain of the resulting inconvenience or damage, even if on his refusal to pay the additional fare to the next regular stopping place he is ejected from the train." (Italics added.) The court further said: "As a general rule, where a passenger on account of the mistake of the carrier's agent boards a train not scheduled to stop at his station, the carrier has a right to correct the mistake by letting the passenger off at a stopping of that train before passing the passenger's destination, so that he may take the next train scheduled to stop at his destination; and it is the duty of the passenger to stop off and wait for such train." There were no exceptional circumstances in this case to take it out of the general rule.

4. The court instructed the jury that the ticket or contract in this case limited the value of the baggage to $100; that a railroad company has a right to limit its liability for baggage, and if the jury believed that the sum of $100 was a reasonable limitation, then nothing more than $100 can be recovered for the value of the baggage. It is alleged, first, that this was a charge in respect to a matter of fact, but we think this objection cannot be sustained. The ticket in question was identified by the agent who issued it and the conductor who punched it and was introduced in evidence without objection. The plaintiff raised no issue whatever as to the identity of the ticket issued to her as passenger. Under such circumstances the court has a right to assume as an undisputed fact that the ticket in evidence was the ticket issued to plaintiff. It is next contended that such charge should not have been given, as defendant had not pleaded any limitation of liability by contract. Judge Gage hesitated to so charge because of this. The complaint having alleged that defendant issued to plaintiff a ticket authorizing her to ride upon its train, as a part of her cause of action, and the ticket having been introduced in evidence without objection, and its identity not disputed, it was the province of the court to construe the terms of the ticket as a matter of law responsive to the testimony, even if strict pleading required defendant to plead the alleged limitation of liability as stated in the ticket. Russell v. Arthur, 17 S. C. 480; Harbert v. R. R. Co., 78 S. C. 549, 59 S. E. 644. The more serious objection to the charge is the last contention: That, plaintiff having paid full rate for the ticket, the limitation of liability with respect to baggage is not valid, even though the jury might think it reasonable. It is a well-settled rule that a common carrier cannot by contract exempt itself from liability for its negligence; but it is equally well settled that the carrier and shipper may make a special contract upon consideration, agreeing upon a valuation of property shipped in case of loss or damage. Johnstone v. R. R. Co., 39 S. C. 56, 17 S. E. 512. In Norman v. Southern Ry., 65 S. C. 517, 44 S. E. 83, 95 Am. St. Rep. 809, this court held that a passenger paying full fare for a general ticket is not bound by limitations printed thereon, unless his attention has been especially called to them, and he has assented thereto. As there was no conclusive evidence that plaintiff had received any consideration, in reduced charges or otherwise, for such a contract, and no conclusive evidence that she had knowledge of, and consented to, such special limitation or condition, it was error to hold the plaintiff bound by the limitation, if the jury deemed the limitation reasonable, as it is not the reasonableness of the limitation alone which binds the passenger, but it is his assent thereto upon consideration which binds or estops him. Nevertheless we do not think the error should work a reversal, as it is manifest from the verdict of $300 in favor of plaintiff that the jury did not regard the limitation of liability reasonable, and were not governed by it. There was no basis for punitive damages, as already shown, and there was no basis for more than a mere nominal sum for the slight delay involved in the transfer of plaintiff at Yemassee, hence it is fair to assume that the jury made their verdict upon their estimate of the loss to plaintiff by the delay in delivering the trunk and the damage to its contents.

The verdict is already for the plaintiff, and we see no good reason to believe that another trial would promote substantial justice in this case.

The judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

MARTIN v. HUTTO.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. April 13, 1909.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 425*)—NOTICE OF APPEAL—TIME FOR SERVICE.

Where a decree is filed out of term time, the 10 days allowed defendant to serve notice of intention to appeal does not commence to run until notice of the filing of the decree.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 2135, 2157; Dec. Dig. § 425.*]

2. NOTICE (§ 10*)—SERVICE BY MAIL.

Though Code Civ. Proc. 1902, § 410, provides that "service by mail may be made where the person making the service and the person on whom it is to be made reside in different places between which there is a regular communication by mail," the rights of a party will be held not concluded by a notice mailed, but not received by him, where no injury is shown to be the result of such holding.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Notice, Cent. Dig. § 24; Dec. Dig. § 10.*]

3. EXECUTION (§ 433*)—ARREST OF DEFENDANT—NOTICE TO SHOW CAUSE.

Code Civ. Proc. 1902, § 200, provides for the arrest of defendant in an action for fraudulent misapplication or embezzlement of plaintiff's property. Section 307 provides that no execution shall issue against the person of a judgment debtor unless an order of arrest has been served, or unless the complaint contains a statement of facts showing one or more of the causes of arrest. Held, that execution against a person may be issued without a rule to show cause when defendant has notice of the cause of action and the relief asked by service of the complaint on him, and he has had an opportunity in the trial to show why the allegations of fraudulent misappropriation or embezzlement are not well founded, and why the relief asked should not be granted.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Execution, Cent. Dig. § 1233; Dec. Dig. § 433.*]

4. EXECUTION (§ 426*)—ARREST OF DEFENDANT—RETURN OF EXECUTION AGAINST PROPERTY.

Under Code Civ. Proc. 1902, § 307, providing that an execution against the person of a judgment debtor may be issued after the return of an execution against his property unsatisfied in whole or in part, an execution cannot issue against the person until an execution against defendant's property has been returned unsatisfied.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Execution, Cent. Dig. § 1211; Dec. Dig. § 426.*]

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Lexington County; Chas. G. Dantzler, Judge.

Action by A. W. Martin against Paul E. Hutto. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order for execution for his arrest, defendant appeals. Modified.

See, also, 78 S. C. 560, 60 S. E. 34.

G. I. Graham, for appellant. De Pass & De Pass, for respondent.

WOODS, J. The facts in this case are fully set out in the circuit decree. The defendant did not appear at the reference or at the trial in the circuit court; but there can be no doubt of the correctness of the conclusion of Judge Dantzler that defendant was guilty of a fraudulent appropriation of plaintiff's one-half of the crops made by defendant on plaintiff's land under a share crop contract, and that the value of the property so appropriated was $768.14. The only real issue made by the appeal is whether the circuit judge erred in decreeing that the plaintiff have leave to issue an execution for the arrest of the defendant.

Before reaching this question, however, it is necessary to dispose of a motion made by plaintiff to dismiss the appeal, on the ground that the defendant had not given notice of intention to appeal within 10 days after notice of the filing of the decree. The decree was filed out of term time, and therefore the 10 days allowed to defendant to serve notice of intention to appeal did not commence to run until notice of the filing of the decree. Plaintiff's counsel mailed notice of the filing of the decree to the defendant and his attorney separately on the 1st day of October, 1907, under sections 410 and 411 of the Code of Civil Procedure of 1902, which provide:

"Service by mail may be made where the person making the service and the person on whom it is to be made reside in different places, between which there is a regular communication by mail.

"In case of service by mail, the paper must be deposited in the post office, addressed to the person on whom it is to be served, at his place of residence, and the postage paid."

The notice of intention to appeal was not served until November 30, 1907. There is no doubt of the mailing of the notice as required by statute, but the defendant and his attorney, Mr. Sharpe, submit affidavits that neither of the notices was received.

The important question is whether a party in such case is absolutely bound by the mailing of the notice to him, though he fails to receive it, and is thus shut out from his right of appeal. The point is not free from difficulty. There is strong reason for holding that the notice of the filing of the decree is not essential to the exercise of the right of appeal, for both parties might without hardship be held bound to take notice of the filing of the decree as an act taking place in a public office. Indeed, looked at from the technical legal standpoint, we think this the true view of the matter. Still the law contemplates that the losing party may rely on notice of the decree from the successful party, and we cannot think it was the intention to conclude the rights of a party by holding him bound by a notice mailed to him, but not received, where no injury has resulted to the other party, and the rights of third parties have not intervened. Service by mail in the manner required by the statute is good service, and all judgments and other completed legal proceedings resting thereon will be binding. Even in the course of the proceedings without a showing of injury to the adverse party, the service by mail in accordance with the statute will be regarded complete, and the party so served will not be relieved against the very strong presumption, except on clear proof that he was taken by surprise. There is no reason to doubt Mr. Sharpe's affidavit that notice failed to reach him. We have more hesitation in crediting the defendant's affidavit because of the very bad light in which he appears throughout the case. Nevertheless, as the plaintiff has lost no substantial right, we have concluded, though with hesitancy, to regard the presumption of the receipt of the notice overcome by defendant's sworn statement that it did not reach him. The motion to dismiss the appeal is refused.

The portion of the decree involved in the appeal adjudges: "That the plaintiff have leave forthwith to issue ca. sa. or execution against the person of the defendant in accordance with sections 200 and 308 of the Code of Civil Procedure of 1902, for the arrest of the defendant for fraudulently obtaining and procuring the assignment to himself of the lease and demise of the Blackville Road Plantation for the purpose of depriving plaintiff of the use thereof and benefits thereunder, and for fraudulently taking, detaining, or disposing of plaintiff's one-half of all crops raised upon the Blackville Road Plantation during the year 1904, and that said defendant be forthwith imprisoned in the county jail of Lexington county until said judgment of $768.14 and costs are paid, or until he be otherwise discharged in accordance with the provisions of law in such cases made and provided." The defendant contends that it was error to provide in the decree for an execution against the person of the defendant, first, because such an execution could not be issued against the defendant until he had been afforded an opportunity to show cause why the execution should not issue for his arrest; and, second, because the statute requires that execution against the person can be issued only after a return of execution against his property unsatisfied in whole or in part.

The first ground is untenable. The action, as clearly appears by the complaint, was for the fraudulent misapplication and embezzlement by the defendant of plaintiff's property, and therefore it fell under subdivision 1 of section 200 of the Code of Civil Procedure of 1902, which permits the arrest of the defendant in such case. Section 307 of the Code of Civil Procedure of 1902 provides: "If the action be one in which the defendant might have been arrested, as provided in section 200 and section 202, an execution against the person of a judgment debtor may be issued to any county within the jurisdiction of the court, after the return of an execution against his property unsatisfied in whole or in part. But no execution shall issue against the person of a judgment debtor, unless an order of arrest has been served, as in this Code of Procedure provided, or unless the complaint contains a statement of facts showing one or more of the causes of arrest required by section 200." This section of the Code evidently means that execution against the person may be issued without a rule to show cause when the defendant already had notice of the cause of action and the relief asked from the complaint served on him, and has had opportunity at the trial to show why the allegations of fraudulent misappropriation or embezzlement are not well founded, and why the relief asked should not be granted. The case of Kennesaw Mills v. Walker, 19 S. C. 112, is relied on by defendant as opposed to this conclusion; but that was a case of contempt under supplementary proceedings, involving different facts and principles of law.

The second point is more serious. Section 308 of Code of Civil Procedure of 1902 specifies the terms in which an execution against the person shall issue, but the condition on which it may issue is fixed by section 307, above quoted. The latter section in providing that it may issue "after the return of an execution against his (the judgment debtor's) property unsatisfied in whole or in part" clearly indicates that it may not issue until such return of an execution against his property. Indeed, there is no other statutory authority than section 307 for issuing an execution against the person, and hence such an execution can be issued only when the terms of that statute have been met. There was no return of an execution against the property of defendant unsatisfied in whole or in part. At the argument it was insisted that the defendant had gone into bankruptcy, and that bankruptcy was equivalent to a nulla bona return of an execution against the property of the bankrupt. This point, however, cannot be considered, as it does not appear from the case for appeal that the defendant is a bankrupt.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be modified so as to provide for the issuing of an execution against the property of the defendant, and for an execution against his person in the terms provided by the statute, and stated in the circuit decree, in case the execution against the property of the defendant be returned unsatisfied in whole or in part.

FOSTER v. BAILEY et al.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. April 9, 1909.)

1. VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§ 238*)—PURCHASER FROM BONA FIDE PURCHASER—EFFECT OF NOTICE.

A purchaser for value without notice of a prior unrecorded deed can convey a good title to one having notice thereof.

2. VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§ 232*)—BONA FIDE PURCHASER—NOTICE—POSSESSION.

Under Civ. Code 1902, § 2457, providing that the possession of real estate described in an instrument required by law to be recorded shall not operate as notice of such instrument, and actual notice shall be sufficient to supply the place of registration only when it is of the instrument itself or of its nature and import, the exclusive possession of land by a purchaser under an unrecorded deed would not be notice to a subsequent purchaser.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Spartanburg County; Ernest Gary, Judge.

Action by Amanda E. Foster against W. G. Bailey and another. From a judgment for plaintiff on a directed verdict, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Willson & Osborne, for appellants. Sanders & De Pass, for respondent.

JONES, J. This is an action to recover possession of land, and resulted in a verdict and judgment for the plaintiff by direction of the court.

Both parties claim under A. J. Chapman as the common source. In 1898 Chapman was owner of certain premises, being lots 4 and 5, as represented on plat of Wofford estate lands, and fronting 120 feet on North Church street, in the city of Spartanburg, S. C., and defendant Tucker was owner of lot No. 3 of said estate land lying north and adjacent to Chapman's premises. On March 5, 1898, Chapman conveyed to Tucker a portion of his said lot No. 4, being a strip adjacent to Tucker's lot and fronting 20 feet on North Church street, but the deed was not put on record until July 21, 1900. Tucker, however, immediately went into possession, and he and Chapman within a few days after the execution of the deed moved the fence formerly dividing their premises so as to place the said strip within Tucker's inclosure. Tucker has been in exclusive possession since the execution of his deed. In the meantime, on December 24, 1898, Chapman conveyed to Dr. Julian H. Allen in consideration of $900 the said lots 4 and 5 described as fronting 120 feet on North Church street without making any reference to the portion thereof previously conveyed to Tucker, and this deed was recorded January 23, 1899. By deed dated December 4, 1904, recorded February 1, 1905, consideration $1,075, Allen conveyed the premises to R. H. Foster, describing the same as in Chapman's deed to him. By deed dated July 22, 1906, recorded February 28, 1906, consideration love and affection and $1, the heirs at law of R. H. Foster conveyed the premises with same description to plaintiff.

The real contest in this appeal is whether there was any testimony tending to show that Dr. Allen at the time of his purchase had notice of the previous unrecorded deed of Chapman to Tucker; for, if there was no such testimony, the direction of a verdict for plaintiff was proper under the undisputed facts. The fact that the deed from Chapman to Tucker was recorded before the conveyance to R. H. Foster would not prevent plaintiff's recovery if Allen had no notice when he purchased, under the principle that a purchaser for value without notice can convey a good title to one with notice; the immunity of the grantor's title passing to the grantee. Jones v. Hudson, 23 S. C. 501; Williams v. Jones, 74 S. C. 262, 54 S. E. 558; 23 Ency. Law (2d Ed.) 477; 24 Ency. Law (2d Ed.) 134. There was testimony that Tucker was in exclusive possession of the lot in question at the time Allen purchased, but section 2457, Civ. Code 1902, provides: "No possession of real property described in any instrument of writing required by law to be recorded shall operate as notice of such instrument; and actual notice shall be deemed and held sufficient to supply the place of registration only when such notice is of the instrument itself or of its nature and import." This statute, approved December 24, 1888, changed the rule declared in Sheorn v. Robinson, 22 S. C. 32, Daniel v. Hester, 29 S. C. 147, 7 S. E. 65, and like cases, that possession is notice of an unrecorded deed. The cases of Harman v. Southern Ry., 72 S. C. 235, 51 S. E. 689, and Southern Ry. v. Howell, 79 S. C. 236, 60 S. E. 677, are not conclusive for appellant, as the possession under an unrecorded deed in each of those cases arose at a time when the rule in Daniel v. Hester was in force, and was a continuing possession at the time the subsequent deed was made. There was, however, testimony that before Allen bought he was shown the premises by Epton and Hottell, agents of Chapman, and knew that the property he was negotiating to purchase was the property lying between the fences; that some two or three years after Allen purchased and before he conveyed to Foster the fence to which Tucker claimed was repaired and Allen paid for one-half the expenses; that during his ownership Allen never made any claim against Tucker for the lot in dispute; and that Allen after his purchase declared to Chapman that, when he bought, he supposed there was a frontage of 120 feet between the fences. Dr. Allen testified that he had no notice of the unrecorded deed, that he gave no attention to the location of fence and paid for one-half of its repair at the request of Tucker without examination, and that he bought the property as described in the deed.

We agree with the circuit court that the testimony did not tend to show such actual notice of the unrecorded deed or its nature or import as required by statute to take the place of recording. We have hesitated to reach this conclusion because of the apparent hardship to defendant Tucker, but, after consideration, we see no way to avoid it under the terms of the statute. The case illustrates the danger of negligence in complying with the recording statute.

We do not regard the remaining exceptions as presenting any matter justifying reversal. The judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

STATE v. TURNER.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. April 9, 1909.)

1. SEDUCTION (§ 34*)—PROMISE OF MARRIAGE.

In order to establish seduction, the state must prove beyond a reasonable doubt that prosecutrix was induced to have unlawful sexual intercourse with accused by means of his deception and promise of marriage.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Seduction, Cent. Dig. § 58; Dec. Dig. § 34.*]

2. SEDUCTION (§ 46*)—PROSECUTION—EVIDENCE—CORROBORATION.

Under Act Feb. 22, 1905, 24 St. at Large, p. 937, providing that no conviction shall be had for seduction on the uncorroborated evidence of the woman upon whom the seduction is charged, a verdict of acquittal should have been directed, where prosecutrix's evidence was not corroborated.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Seduction, Cent. Dig. §§ 83-86; Dec. Dig. § 46.*]

3. INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION (§ 109*)—REQUISITES—STATUTORY OFFENSES.

In charging a statutory offense, every essential ingredient of the crime must be alleged.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Indictment and Information, Cent. Dig. § 286; Dec. Dig. § 109.*]

4. SEDUCTION (§ 37*)—INDICTMENT—ALLEGATIONS—CHASTITY.

Under Act Feb. 22, 1905, 24 St. at Large, p. 937, providing that no conviction shall be had for seduction if it is proved that prosecutrix was at the time of the alleged offense lewd and unchaste, her chastity need not be alleged in the indictment; the want of chastity being a matter of defense.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Seduction, Cent. Dig. § 64; Dec. Dig. § 37.*]

Appeal from General Sessions Circuit Court of Lexington County.

B. G. Turner was convicted of seduction, and he appeals. Reversed and remanded for new trial.

Nelson & Nelson and Graham & Sturkie, for appellant. G. B. Timmerman and W. W. Hawes, for the State.

WOODS, J. The defendant, B. G. Turner, was convicted of seduction by the court of general sessions for Lexington county. The appeal to this court involves two inquiries: First. Was there any corroboration of the testimony of the prosecutrix to warrant the submission of the case to the jury? Second. On the charge of seduction is the previous chastity of the prosecutrix a material ingredient of the crime to be established by the state?

The statute under which the defendant was indicted was as follows: "That any male person above the age of sixteen years, who shall, by any means of deception and promise of marriage, seduce any unmarried woman in this state, shall, upon conviction, be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be fined or imprisoned at the discretion of the court; but no conviction shall be had under this section on the uncorroborated testimony of the woman upon whom the seduction is charged; and no conviction shall be had if on trial it is proved that such woman was at the time of the alleged offense lewd and unchaste." Act Feb. 22, 1906, 24 St. at Large, p. 937. Save for the testimony of the prosecutrix, there was no evidence whatever of "any means of deception and promise of marriage" on the part of the defendant. In order to establish the crime of seduction, the state must prove beyond a reasonable doubt, with evidence corroborative of the testimony of the prosecutrix, that she was induced to have unlawful sexual intercourse with the accused by means of his deception and promise of marriage. Kenyon v. People, 26 N. Y. 203, 84 Am. Dec. 181; State v. McCaskey, 104 Mo. 644, 16 S. W. 511; Harvey v. Territory, 11 Okl. 156, 65 Pac. 837; McCullar v. State, 36 Tex. Cr. R. 213, 36 S. W. 585, 61 Am. St. Rep. 847; Mills v. Commonwealth, 93 Va. 815, 22 S. E. 863; Ferguson v. State, 71 Miss. 805, 15 South. 66, 42 Am. St. Rep. 492; Cooper v. State, 90 Ala. 641, 8 South. 821; Russell v. State, 77 Neb. 519, 110 N. W. 380; Wilhite v. State, 84 Ark. 67, 104 S. W. 531; State v. Raynor, 145 N. C. 472, 59 S. E. 344; State v. Brown, 65 N. J. Law, 687, 51 Atl. 1109, and others. There being no corroborative evidence on this material issue, the defendant was entitled to a direction of a verdict of acquittal.

The next exception, taken to the charge of the circuit judge, involves the proposition whether the chastity of the woman is presumed in the first instance, or whether it must be proved by the state as one of the ingredients of the crime. The portion of the charge excepted to is as follows: "That the defendant is bound to prove by the preponderance of the evidence that the prosecutrix was lewd and unchaste. If you have any doubt as to where the preponderance of the evidence is, that you will give the benefit of that reasonable doubt to the defendant. Understand me that the defendant must prove by the preponderance of the evidence, not beyond a reasonable doubt, that the prosecutrix was lewd and unchaste. If you have any doubt as to where the preponderance of the evidence is, then you will give the prisoner the benefit of that reasonable doubt." The conflict of authority as to whether in a case of seduction the chastity of the prosecutrix is to be presumed or proved by the state may be attributed in a measure to the different phrasing of the statutes of the several states, setting out the crime. In Mis- statute requires the victim to be "any unmarried woman of good repute"; and it devolves upon the prosecution to allege and prove "good repute." This is the rule in some other states where the wording of the statutes is similar. Zabriskie v. State, 43 N. J. Law, 640, 39 Am. Rep. 610; Oliver v. Commonwealth, 101 Pa. 215, 47 Am. Rep. 704; Commonwealth v. Whittaker, 131 Mass. 224. In some states where the statute requires that the woman be "of previous chaste character" the same rule as to allegation and proof applies. State v. Lockerby, 50 Minn. 363, 52 N. W. 958, 36 Am. St. Rep. 656; Ex parte Vandiveer, 4 Cal. App. 650, 88 Pac. 994; Harvey v. Territory, 11 Okl. 156, 65 Pac. 837. Where nothing is provided in the statute as to character, it has been laid down in some jurisdictions that previous chastity of the woman is essential to the offense and must be proved by the state. Norton v. State, 72 Miss. 128, 16 South. 264, 18 South. 916, 48 Am. St. Rep. 539; West v. State, 1 Wis. 209.

The following decisions uphold the view that the chastity of the woman upon whom the seduction is charged is presumed: Kerr v. U. S. (Ind. T.) 104 S. W. 809; Wilhite v. State, 84 Ark. 67, 104 S. W. 531; Caldwell v. State, 73 Ark. 139, 83 S. W. 929, 108 Am. St. Rep. 28; Andre v. State, 5 Iowa, 389, 68 Am. Dec. 708; Mills v. Commonwealth, 93 Va. 815, 22 S. E. 863; Smith v. State, 118 Ala. 117, 24 South. 55; People v. Kenyon, 26 N. Y. 203, 84 Am. Dec. 177; McTyler v. State, 91 Ga. 254, 18 S. E. 140. A close observation of our statute causes us to adopt this conclusion. It has been a settled rule of pleading in this state from early times that, in order to charge a statutory offense, every ingredient necessary to make up the crime must be alleged in the indictment and proved by the prosecution. State v. Foster, 3 McCord, 442; State v. O'Bannon, 1 Bailey, 144; State v. Henderson, 1 Rich. Law, 184; State v. Coleman, 17 S. C. 473; State v. Evans, 18 S. C. 137; State v. Jeter, 47 S. C. 2, 24 S. E. 889; State v. Jeffcoat, 54 S. C. 196, 32 S. E. 298. The portion of the statute now under discussion is: "No conviction shall be had if on trial it is proved that such woman was at the time of the alleged offense lewd and unchaste." The incorporation of the clause "if on trial it is proved" shows conclusively that the General Assembly did not intend the chastity of the injured woman to be an ingredient of the offense necessary to be set up in the indictment. The exception to the charge of the trial judge is overruled.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial. All concur.

CLIO GIN CO. v. WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH CO.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. April 9, 1909.)

1. TELEGRAPHS AND TELEPHONES (§ 67*)—DELAY IN DELIVERY OF MESSAGE—DAMAGES.

A cotton oil company sent plaintiff, engaged in buying cotton seed, a telegram stating that the sender would pay a certain amount and commissions for seed purchased, and in an action for negligent delay in delivering the message plaintiff claimed that, if the message had been delivered within a reasonable time, it could have bought seed at a slight excess of the amount named in the telegram, which would have been allowable under its contract with the oil company, and that it had lost storage charges allowable to it under such contract. Held, that such elements were not recoverable in the absence of a showing that defendant had knowledge of such provisions.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Telegraphs and Telephones, Cent. Dig. § 65; Dec. Dig. § 67.*]

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1177*)—NEW TRIAL—NECESSITY.

On January 4th a cotton oil company sent plaintiff a telegram, instructing it to buy cotton seed for shipment on the 15th. In an action for delay in delivering the message, there was no evidence that plaintiff could have procured the necessary cars and have loaded them within the required time. Held, on appeal by plaintiff, that as there was danger of loss in weights in handling, and as the court would notice that there would be expenses incurred in loading, there was no reasonable ground for believing that plaintiff could have suffered any material certain loss by being deprived of the privilege of storing or handling cotton seed at 15 cents per ton, and a new trial on such ground would not be ordered.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 4597; Dec. Dig. § 1177.*]

3. PLEADING (§ 237*)—AMENDMENT—CONFORMITY TO PROOF.

Code Civ. Proc. 1902, § 194, provides that amendments to conform a pleading to the proof may be allowed when the amendment does not substantially change the claim or defense. Held, that it was proper to deny a motion to amend the complaint to conform to the proof after argument on motion for a nonsuit, which was granted, when the amendment would involve striking out material allegations and inserting other allegations.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. §§ 603-619; Dec. Dig. § 237.*]

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Marlboro County; Robert Aldrich, Judge.

Action by the Clio Gin Company against the Western Union Telegraph Company. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Livingston & Muller, for appellant. Willcox & Willcox and Townsend & Rogers, for respondent.

JONES, J. The plaintiff appeals from an order of nonsuit in this action to recover damages for negligent delay in delivering a telegram sent by South Carolina Cotton Oil Company, Columbia, S. C., to plaintiff at Clio, S. C., on the afternoon of January 4, 1904, and not delivered until the morning of January 6, 1904; the message being as follows: "Will pay nineteen dollars and commissions for seed shipped by the 15th inst."

Assuming that there was a negligent delay in delivering the telegram, the real question was whether there was testimony that plaintiff sustained any damage as the direct and proximate result of such negligence.

The complaint alleged in part: "(7) That the plaintiff was engaged in, among other things, the purchase of cotton seed, and on the 5th day of January, 1904, had offered to it and had the option, privilege, and opportunity of purchasing 58,000 bushels of cotton seed at and for the price named in said telegram.

"(8) That by reason of the careless and negligent conduct of the defendant in failing to deliver said message within a reasonable time, conveying to the plaintiff the information therein contained, the plaintiff was prevented from offering, and did not offer, to pay $19 per ton for cotton seed on said 5th day of January, A. D. 1904, in consequence of which plaintiff did not buy said 58,000 bushels of cotton seed, but the same were sold to other party or parties, who offered and paid such price for same.

"(9) That this plaintiff had a fixed and determined commission and profit by agreement on all cotton seed which it bought which would have included the lot hereinbefore mentioned, all of which the defendant well knew, and, owing to the careless and negligent conduct of the defendant in failing to deliver said telegram within a reasonable time, this plaintiff did not purchase said lot of 58,000 bushels, and thereby was deprived of making and realizing such profit and commission, to its damages $1,160."

It appears that the market price of cotton seed at Clio, S. C., just previous to January 4, 1904, was from 22 to 25 cents per bushel, but that on January 4th it jumped to 30 cents per bushel; that plaintiff, who had been buying seed for the Southern Cotton Oil Company, telegraphed for instructions, and kept out of the market, awaiting response to its telegram. There was testimony that, if the telegram in question had been promptly delivered, plaintiff could have purchased about 30,000 bushels of cotton seed on January 5th at 30 cents per bushel, or $20 per ton, $1 per ton more than the telegram in terms authorized. According to the testimony, plaintiff's commission would have been $1 per ton, so that, to have purchased at all, plaintiff would have been compelled to sacrifice the entire amount of the commission, and have its trouble and expense for nothing. But it is contended that plaintiff had an agreement with Southern Cotton Oil Company to buy seed for them at $1 per ton for commission and 15 cents per ton for storage, and that in any event plaintiff sustained a loss of 15 cents per ton. In the first place, there was no evidence that the defendant company had any knowledge that plaintiff was liable to sustain any loss by reason of storage, and certainly the face of the telegram negatives any idea that loss of storage was within the contemplation of the parties. Loss of compensation for storage was not a necessary result of defendant's delict, and would fall within the class of special damages, due to special circumstances, as to which it was necessary for plaintiff to allege and prove that defendant had knowledge at the time of the filing of the telegram. Mood v. Telegraph Co., 40 S. C. 528, 19 S. E. 67. But, in the next place, if it should be conceded that a loss of 15 cents per ton for storage was in contemplation of the parties, it must be remembered that plaintiff, in order to avail itself of the contents of the telegram, was required to ship the cotton seed by the 15th of January. This required the procuring of the necessary cars and loading same by that date from wagons or warehouses. There was no evidence that plaintiff within the time allowed could have procured the necessary cars, 30 or more, an average car load being probably about 1,000 bushels or 15 tons of seed, and have loaded them within the time required. The court is bound to take notice that cotton seed cannot be loaded upon cars from warehouses or wagons without expense. There was also danger of loss to plaintiff by waste or in weights in the handling, except by the greatest care and oversight. Now, in view of all these matters, the court cannot say there is reasonable ground for believing that plaintiff could have suffered any material certain loss by being deprived of the privilege of storing or handling cotton seed at fifteen cents per ton when such privilege was burdened with a certain loss and expense reasonably equal to if not greater than that amount. A new trial on this ground would not comport with the practical administration of justice.

It is finally argued that there was evidence of an agreement between the Southern Cotton Oil Company and plaintiff that plaintiff in buying cotton seed for that company could give the designated market price for seed and still have a leverage or margin of two cents per bushel; that is to say, if the Southern Cotton Oil Company authorized plaintiff to buy seed at 28½ cents per bushel, plaintiff could stay in the market and buy for them as long as cotton seed did not advance beyond 30½ cents per bushel, the point being that, if the telegram had been promptly delivered, plaintiff could have paid the price of 30 cents per bushel, and still have been entitled to the commission of $1 per ton, and that by the delay in delivery plaintiff lost the commissions on the seed it would have purchased. There was nothing on the face of the message to show, nor does it appear to have been within the knowledge of defendant, that there was such a contract between the sender and sendee of the message. The plain terms of the message negatives the idea that plaintiff was authorized to pay more than $19 per ton for seed and receive therefor the commissions. The case in this aspect fails because of the rule stated that, in order to affect the telegraph company with liability for injury arising out of a special circumstance, notice of such circumstance should be brought home to the defendant by allegation and proof. The complaint alleged, in conformity with the natural import of the telegram, that, by reason of the delay in delivering the telegram, plaintiff was prevented from purchasing cotton seed at $19 per ton. On this theory of the complaint there was a failure of proof, as it was undisputed that seed on that day could not have been purchased for less than $20 per ton. But we have considered the complaint as if it alleged that plaintiff was prevented from purchasing seed at $20 per ton; that is $19 per ton and $1 additional consuming commissions, as embraced within the terms of the telegram and the knowledge of the defendant.

At the close of argument by plaintiff's counsel on the motion for nonsuit, plaintiff's counsel moved that, in case the court reached the conclusion that there was any variance between the allegations and proof, leave be granted to amend the complaint to correspond with the proof. The terms of the proposed amendment do not appear, and we are left to speculate as to the exact amendment sought. Judge Aldrich held that the motion came too late under the authority of Cuthbert v. Brown, 49 S. C. 513, 27 S. E. 485. In that case the court held that a motion to amend an answer by withdrawing an admission of a material fact and substituting a denial thereof, changing the nature of the defense, comes too late after the trial gone into and motion for nonsuit refused. This was in principle the situation in the case at bar. To have amended the complaint to conform to the facts proved after argument on motion for nonsuit which was granted, when the amendment would involve striking out material allegations of the complaint and inserting other material and essential allegations, would have changed plaintiff's claim in conflict with section 194, Code Civ. Proc. 1902, which expressly provides that amendments to conform the pleading to the facts proved may be allowed "when the amendment does not change substantially the claim or defense." Taylor v. Atlantic Coast Line R. R. Co., 81 S. C. 574, 62 S. E. 1118.

But, even if the complaint had been amended to conform to the facts proved so as to allege the special circumstances brought out in the testimony, still nonsuit was proper, as there was a total failure of testimony to show that defendant company had any knowledge that the telegram, which was plain and intelligible itself, meant something other than the natural import of its terms.

The judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

BLEVINS v. ERWIN COTTON MILLS CO.
(Supreme Court of North Carolina. April 21, 1909.)

1. JURY (§ 92*)—JURORS—COMPETENCY—EMPLOYEE OF PARTY.

An employé is an incompetent juror in a cause involving a right or interests of the employer.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Jury, Cent. Dig. § 420; Dec. Dig. § 92.*]

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1045*)—HARMLESS ERROR—OVERRULED OBJECTION TO JUROR.

Error in overruling a challenge to a juror for cause was harmless where he was peremptorily challenged, and no prejudice appears.

3. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 270*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—MACHINERY—SUBSEQUENT AND PRECEDENT CONDITION—EVIDENCE.

On an issue as to the condition of an object at a given time—e. g., machinery claimed to have been defective—its precedent or subsequent condition may be shown when the circumstances make it probable that no change has occurred, but the rule does not affect the rule that voluntary changes by an employer made after injury to an employé are not admissible to impute negligence to the employer.

4. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 101*)—PLACE OF WORK AND MACHINERY—EMPLOYER'S DUTY.

One must provide for his employé a reasonably safe place to work, and machinery, etc., safe and suitable for their work, and such as are approved and in general use, and is liable for any injury caused by a breach of such duty.

7. TRIAL (§ 253*)—INJURY TO EMPLOYÉ—INSTRUCTIONS.

An instruction in an action for injury claimed to have been caused by a defective catch used to fasten a door in a revolving cylinder was not erroneous for ignoring evidence tending to show absence of another device which does not appear to have been, nor to have been used as, a safety device.

Appeal from Superior Court, Durham County; E. B. Jones, Judge.

Action by Rufus Blevins, by Columbus Blevins, next friend, against the Erwin Cotton Mills Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Plaintiff objected to a juror because an employé of defendant company. Objection overruled, and plaintiff excepted. The juror was then challenged peremptorily. The challenge was allowed. The negligence alleged against the defendant, as indicated in the complaint, was that the door of one of the machines where the plaintiff was required to work, and at which he was injured, "was defective, and had been for many weeks, in that the catch on said door was very weak, so that the door was liable to fly open, and that defendant well knew, or ought to have known, the dangerous condition of the cylinder when said door was open, and well knew, or ought to have known, the dangerous condition of the fastenings on said door, and that said machine was old and had been used for many years; but defendant negligently and carelessly failed to warn plaintiff of the danger of working thereat, and carelessly and negligently failed to equip said door with proper and suitable fastenings, and that the defective condition of the door was unknown to plaintiff." During the trial the defendant was allowed, over plaintiff's objection, to show by a witness, John Burroughs, and some others, that they had examined the machine a short time before the trial, and the door was all right, and the catch thereon in good order. This in connection with the statement of a witness E. K. Poe, manager of defendant, who had testified that the catch and door were in exactly the same condition as they were at the time of the injury: "The same catch there now that was then, same knobs and same latch. No repairs or changes had been made, and nothing done to them since." Plaintiff excepted. There was evidence on the part of plaintiff tending to show that on or about December 26, 1906, the plaintiff, an employé of defendant company, had his hand caught in a carding machine, where he was at work, and crushed and mangled to such an extent that amputation was necessary; that the cards were on a cylinder some six feet in diameter, and which revolved when the machine was in operation 160 to 200 times per minute; that this cylinder was inclosed in a casing, and in front there was a door some 10 inches wide and extending across the frame, forming, when closed, a part of this casing. This door was on hinges and opened downwards, and as it was raised and closed, and when in 2½ or 3 inches of the closing point, it would fall shut of itself, and was held shut by gravity, and also by a latch and catch which held it securely when in place and in good order; that the door was for the purpose of enabling a person to open the same and clean the cylinder, and was kept shut except when the cylinder was being cleaned; that above the door there was in some of the machines a stripping stick, which also revolved when the machine was in motion, its service being to catch and hold the waste cotton rejected by the cards, and thrown from the machine through a slight opening by the movement of the cylinder. At the time of the injury plaintiff, in the line of his employment, was engaged in running fronts on cards; i. e., "doffing out the cans, taking down the stripplings from over the cylinders, and taking off the waste from over the sticks." Making an excerpt from the plaintiff's own testimony: "While so engaged, was hurt in the cylinder of a carding machine. My hand was cut off at the wrist. Over the cylinder was a steel or iron case. There was a door in the case which fitted over the cylinder. I was taking down the stripping, and went to card off the stripping with my left hand, when the cylinder caught my fingers. The door was open. I did not know it was open. If the door had been closed, my hand would not have gotten in the cylinder, could not see that the door was open, because cotton waste was lying over it. I did not open the door. If the stripping stick had been on, this waste cotton would have rolled around the stripping stick, and not fallen on the face of the machine," etc. That, when he went to work in the evening, the stripping stick was off, and there was a lot of waste cotton lying on the machine, and in brushing this away his hand was caught and mangled by reason of the open door, as stated, and that this cotton piled on the machine prevented him from seeing that the door was open. Will A. Carden, a witness for the plaintiff, testified, among other things: "That in operating these carding machines, when the spring is in position as it ought to be, there is nothing that will knock the door down, but if the spring is weak and up, and the door does not catch, a lump of cotton will knock it down and cause the door to fall open on the machine. When the door is closed, it is a part of the casing that covers the cylinders. If there is no stripping stick over the card, the waste cotton falls down in the casing, and, when it does, it conceals the door."

There was evidence on the part of the defendant that the machine at which plaintiff was injured was a standard machine, and in good order at the time of the injury; that it had been continuously in use since, and that no change or repairs had been made; and that it was in good order now. Several witnesses who examined the machine testified to its being in excellent condition. E. K. Powe, manager of defendant, testified to the good condition of the machine on the day of the injury, and no notice or complaint had ever been made concerning it. R. P. Kirley, overseer of the card department, testified as to the good condition of the machine; that he was continuously in the room and passed the machine frequently during the day; that its condition was all right and no defect in it, and no notice or complaint had ever been made by any one. This witness further testified that it was no part of defendant's duty to strip this machine, and nothing in the line of his work that called him to go nearer than two feet of it; the work plaintiff was engaged in at the time being the work of one S. C. Howell, a co-employee. There was further evidence on part of the defendant that the stripping stick was there more for gathering the waste cotton and putting it in a more compact form; and both plaintiff's and defendant's witnesses testified that the stripping stick was in no way connected with the door or its uses as a structural part of the machine, and that, when the door was closed, there was no danger in doing the work at which plaintiff was engaged when the injury occurred.

There were four issues submitted: (1) As to the negligence of defendant. (2) As to contributory negligence on part of plaintiff. (3) As to assumption of risk. (4) Damages. The jury answered the first issue, "No." Judgment on the verdict, and plaintiff, for errors properly assigned, excepted and appealed.

Manning & Foushee, for appellant. Aycock & Winston and Bryant & Brogden, for appellee.

HOKE, J. (after stating the facts as above). We have carefully considered the exceptions noted in the record, and find no reversible error to plaintiff's prejudice. It is very generally held that an employé is an incompetent juror for the trial of a cause involving the right or interests of the employer, and the plaintiff's objection should have been sustained. Railroad v. Mitchell, 63 Ga. 173; Railroad v. Mask, 64 Miss. 738, 2 South. 360. But the juror was challenged peremptorily, and it does not appear that the plaintiff's rights were in any way prejudiced by this ruling of the court. We have uniformly held that this right of challenge is given to afford a party litigant fair opportunity to remove objectionable jurors, and was not intended to enable them to se-the trial of this case. In order to prevent subjecting a person charged with crime to the harassment of several trials the statute allows the state to appeal from the judgment of the court in only four instances: (1) Upon a special verdict; (2) upon a demurrer; (3) upon motion to quash; (4) upon arrest of judgment. The statute does not provide for an appeal from a judgment upon a demurrer to the evidence, but only upon a demurrer. The word is used in the statute in its usual and ordinary significance as understood and defined in criminal pleading. In criminal law "a demurrer is a pleading by which the legality of the last preceding pleading is denied and put in issue, and the issue is then determined by the court. A demurrer is pleaded either to the indictment, or to a special plea." 1 Archbold, Crim. Prac. & Pldg. 354. The reason the state is permitted to appeal from the judgment upon demurrer to an indictment is because it has the effect, in criminal cases, of opening the whole record to the court, and under it the jurisdiction of the court may be challenged, as well as the sufficiency of the subject-matter of the indictment itself.

The expression "demurrer to the evidence" is not strictly accurate as applied to criminal proceedings, for the reason that the trial judge, if he overruled the demurrer, could not direct a verdict against the defendant or give judgment against him upon the demurrer, as it has been held he could do in civil actions. In a criminal trial the jury must still pass on the weight of the state's evidence. In reference to a demurrer to evidence Black says: "This proceeding (now practically obsolete) was analogous to a demurrer to a pleading. It was an objection by one of the parties to an action at law, to the effect that the evidence which his adversary had produced was insufficient in point of law to make out his case or sustain the issue. Upon joinder in such demurrer the jury was discharged, and the case was argued to the court, who gave judgment upon the facts as shown in evidence." Law Dictionary, title "Demurrer to Evidence." The practice of demurring to the evidence appears to be of ancient origin, and is thus described by Blackstone: "But a demurrer to evidence shall be determined by the court out of which the record is sent. This happens where a record or other matter is produced in evidence concerning the legal consequences of which there arises a doubt in law, in which case the adverse party may, if he pleases, demur to the whole evidence; which admits the truth of every fact that has been alleged, but denies the sufficiency of them all in point of law to maintain or overthrow the issue; which draws the question of law from the cognizance of the jury to be decided (as it ought) by the court. But neither these demurrers to evidence, nor the bills of exception, are at present so much in use as formerly, since the more frequent extension of the discretionary powers of the court in granting a new trial, which is now very commonly had for the misdirection of the judge at nisi prius." After joinder in the demurrer to the evidence, if the proper facts or admissions have been made to appear, the court may direct a verdict. 6 Enc. Pldg. & Pract. 451. This the court is inhibited from doing upon the trial of a criminal action.

Our statutes use both the word "demurrer" and the phrase "demurrer to the evidence," and in declaring what is meant by the latter, the statute confines its use to the trial of issues of fact in civil actions exclusively. Revisal 1905, § 539. From the statute it is plain that the General Assembly, when it adopted the Revisal, did not use the word "demurrer" in section 3279 in the sense that it used the phrase "demurrer to evidence" in section 539. Demurring to the evidence is now regulated by statute, and is peculiar to civil actions, and has no place in criminal proceedings, and tends only to delay. In this state there is no such procedure as trying a defendant upon an "agreed state of facts," or upon a demurrer to the evidence. He must be tried by the jury, and a verdict rendered. If it is a special verdict, it must nevertheless be rendered by the jury, and it is their finding, and not that of the judge. State v. Holt, 90 N. C. 750, 47 Am. Rep. 544.

Inasmuch as his honor stopped the trial, and no verdict was rendered, the case is still pending in the superior court, and it is the duty of the solicitor, as upon a mistrial, to proceed to try the defendant again under the indictment.

Appeal dismissed.

ALEXANDER v. METROPOLITAN LIFE INS. CO.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. April 23, 1909.)

INSURANCE (§ 291*)—LIFE POLICY—REPRESENTATIONS—MATERIALITY—UNTRUTH—"MATERIAL REPRESENTATION."

A statement in an application for life insurance that applicant had never had any disease of the kidneys is a material representation within Revisal 1905, § 4808, the untruth of which is a defense to the policy, irrespective of whether the statement was fraudulently made.

Appeal from Superior Court, Cabarrus County; Justice, Judge.

Action by Caroline Alexander against the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. & Am. Digs. 1907 to date, & Reporter Indexes.

This action was based on a life insurance policy, issued by the defendant company on the life of Pearl Alexander in favor of Caroline Alexander, the appellee, as beneficiary. The defense to the action was based on certain provisions of the policy, declaring it void if the insured, before its date, had been attended by a physician for any serious disease or complaint, or had any disease of the kidneys.

The following findings were made by the jury: (1) Did Pearl Alexander, the insured, in her application for insurance, falsely represent that she had not been attended by a physician for any complaint within two years prior to making such application? Answer: No. (2) Was Pearl Alexander attended by a physician for any serious disease or complaint within two years before the policy was issued for the plaintiff? Answer: Yes. (3) Did Pearl Alexander falsely represent that she had not had kidney disease? Answer: No. (4) Had Pearl Alexander, prior to making application for the policy sued on, had kidney trouble? Answer: Yes.

The defendant moved for judgment upon the issues and assigns the refusal to grant same as error. The court denied the motion and gave judgment for plaintiff. Defendant excepted and appealed.

Adams, Armfield, Jerome & Maness, for appellant. W. G. Means, for appellee.

BROWN, J. The insured, Pearl Alexander, was a child about 15 years of age, whose life was insured on March 18, 1907, by defendant for the benefit of plaintiff, her mother by adoption and great-aunt by blood. Insured died in April, 1908, according to the evidence, of an abscess in the kidney. There is a statement in the application, which is the basis of the policy, that insured had never had any disease of the kidneys. The evidence fully sustains the finding of the jury that prior to the application for insurance the girl had kidney disease and was being treated for it by a physician. The insurance contract contains the following clause: "This policy is void if the insured before its date (meaning date of policy) had been rejected for insurance by any other company, or has been attended by a physician for any serious disease or complaint, or has had before said date any pulmonary disease or chronic bronchitis, or cancer, or disease of the heart, liver or kidneys," etc. It must be conceded that the representation is a most material one, within the meaning and scope of the statute. Revisal 1905, § 4808; Bryant v. Insurance Co., 147 N. C. 181, 60 S. E. 983. Such a representation undoubtedly influenced the judgment of the company in accepting the risk, and it is therefore a material representation. Under the facts of this case, it matters not that the insured made no false representation. She made a most material representation which was untrue, for she had kidney disease before the application for insurance, was being treated for it at the time, and died of the disease 13 months thereafter. The company was imposed upon (whether fraudulently or not is immaterial) by such representation and induced to enter into the contract. In such case it has been said by the highest court that, "assuming that both parties acted in good faith, justice would require that the contract be canceled and premiums returned." Life Insurance Co. v. Fletcher, 117 U. S. 519, 6 Sup. Ct. 837, 29 L. Ed. 934. The case at bar is governed by the principles laid down in Bryant v. Insurance Co., supra.

It appears in the record that the premiums have been voluntarily paid into the superior court by the defendant. It is ordered that they be applied to the costs of this appeal, and that the remainder, if any, after paying costs below, be paid to plaintiff.

The motion for judgment for defendant is allowed. Let costs be taxed against plaintiff.

Reversed.

QUANTZ v. CITY OF CONCORD.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. April 28, 1909.)

EMINENT DOMAIN (§ 69*)—GRADING STREET.

On a proceeding to condemn land for widening a street under Priv. Laws 1907, p. 934, c. 344, § 90, the owner is entitled to damages from the taking of and injury to the property, allowing deduction for benefits, irrespective of whether the work is done in a skillful manner.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Eminent Domain, Cent. Dig. § 172; Dec. Dig. § 69.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Cabarrus County; Council, Judge.

Action by Mrs. C. J. Quantz against the City of Concord. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

W. G. Means and L. T. Hartsell, for appellant. Montgomery & Crowell, for appellee.

WALKER, J. This is a proceeding for the condemnation of a part of the plaintiff's lot on East Corbin street, in Concord, for the purpose of widening the street, under Priv. Laws 1907, p. 934, c. 344, § 90. The court charged the jury that the plaintiff is entitled to recover the damages which resulted from taking the property, and laid down the correct rule as to the facts and circumstances they might consider, and which the evidence tended to establish, in determining the amount of the damages. In this respect the charge was as favorable to the defendant as the law allowed. It is not necessary to set out the instructions to which exceptions were taken, as the defendant's contention is that the city of Concord is not liable for damages resulting from the grading of streets unless the work is done in an unskillful manner, and for this position counsel cite the following cases: Wolfe v. Pearson, 114 N. C. 621, 19 S. E. 264; Wright v. Wilmington, 92 N. C. 156; Meares v. Wilmington, 81 N. C. 73, 49 Am. Dec. 412; Jones v. Henderson, 147 N. C. 120, 60 S. E. 894. In those cases the plaintiffs did not sue for compensation rightfully due for the taking of their property, under the power of condemnation given by the charters of the respective cities, but in tort for the damages resulting from the negligent and unskillful manner of repairing or grading the streets. They were seeking to recover damages, not due by the defendants in the lawful exercise of the right of eminent domain, but for those which were caused by acts not authorized to be done in the appropriation or condemnation of property for public purposes, and the cases cited do not, therefore, apply to the facts of this case.

Here the plaintiff has recovered only such damages as resulted from the taking of and injury to the property, without regard to the manner of doing the work, allowing the defendant a deduction from the damages of any special benefits to the plaintiff's property derived by her from the improvement of the street, and in this respect the court instructed the jury correctly. Railroad v. Platt Land, 133 N. C. 266, 45 S. E. 589, in which the rule for measuring the damages in such cases is fully stated and considered by Justice Connor, for the court. The plaintiff has recovered nothing more than the just compensation to which she is entitled for the land appropriated by the city for widening and grading the street.

After a careful examination, we find no error in the trial of the case.

No error.

NAIL v. BROWN & WILLIAMSON.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. April 28, 1909.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1056*)—HARMLESS ERROR—EXCLUSION OF EVIDENCE.

The exclusion of evidence is harmless where the court at the close of all the evidence offers to allow its introduction, and there is no suggestion that the witnesses that were to give the evidence had been discharged.

3. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 101*)—MASTER'S LIABILITY FOR INJURIES—CARE REQUIRED IN FURNISHING PLACES AND APPLIANCES.

An employer does not insure the safety of his workmen, nor is it his duty to furnish them an absolutely safe place in which to work, but only to exercise reasonable care and prudence in providing such a place, and he is not obliged to furnish the very best appliances, but only such as are reasonably fit and safe for the purposes for which they are used, and he satisfies the requirements of the law as to appliances if he uses that degree of care which a person of ordinary prudence would use if he were supplying them for his own use, and, when there is only one appliance which is approved and in general use for performing a certain function, it is the master's duty to use it, but, if there are several appliances which are approved, the master is not negligent if he exercises reasonable care in making a selection, and his liability is not based on a mere error of judgment, but on culpable negligence.

Appeal from Superior Court, Forsyth County; Ward, Judge.

Action by John P. Nail against Brown & Williamson. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

J. E. Alexander, A. E. Holton, and Lindsay Patterson, for appellant. Watson, Buxton & Watson and Manly & Hendren, for appellee.

BROWN, J. The plaintiff while working in the factory of the defendants was injured by the breaking of a belt, causing one of the hooks which fastened the belt together to strike him on the head and imbed itself therein. The belt was running parallel with the ceiling, some 4 or 5 feet above the head of the plaintiff, and some 20 feet from where he was standing. While the machinery was in motion in the usual manner, the belt parted with a report like the sound of a gun, the belt hooks flying in several directions, one of them striking the plaintiff. It was the duty of the plaintiff to run the machine. The evidence tended to prove that the belt was nearly new, having been in use only six months at the machine run by plaintiff. The allegation of negligence stated in the complaint in different forms of expression is a failure by defendants to furnish reasonably safe machinery and instrumentalities. It is admitted in the brief of the learned counsel for plaintiff that the belt was new and without fault, but it is claimed that its ends were fastened together with belt hooks, and that they were not reasonably safe appliances for fastening belts. The negligence averred relates not so much to the quality of the hooks used as to the method employed.

1. Among other exceptions to the evidence, it is contended that his honor erred in refusing to permit plaintiff to offer evidence tending to prove that on other occasions similar hooks had been seen flying out of the same belt and also out of similar belts. We find evidence of this character in the record admitted without objection, and, if further testimony along that line was desired or permissible, his honor opened the door for it by offering at the close of all evidence to permit plaintiff to offer it. There is no suggestion that plaintiff had discharged his witnesses at the time, and we therefore think, if the exception had merit in it, the offer of the judge destroys it. The remaining exceptions to evidence we think upon examination are untenable, and need no discussion by us.

2. The plaintiff assigns as error the failure of the court to instruct the jury that, if they believed the evidence, they should answer first issue "Yes." This issue relates to the alleged negligence of the defendants. As the plaintiff failed to ask such instruction "in writing in apt time," as stated in the record, the trial judge was not bound to give it, even if the plaintiff were entitled to it. We fail to see, however, upon the evidence that the plaintiff would have been entitled to any such instruction had he duly asked it. The employer does not insure the safety of his workmen. He does not contract expressly or impliedly to furnish them an absolutely safe place to work in, but is bound only to exercise reasonable care and prudence in providing such a place. He does not contract to furnish the very best appliances, but only such as are reasonably fit and safe for the purposes for which they are used. He satisfies the requirements of the law if in the selection of his appliances he uses that degree of care which a person of ordinary prudence would use, having regard for his own safety, if he were supplying them for his own use. Where there is one appliance only which is approved and in general use for performing a certain function, it is the master's duty to use it. Where there are several appliances used for the same purpose, all of which are approved and in general use, the master fills the measure of his duty if he exercises reasonable care in making a selection. It is culpable negligence which makes him liable, not a mere error of judgment. We think this is the consensus of the best authorities. Horne v. Power Co., 141 N. C. 50, 53 S. E. 658; Phillips v. Iron Works, 148 N. C. 217, 59 S. E. 660; Young v. Const. Co., 109 N. C. 618, 14 S. E. 58; Harley v. Car Co., 142 N. Y. 31, 38 N. E. 813; O'Neal v. Railway Co., 66 Neb. 638, 92 N. W. 781, 60 L. R. A. 443. Mechanical devices are almost as numerous as medicinal remedies; and the only sure test of either is that of experience. Until that has pronounced a definitive judgment, a master who in the exercise of ordinary care selects that which in his opinion is best calculated to accomplish the purpose cannot be held responsible for the consequences. This record discloses that there are four ways of fastening belts: With hooks, leather lacing, wire lacing, glue or cement, all of which methods are approved and in general use. When an employer of labor is confronted with this condition of affairs, he cannot be held negligent if he selects one of these known methods. We think that the instructions of the learned judge are clear and full, and that they fairly and accurately presented to the jury the contentions of the plaintiff and defendants and the law bearing thereon.

No error.

BILLINGS v. CHARLOTTE OBSERVER
et al.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. April 23, 1909.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 70*)—DECISIONS REVIEWABLE—FINALITY.

An appeal from an order setting aside the award of damages in an action for libel as excessive is premature, and, instead, plaintiff, should note an exception, proceed with the trial, and appeal from the final judgment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 378; Dec. Dig. § 70.*]

2. NEW TRIAL (§ 6*)—RIGHT TO—DISCRETION OF COURT.

Unless some question of law is involved, the granting or refusing of a new trial upon all or any one of the issues rests in the sound discretion of the trial court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see New Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 9, 10; Dec. Dig. § 6.*]

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 979*)—DISCRETION OF COURT—NEW TRIAL—EXCESSIVE DAMAGES.

The setting aside by the trial court of an award of damages as excessive, being discretionary, is not reviewable.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 3873; Dec. Dig. § 979.*]

4. NEW TRIAL (§ 76*)—GROUNDS—EXCESSIVE DAMAGES.

Though the question and amount of punitive damages is for the jury, its finding may be set aside by the court, if excessive.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see New Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 153-156; Dec. Dig. § 76.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Rockingham County; Ward, Judge.

Action for libel by C. M. Billings against the Charlotte Observer and others. From an order setting aside the award of damages as excessive, plaintiff appeals. Appeal dismissed.

Civil action to recover damages for alleged libel. There was allegation, with evidence, on the part of plaintiff tending to show the publication of a libelous article in defendant paper, charging plaintiff with improper conduct at Blackville, S. C., and at Waynesville, N. C. Defendant company, admitting the publication of the articles in question, averred the truth of the facts contained therein, and introduced testimony tending to support its position.

On issues submitted the jury rendered the following verdict:

"(1) Did the defendants publish of and concerning the plaintiff the matters and things alleged in the complaint? Answer: Yes.

"(2) Were the matters and things published of the plaintiff and alleged to have occurred at and around Blackville, S. C., true? Answer: Yes.

"(3) Were the matters and things published of the plaintiff as happenings at Waynesville, N. C., true? Answer: No.

"(4) What damages, if any, is the plaintiff entitled to recover? Answer: $5,000."

Upon the coming in of the verdict, the defendants moved for a new trial on the last issue, on the ground that the amount was excessive, and order was thereupon made as follows: "The court, being of opinion that the amount of damages was excessive, hereby sets aside in its discretion said issue of damages, and awards a new trial thereon." Plaintiff moves the court to set aside second issue for errors to be assigned in the case on appeal. Overruled, and exception by plaintiff. Plaintiff appeals to the Supreme Court.

Morehead & Sapp, Justice & Broadhurst, Glidewell & Lane, and A. D. Ivie, for appellant. Osborne, Lucas & Cocke, Burwell & Cansler, and Scott & Reid, for appellees.

HOKE, J. (after stating the facts as above). We do not advert to the questions chiefly raised in the plaintiff's case on appeal, for the reason that, under numerous and well-considered decisions of this court, the appeal must be dismissed as having been prematurely taken. This position is well established, and the question has usually been raised on an issue as to damages, the very case presented here. Rogerson v. Lumber Co., 136 N. C. 266, 48 S. E. 647; Benton v. Collins, 121 N. C. 66, 28 S. E. 59; Hilliard v. Oram, 106 N. C. 467, 11 S. E. 514; Hicks v. Gooch, 93 N. C. 112.

In Benton v. Collins, supra, Faircloth, C. J., delivering the opinion, said: "The appeal is premature. He should have noted his exception and proceeded with the trial, and brought the whole case to this court on final judgment. This course would not affect any substantial right. This question has been so often decided as to need only a reference to Hilliard v. Oram, 106 N. C. 467, 11 S. E. 514, and the numerous cases cited." In Hilliard v. Oram, supra, Clark, J., said: "The appeal of the defendants is premature. They should have noted their exceptions, and, after the trial is completed by a finding upon the other issue and a final judgment, an appeal will lie. The court will not try causes by 'piecemeal.'" And, to like effect, Smith, C. J., in Hicks v. Gooch, supra, referred to the question as follows: "The general principle is that, when a trial is entered upon, it should embrace and determine the whole subject-matter in controversy, so that a final judgment may be entered, any errors committed in its progress being open to revision and correction in one appeal, while the court could not tolerate a succession of appeals upon separate and fragmentary parts. The ruling has been frequently since recognized and acted on. We refer to but a few of them; the most recent: Commissioners v. Satchwell, 88 N. C. 1; Lutz v. Cline, 89 N. C. 186; Jones v. Call, 89 N. C. 188; Grant v. Reese, 90 N. C. 3; Arrington v. Arrington, 91 N. C. 301. The practice thus established upon its intrinsic merits, and to avoid useless and prolonged litigation, must be upheld."

The authorities with us are also to the effect that, unless some question of law or legal inference is involved, the granting or refusing a new trial, upon all or any one of the issues, rests in the sound discretion of the lower court; and, where it appears that the question has been determined in the exercise of this discretion, the action of the court thereon is not subject to review. Abernethy v. Yount, 138 N. C. 337, 50 S. E. 696; Benton v. Collins, 125 N. C. 94, 34 S. E. 242, 47 L. R. A. 33; Carson v. Dellinger, 90 N. C. 226; Moore v. Edmiston, 70 N. C. 481. True, as stated in Jarrett v. Trunk Co., 144 N. C. 302, 56 S. E. 937, and in Benton v. Collins, 125 N. C. 94, 34 S. E. 242, 47 L. R. A. 33, the issues in a case may be so involved the one with the other that the granting of a new trial on one issue and not the other might present a question of law or legal inference, but no such case is presented on an issue as to damages. That was the only question presented and decided in the Benton Case, where Montgomery, J., for the court said: "There are conflicting decisions on this question in the courts of several of the states, but we believe that the conclusion arrived at by the English Court in the case quoted from is the correct conclusion, and we will adopt it as the conclusion of this court. Holding then, as we do, that the Superior courts of this state have the power to set aside verdicts for inadequacy of damages, we logically conclude that such power is discretionary with them, and that it is not reviewable by us. The power to correct prejudiced and grossly unfair verdicts must be vested somewhere, and in our judgment it is best that such power be confined to the judges who preside over the trials. They are presumed to be learned in the law, impartial in their judgments and upright in their conduct, and, with most rare exceptions, they have measured up to the standard of that presumption." And, while approving the caution expressed by the court in Jarrett's Case, supra, as to the careful use of this power in any class of cases, it is, as stated, only in those where a matter of law or legal inference is presented that the exercise of the judge's discretion can be reviewed. As said by Bynum, J., in Moore v. Edminston, supra: "He is clothed with this power because of his learning and integrity, and of the superior knowledge which his presence at and participation in the trial gives him over any other forum. However great and responsible this power, the law intends that the judge will exercise it to further the ends of justice, and though, doubtless, it is occasionally abused, it would be difficult to fix upon a safer tribunal for the exercise of this discretionary power, which must be lodged somewhere."

The position of the plaintiff, that the power to grant a new trial in the present case did not exist because the determination of the issue involved to some extent an award of punitive damages, is without merit. In numbers of cases expressions will be found to the effect "that the question and amount of punitive damages is for the jury, or always for the jury," etc.; but these expressions have reference to the established principle that the court can never direct the award of punitive damages as a matter of law, but, where an award of such damages is permissible on the facts, the judge shall lay down the law applicable, and it is for the jury to determine in all cases whether or not they shall be allowed, and also the amount, but it was never intended to withdraw issues of this character and verdicts upon them from the supervisory power of the courts. Accordingly in one of the authorities cited and relied on by plaintiffs (Canfield v. Railway, 59 Mo. App. 355), it was held "that the amount of punitive damages is always left with the jury, subject to be reviewed by the court if excessive." This power of the court to supervise verdicts to the extent indicated is one of the most commendable features of our system of trials by jury. It is on issues of the kind presented here that its influence is chiefly desirable, and, when wisely and fearlessly exercised by a just and learned judge, it is one of the surest safeguards to a true and righteous deliverance.

For the reasons indicated, the appeal must be dismissed as having been prematurely taken, and it is so ordered.

Appeal dismissed.

GEO. D. WITT SHOE CO. et al. v. PEACOCK et al.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. April 28, 1909.)

1. GUARANTY (§ 60*)—CONSTRUCTION—SCOPE OF LIABILITY—PAYMENT OF INDEBTEDNESS.

Defendant and P., or either of them, agreed in writing to pay to plaintiff $1,000, to be applied by him to the payment of all claims he then had against P. and to such others as he might receive for collection against him, until the full amount was paid, the note stating that it was executed to secure and guarantee the payment of the claims to the extent of $1,000. Other claims were afterward placed with plaintiff for collection, and P. thereafter sold to plaintiff an equity of redemption, the sum paid therefor being applied on the claims in his hands, which sum, by P.'s agreement, was applied to the claims of all the creditors pro rata. Held, that defendant's guaranty was that P. would pay $1,000 on all the claims against him in plaintiff's hands, and that any payments when received by plaintiff should be applied to such claims, so that the sum received for the equity of redemption should be applied as a part of the $1,000 which defendant guaranteed should be paid.

Appeal from Superior Court, Davidson County; E. B. Jones, Judge.

Action by the Geo. D. Witt Shoe Company and others against J. L. Peacock and another. From a judgment in part for plaintiffs, they appeal. Affirmed.

Plaintiff company sues upon the following instrument: "$1,000.00. Dec. 7, 1907. Sixty days after date, we or either of us promise to pay to Emery E. Raper, attorney or order, the sum of one thousand dollars for value received which money when received by him to be applied to the payment of all claims he has now in his hands for collection against the said J. L. Peacock and to such others as he may receive for collection until the full amount is applied. This note executed for the purpose of securing and guaranteeing the payment of the said claims to the extent of one thousand dollars. Said claims now in hand are as follows: J. L. Peacock. [Seal.] R. W. Fuller. [Seal.]" A list of the claims is attached, aggregating $896. Defendant R. W. Fuller admitted the execution of the obligation, and by way of defense alleged: "That he has never been indebted to the plaintiffs in any sum whatever, except as surety on an obligation in the amount of $1,000, guaranteeing the payment of $1,000 to plaintiffs and other creditors of J. L. Peacock. That he is informed and believes that, since the execution of said obligation as surety aforesaid, the said Emery E. Raper has received other claims for collection than those mentioned and set out in the complaint, and that he has received moneys from J. L. Peacock and his agents to be applied to said accounts and the accounts mentioned in the complaint to more than a sufficient amount to relieve this defendant from any obligation or responsibility as surety aforesaid." It was in evidence that other claims against Peacock were placed in the hands of Mr. Raper for collection amounting to $1,016.87, aggregating about $1,800. Peacock paid $50 on the note which was duly credited. The following is the only evidence introduced: "About February 10, 1908, J. L. Peacock sold to Z. I. Walser and Emery E. Raper his equity of redemption in his home, there being mortgages on same, and on account of the price of this lot the sum of $647.50 was paid on the claims in hands of Emery E. Raper, which amount was by express agreement of J. L. Peacock applied to all the creditors pro rata on their claims of $1,816.33; the creditors being those set out in complaint. After February 10, 1908, other claims were placed with Emery E. Raper, but nothing has been collected on them, and no claim is made for them." The following issue was submitted to the jury: "What amount has been paid on said note of $1,000 by J. L. Peacock and R. W. Fuller or others since the execution of the note December 7, 1907?" The court instructed the jury that, if they believed the evidence, to answer the issue "$730.50"; that there should not only be included in the amount paid the $50 admitted, but that the further amount paid by Peacock—the $647.50. Plaintiff expects to the charge on the issue as to item $647.50. There was an item of $33 credited on the note, not necessary to be noted. Judgment was rendered for $270. Plaintiff appealed.

E. E. Raper and Walser & Walser, for appellants. J. A. Spence and H. M. Robins, for appellees.

CONNOR, J. (after stating the facts as above). The sole question presented by plaintiff's exception is whether the $647.50 received by Mr. Raper shall be applied to the obligation of defendant Fuller in reduction of his liability for $1,000, the amount of the bond. Plaintiff insists that Peacock had the right to apply the $647.50 to the payment pro rata of all of the debts against him in the hands of Raper for collection, including those received subsequent to the execution of the bond. Applied in this way to the total amount of the debts, $1,816, there remains due on them $1,181.81, for which, to the extent of $1,000, plaintiff insists defendant Fuller is still liable. The obligatory words of the bond "promise to pay" are explained by the last clause: "This note is executed for the purpose of securing and guaranteeing the payment," etc. The obligation, therefore, assumed by Fuller is to secure and guarantee the payment by Peacock of $1,000, "which money, when received by Raper, to be applied to the payment of all claims he has now in his hands for collection against the said J. L. Peacock, and to such others as he may receive for collection until the full amount is applied." It is evident that the words "full amount" refer to the claims then in Mr. Raper's hands, and such others as he might receive for collection. Thus Fuller's liability is expressly restricted to $1,000, and the guaranty is, by the last words of the note, limited to "the payment of the claims to the extent of one thousand dollars."

It was immaterial to Fuller what amount of claims came into Raper's hands for collection subsequent to the execution of the bond. This was doubtless uncertain. The evident meaning of the language is that Fuller guaranteed that Peacock would pay on all of the claims against him in Raper's hands so much as $1,000, and that, when paid or "received by him" it was to be applied to such claims. When, therefore, the $647.50 was paid by Peacock, his express agreement that it should be applied pro rata to all of the claims had no other effect than to comply with the terms of his bond. He could not change or enlarge Fuller's liability. If the payment be applied, as contended for by plaintiff, Peacock could impose upon Fuller the obligation to pay the full amount of the bond, disregarding the express provision that the money, "when received," should be applied to the debts until the full amount is applied; in other words, Peacock may have paid the whole amount for which Fuller was liable, and yet leave him liable for the balance of his indebtedness to the extent of $1,000. This would do violence to the language and evident purpose of the parties when the bond was executed. It is an elementary rule of interpretation that, where there is no repugnancy, every part of an instrument must be given effect. It is also well settled that the liability of a guarantor or surety is not to be enlarged by construction. His obligation is to be fixed by the language of his bond, and not carried beyond its terms. It is strictissimi juris. No question of the right of the debtor to make such application of a payment by him from his general funds as he wishes is presented in this appeal. It was a matter of no concern with Fuller how the $647.50 was applied as between the creditors of Peacock. His right under the terms of his contract was to have it applied to the reduction of his guaranty. We concur with his honor in the instruction given the jury.

There is no error.

BORDEAUX v. ATLANTIC COAST LINE R. CO.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. April 28, 1909.)

1. TRIAL (§ 168*)—MOTION FOR NONSUIT—WAIVER OF EXCEPTIONS.

Under Revisal 1905, § 539, providing that defendant may move for a nonsuit after plaintiff has introduced his evidence, but after such motion is refused defendant may waive his exception, and introduce evidence, and again move to dismiss after all the evidence on both sides is in, an exception to the refusal of the court to grant a nonsuit after the plaintiff rests is waived by not renewing it at the end of all the evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Dec. Dig. § 168.*]

2. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 144*)—RULES—HABITUAL DISOBEDIENCE—EFFECT.

A rule by a master, which has been habitually violated with his knowledge or acquiescence, is regarded as waived or abrogated.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 287; Dec. Dig. § 144.*]

3. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 144*)—LIABILITY FOR INJURIES TO SERVANT—PLACES FOR WORK—RAILROAD TRACKS.

Defendant railroad company adopted a rule requiring the placing of a blue flag on a car being repaired, but this rule had not been observed by car repairers when the job was a very short one, and the engineer in charge of the switch engine knew of the custom of the repairers not to observe this rule, and he ran in on a track a car at a rate in excess of the speed limit allowed in the yards, and it hit a car on which plaintiff's intestate was at work, causing his death. Held, that the running in of the car at such excessive speed was culpable negligence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 287; Dec. Dig. § 144.*]

4. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 289*)—ACTIONS FOR INJURIES—EVIDENCE—QUESTIONS FOR JURY—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

Evidence, in an action to recover for the death of a servant, held to make the question of the servant's contributory negligence one for the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 1069-1132; Dec. Dig. § 289.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Wayne County; Biggs, Judge.

Action by J. T. Bordeaux, administrator of L. W. Bordeaux, deceased, against the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

These issues were submitted to the jury:

"(1) Was the plaintiff's intestate killed by the negligence of the defendant company? Answer: Yes.

"(2) Did the plaintiff's intestate by his own negligence contribute to his death? Answer: No.

"(3) What damages, if any, is plaintiff entitled to recover? Answer: $8,000 (six thousand dollars)."

W. C. Munroe and Geo. E. Hood, for appellant. Aycock & Daniels and R. W. Winston, for appellee.

BROWN, J. The evidence discloses a state of facts which, with the exception hereinafter noted, is practically uncontested. Plaintiff's intestate was a car repairer, employed in defendant's switching and repair yards at South Rocky Mount, whose duty it was to repair cars standing on the numerous tracks therein. For the protection of its workmen the defendant had long since adopted and published rules which required those employed in repairing cars on tracks in the yards to place a blue flag on the car, so as to give notice to the switch enginemen not to move such cars, or run other cars in on them, so as to endanger the workmen employed in repairing them. On March 18, 1907, the intestate, with Denby and Wilkens, fellow workmen, went out to repair a tank car on track No. 1, carrying with them a blue flag furnished by the defendant. There was much shifting going on at the time on the yard tracks. Instead of putting out the flag, the repairers discussed the matter, and decided that this was a short job, and to put Denby out to watch, who failed to keep proper lookout. While Bordeaux, the plaintiff's intestate, was under the car repairing it, the engineer of a switch engine kicked or pitched a box car loaded with lumber onto track No. 1, which struck another car, and forced that against the tank car, running it over intestate and killing him.

1. It is contended by defendant that his honor erred in denying the motion to nonsuit. We are precluded from considering this exception because, while made at close of plaintiff's evidence, it was waived by not renewing it at end of all the evidence. Revisal 1905, § 539; Parlier v. Railway, 129 N. C. 263, 39 S. E. 961.

2. It is contended that there is no evidence of negligence. This contention would be well founded but for the fact that there is evidence in the record sufficient to go to the jury that the rule, promulgated by defendant for the protection of those engaged in working around and under cars in its yards, had been allowed by the superintendent and foreman of defendant to relapse into "innocuous desuetude," especially as to "short jobs." We admit that the rulings of the courts in regard to kicking cars, or making flying switches at public or much frequented crossings, do not apply to the constant changing or switching of cars that is inevitable in the extensive repair and switch yards of a large railway system. But while such methods may be necessary, it is equally necessary that the company should not only establish proper rules for the protection of employes on the yards, but also should enforce them. A rule to protect employes should be so framed as to guard them, to a reasonable extent, against the consequences, not only of the carelessness of co-employes, but of their own carelessness.

ness also. It is well known that men are prone to run risks in order to save time and trouble, especially where the risks last but a moment, and the precaution necessary to guard against it requires a considerable period of time. A rule which has been habitually violated, with the knowledge or acquiescence of the master, actual or implied, is almost universally regarded as waived or abrogated. Wright v. Southern Pac. Railway, 14 Utah, 383, 46 Pac. 374; Biles v. Railroad, 139 N. C. 528, 52 S. E. 129; Haynes v. Railroad, 143 N. C. 185, 55 S. E. 516; Railroad v. Nickles, 50 Fed. 722, 1 C. C. A. 625; Devoe v. Railway, 174 N. Y. 1, 66 N. E. 568. There is evidence pro and con upon the question of the waiver of the rule, which was submitted to the jury by the learned judge in a well-considered, clear, and correct charge as to the law bearing thereon. It is doubtless true, as contended, that defendant's superintendents and foreman in charge of the yards cannot tell whether a job will be a long or a short one. Therefore it follows that the only safe course to pursue is to enforce obedience to the rule in respect to all jobs done on the yards, whether long or short, by discharging those who fail to observe it. It appears in evidence that, notwithstanding the printed and bulletined rule, it was a custom of long standing in these yards, and well known, that if the workmen found the job a short one that could be done in from two to five minutes, they would not put up flags, and if it was a longer job, they would put them up. Mozingo, the engineer who caused the catastrophe by kicking in the loaded box car, knew of the custom, for he states in his testimony: "I could see car repairers at work, and I know the customary way of repairing the cars for a month previous to the death of the plaintiff's intestate. For short jobs in repairing cars the repairers didn't put up any flags. It was the custom not to put them up. It would seem that they took the chances on short jobs. The flags were the only guides I had. If no flag up, I would run the cars right in; wouldn't know whether long or short jobs, and so had to rely on flags." There is further evidence that the speed limit fixed by rule for the yards is six miles per hour, and that the box car was pitched onto track No. 1 at a much faster rate of speed, so that it rolled uncontrolled over 100 yards, and crashed into the intervening car with such force that it was thrown violently against the tank car which the intestate was repairing. With the rule in abeyance, and the custom of the workmen well known to the engineer, to kick the car in on track No. 1 under such conditions, and at such speed, is undoubtedly culpable negligence. Hudson v. Railroad, 142 N. C. 198, 55 S. E. 103; Wilson v. Railroad, 142 N. C. 336, 55 S. E. 257; Allen v. Railroad, 145 N. C. 214, 58 S. E. 1081; Ray v. Railroad, 141 N. C. 84, 53 S. E. 622; Doing v. Railway, 151 N. Y. 579, 45 N. E. 1028; Dowd v. Railway, 170 N. Y. 459, 63 N. E. 541; Railroad v. Lowe (Ky.) 66 S. W. 736.

3. It is contended that the uncontradicted evidence shows that the plaintiff's intestate was guilty of contributory negligence, and that his honor erred in refusing so to charge. Upon this issue he charged the jury: "Even though you should find that the rule requiring the putting out of the blue flags when the employes were engaged in such work as the plaintiff's intestate was engaged in when he was injured was habitually violated, yet if the work in which the plaintiff's intestate was engaged at the time of the injury was of so dangerous a character that an ordinarily prudent man would not have undertaken to have done the work without putting out blue flags, then in such case the plaintiff could not recover, and you should find the second issue 'Yes.'" It appears in evidence that upon examination the repairers all agreed that the job would be a very short one, from half a minute to two minutes, and that they discussed the matter, and decided not to put out the flag, but to have one of their number keep a lookout. Of course, if there was no evidence of a waiver or abrogation of the rule, such clear disobedience of it would effectually bar a recovery, but if the rule is taken to be in abeyance, then it practically did not exist, and the question must be determined accordingly. With the rule out of the way we are not prepared to hold as matter of law, in any view of the evidence, that the intestate was guilty of such contributory negligence as will prevent a recovery. Whether under such circumstances a man of ordinary prudence, having to go under the car for such a short space of time, would have reasonably trusted to the vigilance of his companion, instead of the more certain and reliable signal flag, is a question properly and fairly submitted to the jury.

We have examined all the exceptions in the record, and find no error.

MICHAEL v. ELKINS.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
March 30, 1909.)

INJUNCTION (§ 26*)—RESTRAINING PROSECUTION OF ACTION BEFORE JUSTICE.

Equity has no jurisdiction of a bill to restrain the prosecution of an action before a justice merely on the ground that the justice has no jurisdiction.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Injunction, Cent. Dig. §§ 24-49, 54-61; Dec. Dig. § 26.*]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from Circuit Court, Preston County.

Bill by P. B. Michael against S. B. Elkins. Decree for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Neil J. Fortney, for appellant. Wm. G. Conley, for appellee.

BRANNON, J. S. B. Elkins brought an action before a justice of Preston county against P. B. Michael to recover back $200 paid as part payment for coal in a tract of land, on the ground that Michael represented that the tract extended in a certain course to lands of W. O. Walls, whereas it did not do so, and, moreover, that Michael had not good title. Judgment was rendered for Elkins, and Michael appealed the case to the circuit court. While the appeal was pending Michael brought a chancery suit against Elkins to restrain and prohibit the further prosecution of the action pending in said appeal, and a decree was entered adjudicating that the justice, "in the law case heard herewith, was without jurisdiction in the premises," and that the suit at common law be dismissed, and decreeing costs against Elkins. Elkins appeals.

Whence comes jurisdiction in equity for this bill? If the justice, and the circuit court on appeal, had no jurisdiction, was not that question triable in the justice's court and on appeal? Equity does not entertain a suit to stop an action at law only for want of jurisdiction. If, as the theory is, the justice had no jurisdiction because title to land would come in question, that could be tried before the justice and on appeal in the circuit court. Resort to equity in such case would be unwarranted. The bill shows no equity jurisdiction. It is said that the decree is not final, so as to warrant an appeal. It disposes of the law action—adjudicates all the bill sought. What more to be done? Certainly not to try the right of recovery of the money claimed by Elkins. It is suggested that the appeal was allowed a few days after two years from the decree. The decree dates 1st June, 1905, the appeal 17th June, 1907; but our court order allowing the appeal states that the petition for appeal was presented 27th May, 1907.

Decree reversed and bill dismissed.

Error to Circuit Court, Ohio County.

Action by Matilda C. Hogl against the Aachen & Munich Fire Insurance Company. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant brings error. Affirmed.

G. J. Schuck and R. M. Addleman, for plaintiff in error. Handlan & Reymann, E. F. Moore, and J. P. Arbous, for defendant in error.

BRANNON, J. Matilda C. Hogl sued the Aachen & Munich Fire Insurance Company to recover for loss of her house by fire, and recovered. The insurance policy provides that no suit on it shall be sustained "unless commenced within 12 months next after the fire." This suit was not begun within that period; but the policy contains another clause saying that the loss should not become payable until 60 days after proof of loss furnished. The only question is: Shall the 12 months' limitation begin from the fire or from the close of the 60 days?

The policy forbids suit for 60 days. Is it reasonable to say that the company shall have the benefit of the 60 days in exemption from suit and for its purposes in investigating the loss, and yet count that time as part of the 12 months? We must take both clauses together. There are conflicting cases upon this question; but why discuss it, when this court has held that the suit may be within 12 months from the end of the 60 days? Barber v. Insurance Co., 16 W. Va. 675, 37 Am. Rep. 800; Murdoch v. Insurance Co., 33 W. Va. 407, 10 S. E. 777, 7 L. R. A. 572. In support of our decisions I cite the Circuit Court of Appeals, in Steel v. Phoenix Ins. Co., 51 Fed. 715, 2 C. C. A. 463, affirmed by the United States Supreme Court in 154 U. S. 518, 14 Sup. Ct. 1153, 38 L. Ed. 1004; also Firemen's Friend v. Buckstaff, 34 Neb. 150, 56 N. W. 397, 41 Am. St. Rep. 727; German Co. v. Fairbank, 32 Neb. 750, 40 N. W. 711, 29 Am. St. Rep. 459, and note; Friezen v. Allemania Co. (C. C.) 30 Fed. 352; Hong Wing v. Co. v. Jones, 54 Ark. 376, 15 S. W. 1004.

There is in the case a discussion as to difference between policies prescribing a time limit "after loss" and those fixing it "after the fire." We see no difference.

There is a cross-assignment of error, based on the claim that the amount for which the house was insured is $1,500, and the verdict $1,866.50. It is said the circuit court ought to have given judgment for $1,500, under Code 1906, § 1108, making an insurance company liable for the policy amount in case of total loss, and we are asked to do so. Why should we be called to pass on this when the circuit court was not asked to render such judgment, and no exception taken as to this, and, on the contrary, the record shows the plaintiff's counsel twice stated the loss at $1,866.50, and asked a verdict for that amount?

We affirm the judgment.

LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 115*) — HOLDING OVER—RENEWAL OF TENANCY.

Where, under a lease for a term of years, with reservation of a monthly rent and stipulation that the tenancy shall not be by the year, the tenant holds over after the term, merely making payment of the monthly rent, which the landlord accepts, the renewal of the tenancy thereby implied is by the month only, not by the year, nor for the original term.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error to Circuit Court, Mingo County.

Action by M. Z. White against Eli Sohn. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Stokes & Bronson, for plaintiff in error. Sheppard, Goodykoontz & Scherr and Brown & Wiles, for defendant in error.

ROBINSON, J. This case was once before in this court. 62 W. Va. 80, 59 S. E. 890. New trial having been had in the lower court, the case comes here again, but in an entirely different light. The questions are not similar, nor are they related to those before involved.

Defendant went into possession of a store-room belonging to plaintiff, situated in Williamson, Mingo county, under a lease containing the following provisions: "It is further understood that this lease is to run for the term of one month from * * * April 1, 1904, and to continue for the term of twenty-four months, should the party of the second part so elect, at the same monthly rental and upon the same conditions, provided said party of the second part has complied with all the stipulations in this contract. And it is further understood and agreed that this tenancy is not to be a tenancy from year to year; but that the party of the second part expressly waives any notice whatsoever from the party of the first part of his intention to terminate this tenancy." The rent stipulated in this lease was $60 per month, payable in advance, at the beginning of each month. At the end of the term of 1 month provided in the lease, defendant elected to continue for the term of 24 months. Following the expiration of the 24 months, defendant held over, paying each month the monthly rental stipulated in the lease, for an additional period of 12 months, or until April 1, 1907. Payment of the rentals for that period was accepted by plaintiff. On February 15, 1907, plaintiff notified defendant to quit and deliver possession of the premises on April 1, 1907. Defendant did not vacate on that date. Very shortly thereafter, plaintiff instituted his suit, an action of unlawful detainer, demanding possession of the premises and damages for their detention. Despite the notice aforesaid and the institution of this suit, defendant remained in possession of the property 11 months longer, tendering rent at $60 per month. This tender plaintiff refused. Plaintiff testified that the rental value of the property for those 11 months was $75 per month; that he could have rented it at that price. The foregoing is substantially the case, as presented by plaintiff's evidence.

The only evidence introduced on behalf of defendant was his own testimony to the extent that the rental value of the premises for the 11 months aforesaid was $60 per month. Defendant rested his case upon his demurrer to plaintiff's evidence. In that demurrer plaintiff joined. The jury returned a verdict for the possession of the premises and $875 damages, if the law be for the plaintiff; otherwise, for the defendant. The court held the law to be for plaintiff, and entered judgment on the verdict.

Defendant's contention is that his holding over beyond the expiration of the 24 months, and the acceptance by plaintiff of the monthly payment of rent for such holding over, implied a new contract for another full period of 24 months. If this claim be tenable, defendant was entitled, at the original monthly rental, to possession of the premises when the suit was instituted, and the judgment is wrong. On the other hand, plaintiff maintains that such holding over implied only a tenancy by the month, and that, having given said notice to terminate such monthly tenancy, notwithstanding that by the stipulations of the original lease no notice was necessary, he was entitled to the possession of the premises after April 1, 1907, and for damages at $75 per month for the 11 months after said date during which he was deprived of the premises by defendant's refusal to surrender the same, as found by the verdict. So we see that the case is narrowed to this question: What term of tenancy was implied or created by such holding over by defendant?

"If the tenant holds over by consent, given expressly or constructively, after the termination of a lease for years, it is held to be evidence of a new contract without any definite period, and to be a tenancy from year to year." 1 Lomax's Digest, side page 163. It may be said to be the generally accepted rule that if a lessee for a year, or for a term of years, holds over after the expiration of his term, by consent of the landlord, the law presumes or implies that the new holding is that of a tenant by the year. Tucker's Com. book 2, page 81; 2 Minor's Inst. (2d Ed.) 173; Jones on Landlord and Tenant, § 201; 24 Cyc. 1017, 1081; Allen v. Bartlett, 20 W. Va. 46; Voss v. King, 38 W. Va. 607, 18 S. E. 762; Arbenz v. Exley, 62 W. Va. 476, 44 S. E. 149; 61 L. R. A. 957. In such case, the implied new holding is by the year, not by periods equal in length to the term of the previous lease. But such presumption or implication may be repelled. 24 Cyc. 1033; Taylor on Landlord and Tenant, § 55; Jones on Landlord and Tenant, § 210; Williamson v. Paxton, 18 Grat. (Va.) 475.

The foundation upon which the selection of a year as the unit was based seems to be that an annual rent was reserved in farming leases—the prevalent ones in England from which this doctrine mostly sprung. It was the natural and fair period for that character of lease, including all the seasons, so as to permit sowing, cultivation, harvesting, and garnering. But the reasons to sustain the presumption or implication that by a holding over there is a renewal for a year in a lease for agricultural purposes, with annual rent reserved, do not necessarily apply to one of different character, governed, as it should be, by the considerations actually related thereto. "It is often stated that tenancies from year to year have been implied from the earliest times, whenever there was a general holding, without regard to annual rent or other circumstances pointing to a yearly tenancy."

* * * But such a proposition is not borne out by authority." Taylor on Landlord and Tenant, § 55, note 3. It may be noticed that Mr. Minor expressly recognizes the implication aforesaid as arising from the reservation of a yearly rent. 2 Institutes (2d Ed.) 173.

Arising from the original demise itself there may be other implication than that recognized in the aforesaid generally accepted rule, indicating a renewal for a term shorter than the period of a year, where the tenant holds over by consent of the landlord. So it is said: "The doctrine that, where the lessee holds over and the lessor receives rent accruing after the expiration of the term, a new tenancy arises for a further term, subject to the covenants and conditions of the original lease, is true as a rule; and the reason is that the receipt of the rent is considered as an acknowledgment of a subsisting tenancy. But it does not follow that the new term must necessarily be a year. Where the former lease was for less than a year, as a quarter or a month, or where the term, though extending to a year or more, was composed of such periods, there is no ground for holding that the new term, presumed from the holding over of the tenant and the receipt of the rent by the landlord, extends beyond one of the periods of the original tenancy." McAdam on Landlord and Tenant, § 39. And another high authority puts it this way: "So the unit is not any particular period of time, but the rent period, whatever that may be in any given case." Jones on Landlord and Tenant, § 215. Accordingly it has been held: "If, on the expiration of a lease for a year or for years, with rent payable monthly, the tenant retains possession of the premises and pays the same rent each month, this does not in law create a new term for a year, without any agreement to that effect, but only creates a tenancy from month to month." Skaggs v. Elkus, 45 Cal. 154. The reservation of rent, with its payment at stated periods, is, in the absence of express stipulation as to the length of the holding over, one of the principal criteria to determine the duration of the term. Jones on Landlord and Tenant, § 215; Coffin v. Lunt, 2 Pick. (Mass.) 76; Rich v. Bolton, 46 Vt. 84, 14 Am. Rep. 615; Hurd v. Whitsett, 4 Colo. 77.

The acts and conduct of the parties in reference to the holding over may control over the implication expressed in the generally accepted rule to which we have referred. Illustrative of this fact is the enunciation in Shipman v. Mitchell, 64 Tex. 174: "If, however, at or before the expiration of the former lease, the tenant was informed that he would not be permitted, after the expiration of that lease, to occupy the rented premises otherwise than as a tenant from month to month, and not for a year, then no contract that he should occupy the property for a year could be implied, for an implied contract derives its existence from the presumed intention of the parties, induced by and arising from their course of dealing, and can never be presumed, if it be shown that the tenant was informed by the landlord that the holding after the expiration of the term, if continued, must be from month to month." To the same effect is Blumenberg v. Myres, 32 Cal. 93, 91 Am. Dec. 560. There we find: "But when the parties have made an express agreement relating in any respect to the new tenancy, then in that respect there is no room for implication. If the parties specify the rent, the time of payment, the term, or any of the usual covenants or conditions of a lease, whether they agree or disagree with the terms of the former lease, they enter into the new lease and determine the rights of the parties while the tenant is holding over. The receipt produced by the plaintiff showed the payment by him of $400 for one month's rent, thus establishing both the rent and the term. He has no better right to recur to the former lease, in disregard of the time, than of the rent specified in the receipt."

So we see that there is not always an implied renewal by the year, when the tenant for a year or a term of years holds over by consent of the landlord. It may depend upon other things, among them being the rent periods fixed in the original lease and agreements and conduct of the parties in reference to the holding over. And it is not consistent with reason and authority that any implied renewal of a tenancy by a holding over is periodically longer than a year. The authorities say, in effect, that if the original demise be for a year, or for a term of years, with annual rent reserved, there is an implied renewal by the year, unless such implication is repelled by considerations more controlling than that upon which it is sought to be based.

Whether defendant, in the case before us, was originally a tenant by the month, with the right to elect to continue as such until 24 months expired, or was a tenant for a term of the 24 months, or 2 years, we really need not decide. If by the original lease he held by the month, the implied renewal by his holding over could be but by the month. We shall, however, accept his claim that he held by the lease originally for a term of 2 years. This fact being so, and nothing else controlling, the implied renewal by his holding over would be only by the year. But, by the very terms of that original lease which he invokes to sustain an implied term, he cannot be a tenant by the year. He therein stipulated not to be. And surely, if the lessor required a stipulation against the lessee's being a yearly tenant, we are not, in reason, justified in making that lessee a biennial tenant, simply because the original lease permitted him to remain in possession of the premises for 2 years. If, in sense and right, we could do so, there is no authority, as we have said, nor is there reason, justifying, by defendant's holding over, an implied tenancy by periods of greater length than a year. What term, then, had defendant by his holding over and paying monthly rental? Plainly he was thereby only a tenant by the month. He had stipulated that he should not be in by the year. Similarly to Shipman v. Mitchell, supra, the tenant had notice, by this stipulation, before the expiration of the original lease, that he would not be permitted to occupy the premises as he claims the right to do. In his claim of implied renewal, he is bound by that stipulation; for he must invoke the original lease, in which that stipulation is contained, to raise the implication upon which he relies. The law gives no implication for a holding by periods longer than yearly ones; by the year, under his agreement, defendant cannot hold; therefore he can be nothing but a tenant by the month. In his original lease a distinctive monthly rental was reserved, not an annual rental, nor a rental payable specifically by an aliquot part of a year. A month, without relation to a year, was the rent period. He can be that only which the unit of the rent periods and his payment of a monthly rent in fact made him—a tenant by the month; if, indeed, the acts and conduct of the parties in the payment and acceptance of one month's rent, thereby fixing such term, at the first of his holding over, did not make him such.

Since, by the holding over, defendant could be nothing but a tenant by the month, he was plainly in default when this suit was begun. After the termination of his aforesaid monthly tenancy, on April 1, 1907, he was a trespasser on plaintiff's premises, for which actual damages could be recovered. Those damages were sufficiently proved to be $875 for the 11 months that he continued as such trespasser. The circuit court did not err in overruling the demurrer to the evidence and entering judgment for plaintiff on the verdict.

It is said that the case was not tried by a legally constituted tribunal. It was tried before a special judge. The order shows his election to preside in lieu of the regular judge. The record shows no objection to his acting. That objection cannot be made here for the first time, since there is nothing to show that he was illegally elected. State v. Low, 21 W. Va. 782, 45 Am. Rep. 570; Jarrell v. French, 43 W. Va. 457, 27 S. E. 263; State v. Newman, 49 W. Va. 724, 39 S. E. 655; and other cases.

It is also insisted that the record does not establish the fact that the premises were within the jurisdiction of the court, Mingo county. The evidence clearly shows that the premises sought to be recovered are located in Williamson. Counsel in interrogation of witnesses, and the witnesses in their answers, referred to the premises as being so situated. The courts of this state judicially know that Williamson is in Mingo county.

The judgment is affirmed.

Error to Circuit Court, Webster County.

Action by the Buckeye Saw Manufacturing Company against A. J. Rutherford. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

W. T. Talbott and Hall Bros., for plaintiff in error. E. H. Morton, J. S. Cogar, and W. C. Wooddell, for defendant in error.

WILLIAMS, J. On the 20th of October, 1903, A. J. Rutherford bought of the Buckeye Manufacturing Company, through its traveling agent, E. E. Simons, and its local agent, A. B. Elbon, who resided at Webster Springs, W. Va., one 58-inch, inserted tooth, circular saw. This purchase was made upon a printed order blank, which contained the following provision: "Saw is to be made of best quality of steel, free from flaws and practically true. Should it prove defective in any particular during time of trial, you are then to put in good shape, or, if necessary, replace it with a new saw, * * * and it is understood and agreed by us that if no complaint is made within 30 days after receipt of saw, that your warranty on same ceases and we will pay full amount as herein agreed. It is agreed that the title to saw shall not pass until notes given for same are paid or saw paid for in cash, but shall remain your property until that time, and you not be to held responsible for any verbal arrangement made with your agent, and not incorporated in this order. This order subject to your approval and not to be countermanded." Pursuant to this order, plaintiff shipped the saw, and defendant received it on the 13th day of January, 1904. About the last of January or the 1st of February, 1904, defendant tested the saw, and found it was unsatisfactory; that it would not saw a true line; that it would snake through the log, as sawmill men expressed it. The evidence shows that within 30 days after receiving the saw the defendant notified A. B. Elbon, the local agent, of the defect in the saw. The saw was returned to plaintiff. After being hammered with a view of bettering its condition, it was reshipped to Rutherford, and again tested and found to work no better than it did at first. He again within the 30 days after he had received it the second time notified the local agent that it would not work. On the 2d day of April, 1904, Rutherford executed his negotiable note payable in 60 days at the Webster County Bank to A. B. Elbon & Co. for the sum of $108.50, which sum was equal to the price of the 58-inch saw, including $1 for the board on which the saw was shipped. It was agreed at the same time between Rutherford and the agent that the 58-inch saw should be returned and a 62-inch saw furnished in the place of it, and that this note was to be treated as a payment on the price of the new saw, the price of which was $145. A new order was made out for the 62-inch saw on the same kind of printed form, blank order, containing the same warranty clause above quoted. This order was signed by Rutherford, and the above note was delivered to the agent. After making the contract of April 2, 1904, for the 62-inch saw, and executing the above note, Rutherford returned the 58-inch saw; but, instead of shipping to him the new saw, plaintiff returned the old one about April 29th, after trying to repair it. Rutherford says he received it on reshipment, thinking it was the new saw which he had ordered, and did not discover that it was the old one until he had taken it to his mill and unpacked it. He further states that he put it on his mill and tested it again, and found its condition no better, but worse, if any difference, than it was the first time it was tested. He thereupon again notified the agent, Elbon, within 30 days of the time he had received it that it was defective. The defect in the saw is further proved by two other witnesses who were experienced sawyers. Rutherford again shipped it to plaintiff on May 24, 1904, and plaintiff again returned it to Rutherford, and he refused to accept it. The evidence shows that it was in the depot at Webster Springs at the time this action was tried. The president of plaintiff company testified that he knew of no other order having been received from Rutherford than the one for the 58-inch saw; and that the first notice he had concerning Rutherford's complaint was by letter from E. E. Simons, agent, on April 4, 1904. But this latter part of his testimony was stricken out by the trial court, apparently without objection from plaintiff. The note above described was indorsed by Elbon, the agent, and turned over to plaintiff, who brought suit on it against said A. J. Rutherford and A. B. Elbon before a justice of the peace. On September 14, 1904, the action was dismissed as to Elbon and tried as to the defendant Rutherford, and resulted in a judgment against him. He thereupon appealed to the circuit court of Webster county. A trial by jury was had in the circuit court, resulting in a verdict and judgment for the defendant on the 5th day of April, 1906. To this judgment plaintiff obtained a writ of error and supersedeas from this court.

The case turns upon the following points, viz.: (1) Whether or not defendant gave notice to the agent of the defect in the saw within 30 days after he had received it; (2) whether, if notice was given to the agent, it was concerning a matter within the scope of the agent's employment so as to be notice to his principal; (3) whether or not the agreement of April 2, 1904, that the note should be a credit on the price of the new saw for which defendant on that day gave the agent an order, was binding on the principal; and (4) whether or not the assignment of the note by Elbon to plaintiff before maturity prevents defendant from setting up failure of consideration.

As to the first point, it is stated by Rutherford that he gave notice to the local agent, Elbon, within 30 days after he received the saw that it was defective. Elbon says he does not think he received such notice. This does not amount to a positive denial; and, besides, it is a fact which the jury must have determined in favor of defendant, and we should not disturb its finding on this point even if the notice had been expressly denied, and we had thought its finding wrong. It was a matter of fact peculiarly within the jury's province.

As to the second point, A. B. Elbon, who was a witness for the plaintiff, says that he was its local agent for the sale of saws, and had authority to collect. He and the traveling salesman, Simons, were both present when the first order was made, and also when the second order was made on April 2d. Plaintiff does not deny Elbon's agency. The president of plaintiff company, in his deposition taken and read as evidence in the case, does not state whether Elbon was or was not such agent. Witness Elbon further says that the only interest he had in the note given by Rutherford was his commission on the sale; that he took this note, and turned it over to the plaintiff only as its commission agent. This is certainly sufficient proof to show that he was agent with power to sell and to collect the purchase money. The contract embodied in the order for the saw signed by Rutherford and hereinbefore quoted shows that the agent made all the sales subject to the approval of the principal, and that the agent was prohibited from making any arrangement with the purchaser not incorporated in the printed form of order. The shipment of the saw by plaintiff shows that it approved the first order; and the order on its face binds the plaintiff upon a warranty that the "saw is to be made of best quality steel, free from flaws and practically true." This warranty, however, is limited in time to 80 days after the saw is received by the purchaser, and, unless within this time complaint was made of its quality, the warranty was to cease; but, on the other hand, if complaint was made within said 30 days, the plaintiff was to make good its warranty by putting the saw in good shape, or by furnishing another in its place. Anything, therefore, that the agent could do to assist the principal in carrying out its contract of warranty would be for the purpose of enabling him to collect the purchase money for the saw, and would certainly be within the scope of his authority. He was agent to sell under a contract of warranty of the quality for the limited time above described. He could not collect if there was a breach of the warranty and notice within the time. It was therefore both in the scope of his employment and in the line of his duty to receive such notice and communicate it to his principal. We therefore conclude that notice to Elbon was notice to the plaintiff company. 1 A. & E. L. 1144-1149; Newlin v. Beard, 6 W. Va. 110; Peterson v. Wood Mowing & Reaping Co., 97 Iowa, 148, 66 N. W. 96, 59 Am. St. Rep. 399; Bank v. Nelson, 38 Ga. 391, 95 Am. Dec. 400; Coles v. Jefferson Ins. Co., 41 W. Va. 261, 23 S. E. 732; Littauer v. Houck, 92 Mich. 162, 52 N. W. 464, 81 Am. St. Rep. 572; McClelland v. Saul, 113 Iowa, 208, 84 N. W. 1034, 86 Am. St. Rep. 370; Ross et al. v. Houston, 25 Miss. 591, 59 Am. Dec. 231; Clark & Skyles on Agency, 1044; Henry v. Sneed, 99 Mo. 407, 12 S. W. 663, 17 Am. St. Rep. 580; Merrill v. Packer, 80 Iowa, 542, 45 N. W. 1076; Reed's Appeal, 34 Pa. 207.

In regard to the third point, this is largely answered by the discussion of the second point above. The agreement of April 2, 1904, was made in pursuance of plaintiff's warranty on the sale of the first saw, by which it bound itself to either make the first saw good or to supply another in its place, and the note of April 2, 1904, was given with the express understanding that it was to be applied as a credit on the price of the new 62-inch saw, the price of which was $145. If it was not to be so applied, there was no consideration for it. That it was given for the exact amount of the price of the first saw is only a fact tending to prove that it was given as a payment for the first saw; and this fact the jury must have determined was rebutted and entirely overcome by the direct testimony of both Rutherford and the agent, Elbon. In addition to this testimony, there is a memorandum indorsed on the order for the second saw that is made on the same kind of order blank as the first, which is as follows: "A.

B. Elbon & Co. hold A. J. Rutherford note for $108.50 for (1) 58 inserted tooth saw, which the above mentioned note is to be credited on the within orders as per guarantee." Whether or not this agreement is binding on plaintiff is immaterial, because plaintiff would either be bound to accept this contract, or otherwise make its warranty good, before it could enforce collection of the note. It could not claim the benefit of the note and at the same time refuse to comply with the contract, or to fill the order for which the note was given. If it chose to accept the benefits of this contract made by its agent, it must also bear its burdens. Dewing v. Hutton, 48 W. Va. 576, 37 S. E. 670.

As to the fourth point, the note is negotiable and was made payable to the agent Elbon, who assigned it to his principal before maturity. There was no consideration for this assignment, and plaintiff is not a purchaser of the note for value. Elbon says in his testimony that he simply held it as a matter of accommodation for the plaintiff, and that he had no interest in it except as commission agent. Plaintiff, therefore, is in no better position in respect to the note than if it had been the payee. The agent in such case is simply an accommodation indorser for his principal who holds the note subject to the equities in favor of the maker.

A number of instructions were given on behalf of the defendant and a number asked for by plaintiff refused, and objections made which are saved by bills of exceptions. But, inasmuch as the judgment appears to be plainly right upon consideration of the whole record, we do not deem it necessary to discuss the questions raised by the instructions. They appear, however, to define the law of the case as it is expressed in this opinion. Goode v. Love's Adm'r, 4 Leigh (Va.) 635; Bank v. Napier, 41 W. Va. 481, 23 S. E. 800; Davis v. Living, 50 W. Va. 431, 40 S. E. 365; Davis v. Webb, 48 W. Va. 6, 33 S. E. 97; Corder v. Talbott, 14 W. Va. 284; Oxley's Instructions to Juries, p. 35.

We find no error affecting the judgment of the lower court, and affirm it.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error to Circuit Court, Monongalia County.

Action by James A. Comley and wife against Wesley Ford. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs bring error. Affirmed.

Lazzelle & Stewart, for plaintiffs in error. Goodwin & Reay, Moreland & Moreland, and Cox & Baker, for defendant in error.

POFFENBARGER, J. James A. Comley and wife brought an action of assumpsit in the circuit court of Monongalia county to recover from Wesley Ford the sum of $2,000 as a minimum royalty reserved upon a lease of a certain tract of coal. A demurrer to the original declaration was sustained, and it was amended. The court overruled the demurrer to the amended declaration and each count thereof, whereupon certain special pleas were tendered and rejected. Then the case was submitted to the court on an agreed statement of facts, and there was a finding for the defendant. The court seems to have thought the declaration insufficient, since leave was given to amend, and the order recites that it was amended because the plaintiffs may have been misled by the overruling of their demurrer. They declined to amend and obtained a writ of error to the judgment against them. Ford was not the lessee. The lease had been executed to William T. Coburn, who, with his wife, assigned it to Ford by a written instrument, in which they recited that they had affixed their seals, but which bears none. The lease granted to Coburn, for a period of 12 years from the date thereof, the right to mine and remove all the coal under a certain tract or parcel of land containing 95 acres and 155 poles. This coal the lessors had reserved and excepted from a conveyance of the land which they had executed to one Millholland. The reservation of the coal and mining rights was expressed in the deed to Millholland in the following terms: "But the grantors save and except from the operations of this conveyance all coal * * * under the premises hereinbefore described, with powers for the parties of the first part, their heirs and assigns, to take all necessary, usual or convenient means for working and taking away the said coal * * * excepting that the said parties of the first part agree that the mining rights and privileges so saved and excepted from the operations of this conveyance, shall not be exercised in such manner as to interfere with the construction and operation of any railroad which may be built over the said premises by the said party of the second part, his heirs and assigns." After incorporating this provision of the Millholland deed, the lease proceeds as follows: "The said parties of the first part do, therefore, grant unto the said party of the second part all the rights, privileges, and easements for the purpose of mining and removing said coal from the tract of land hereinbefore described, which the said parties of the first part have by reason of the reservation in the conveyance to the said James A. Millholland." The lessee covenanted and agreed to mine and remove all the coal under the land, consisting of three veins, known as the Pittsburgh, Red Stone, and Sewickley or Mapletown, paying at the rate of eight cents per ton for the coal in the first, six cents for the coal in the second, and five cents for the coal in the third, and also to mine not less than 25,000 tons each year after the year 1905, and to pay the royalty on said quantity each year after 1905 during the life of the term, whether he mined any coal or not, with the understanding that the sum paid in any year in which no coal should be mined was to be credited upon coal mined in any subsequent year. The lease was dated February 15, 1905, and was to become void if the lessee did not on or before the 15th day of September, 1905, pay to the lessors the sum of $500, to be credited as a payment on the first coal mined. Before this became due, Coburn assigned the lease to Ford, who paid said sum of $500 on the 15th day of September, 1905. Neither Coburn nor Ford entered upon the land or did any mining under the lease.

The case may be treated as upon a demurrer to the special count in the declaration founded upon the lease, it being admitted that there is no right to recover under any of the common counts, since there is no covenant on the part of Ford to pay any rent. So treating it, the attorneys for the defendant in error say (1) there is no privity of contract, nor (2) privity of estate, and that, therefore, there can be no recovery from the assignee. The contention against the privity of estate is based upon the double view that the instrument relied upon as a lease grants a mere mining privilege, and creates no estate in the land to which there could be succession, and that the term, if any, is for more than five years and can be conveyed only by deed or will, and the instrument of assignment, not being under seal, is not a deed.

The paper executed by Comley to Coburn differs from the ordinary mining lease, such as was construed in Harvey Coal & Coke Co. v. Dillon, 59 W. Va. 605, 53 S. E. 928, 6 L. R. A. (N. S.) 628, and Toothman v. Courtney, 62 W. Va. 167, 58 S. E. 915, and other cases referred to in those decisions, in this: that it does not in terms demise, let, and lease a tract of land for mining purposes. It grants the right to mine and remove the coal, and all the rights, privileges, and easements reserved in the Millholland deed, which include all the necessary, usual, or convenient means for working and taking away the coal. The use of a portion of the surface is both necessary and convenient in the mining of coal. A grant of the coal or a right to mine the coal carries with it, by implication, the right to use so much of the surface as may be necessary. This deed expressly gives, not only what is necessary, but what may be convenient as well. The right to use a portion of the surface as well as to mine and take away the coal is given for the period of 12 years. Therefore a term or period of use of the surface land is granted. That it is not granted in express terms is immaterial. A grant by necessary implication is as complete and effective as one made in express terms. Our conclusion, therefore, is that this lease differs from those above referred to in form only, and not in substance, and though it may carry some of the features or elements of a license or privilege, it also carries an estate for years in the land.

That there can be no recovery from the assignee of the lessee until either privity of contract or privity of estate is established on the part of the assignee is uniformly asserted by the authorities. In Railroad Co. v. McIntire, 44 W. Va. 210, 28 S. E. 696, the assignee is said to be liable to the lessor because of his privity of estate. If there were an express covenant on the part of the assignee to pay the rent, there would be privity of contract. Taylor on Landlord & Tenant, § 436, says the mere assignment of the lease does not transmit to the assignee any succession in respect to the contract, and therefore does not create privity of contract. But, since he takes the estate of his assignor, the lessee, by an assignment, he becomes liable because of privity of estate, or succession to the estate vested in the lessee by the lease. If the assignment is valid and complete, passing the legal title to the lease, the assignee is liable by reason of his succession, whether he enters into possession or not. Negley v. Morgan, 46 Pa. 281; Washington Natural Gas Co. v. Johnson, 123 Pa. 576, 16 Atl. 799, 10 Am. St. Rep. 553; Fennell v. Guffey, 139 Pa. 341, 20 Atl. 1048; Fennell v. Guffey, 155 Pa. 38, 25 Atl. 785; Sanders v. Partridge, 108 Mass. 556; Babcock v. Scoville, 56 Ill. 466. If the assignee be put in possession of the leased premises, his possession raises a presumption of an assignment, and he may be liable for the rent by reason of his possession alone. The pivotal question in such case is whether he is an assignee or a mere under-tenant. If the intention or contract between him and the lessee was that he should take the whole interest in the lease, and he has taken possession under such a contract, he becomes a tenant of the lessor and is liable for the rent, whether the legal title be vested in him or not; possession alone being regarded as title sufficient to impose liability for the rent. Armstrong v. Wheeler, 9 Cow. (N. Y.) 88; Moores v. Choat, 8 Simon, 508; Carter v. Hammett, 12 Barb. (N. Y.) 253. This view is sustained by legal principle. One in possession of real estate may hold it against everybody who cannot show a right to possession in himself. Camden v. West Branch Lumber Co., 59 W. Va. 148, 53 S. E. 409. The assignee of a lessee may defend his possession against the lessor. The lease shows a right of possession in somebody other than the lessor, and the party having possession is not bound to yield it until the rightful owner demands it. As long as the lessee permits another to hold the possession, the lessor cannot complain. Whether there is a valid assignment is a matter of no interest or concern to him. That question arises between the lessee and the assignee. As the lessor cannot disturb the possession of the person admitted thereto by the lessee, such person cannot deny that he is tenant, and, being tenant, he cannot escape liability to pay the rent as long as he continues to be tenant. Being tenant in fact and in law, the element of privity exists. As between him and the lessor, he has a legal right of possession, which he derived mediately from the latter. In other words, as regards the lessor, he succeeded the lessee in the ownership of the term for the time being. "The occupant, being thus in possession in a way that the landlord cannot disturb, and having all the benefits of an actual assignee, is estopped from setting up that he is assignee only by parol agreement, and not by a valid written instrument." Carter v. Hammett, 12 Barb. (N. Y.) 253, 262. But, if the assignee is not in possession and has merely an equitable assignment, there is no succession to the estate in law and no right of recovery. In other words, there must be either possession by the assignee or he must hold the legal title to the term by an assignment. "If a lessee contracts to sell his lease, and another party contracts to purchase it of him, it would be contrary to the established principles of a court, either of law or equity, to say that thereupon any right or equity arose to the landlord either to compel the purchaser to take an assignment of the lease, or to compel the seller to assign it. No such case ever arose; for no equity could arise to the landlord to interfere in consequence of such a contract between the lessee and the intended assignee. The depositary of a lease for securing a debt has a right to file a bill for a foreclosure and to have the lease assigned to him, or, if he has an agreement for a sale, he may file a bill for specific performance, but he is not bound to do either; and, until he exercises his option, or takes possession of the tenements comprised in the lease, he stands to all intents and purposes in the character of an entire stranger to the tenancy, and the landlord has no right whatever to interfere with him." Moores v. Choat, 8 Simon, 508, 523.

Coburn having been vested with a legal estate in the land by this deed, the next inquiry is whether Ford has become owner of it as against Coburn; for, not having taken possession and not having covenanted to pay the royalty or rent, he is not liable therefor to the lessor, according to the weight of authority, unless he has succeeded Coburn in ownership of the estate vested in him. The term is for 12 years. Section 1 of chapter 71 of the Code provides that "no estate of inheritance or freehold, or for a term of more than five years, in lands, shall be conveyed, unless by deed or will." That this statute is applicable to assignments seems clear. By its terms it is not limited to the mere creation of a term. It says no term for more than five years shall be conveyed otherwise than by deed or will. The statute of frauds, inhibiting sales of interests in real estate otherwise than by written instruments, applies to assignments of leases. Briles v. Pace, 35 N. C. 279; Johnson v. Reading, 36 Mo. App. 306; Hunt v. Coe & Wells, 15 Iowa, 197; Chicago Attachment Co. v. Sewing Machine Co., 142 Ill. 171, 31 N. E. 438, 15 L. R. A. 754; Brown on Stat. Frauds, § 41. It logically follows that a deed is necessary under a statute, saying no conveyance of a term shall be made otherwise than by deed or will. In some states, probably most of them, a deed is not necessary; a note in writing being sufficient. The Pennsylvania statute requires a deed or note in writing. If the instrument by which Coburn attempted to assign the lease to Ford expresses the intention to convey, by the use of appropriate terms, and would be regarded as a deed, if it were under seal, a question we are not called upon to decide, it is nevertheless no deed, because it is not a sealed instrument. It bears no scroll, seal, letter, or mark that the parties could have referred to in the testimonium clause. That clause says: "In witness whereof we have hereunto set our hands and seals." This is not sufficient as is insisted in the brief for the plaintiff in error. Something must appear on the paper to which the word "seals" may be referred. "The word 'sealed,' inserted in the body of an instrument, promising to pay money, will not make it a specialty, without a seal, an (L. S.), or some equivalent mark annexed." Mitchell v. Parham, Harp. (S. C.) 3; Patterson v. Galliher, 122 N. C. 511, 29 S. E. 773; Vance v. Funk, 3 Ill. 263; Taylor v. Glaser, 2 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 502. On this question there seems to be no precedent or rule in any of the decisions of this court or the Virginia court. A number of decisions by both courts say it is necessary to recognize the seal or scroll in the body of the instrument, if it be one which is not required by law to be under seal, and that it is not absolutely necessary to do so, if it be one which the law requires to be under seal, but in neither class is there any intimation that the seal itself may be omitted. Hence, they have no application to the question here presented. As the instrument cannot be regarded as a deed, it does not pass the legal title to the lease, and there is no privity of estate, from which it follows there can be no recovery from the defendant.

As the declaration shows no election on the part of the defendant, in respect to the vein from which coal shall be taken, it is urged that, even if the legal title had passed to him, uncertainty of the contract, as set forth in the declaration, would prevent recovery. This question we do not pass upon. Anything we might say on the subject would be obiter.

For the reasons stated, the judgment must be affirmed.

Affirmed.

JACKSON v. WHEELING TERMINAL RY. CO. et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia. March 30, 1909.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 142*)—PROMULGATION OF RULES—SUFFICIENCY.

In adopting and using the standard railroad rules, generally observed in the operation of railroads, so far as they are applicable to its business, a railroad company sufficiently discharges the legal duty to protect its employees from injury by the promulgation and enforcement of rules for that purpose.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 285; Dec. Dig. § 142.*]

2. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 142*)—PROMULGATION OF RULES—SUFFICIENCY.

The necessity for such rules, and the character thereof, depend on the nature and extent of the master's business, and such of the approved rules as apply to classes of trains and railroad operations, not used in the business, may be discarded or ignored.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 285; Dec. Dig. § 142.*]

3. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 85*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—MEASURE OF MASTER'S DUTY.

The measure of the master's duty to the servant, in respect to affirmative action for his safety, depends upon the extent to which he is allowed opportunity, and has the means or power, for his own protection. As limitations are imposed upon him and his freedom restrained, his power of self-protection is diminished, and the master's duty increased. As limitations and restraints are removed, withheld, or relaxed, the servant's power of self-protection is enlarged, and the duty of the master correspondingly reduced.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 135; Dec. Dig. § 85.*]

4. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 142*)—PROMULGATION OF RULES—REASONABLENESS.

In view of the duties imposed by the standard railroad rules upon train crews for their own protection, and that of their fellow servants, the provision in said rules for running two or more trains, one after another, in the same direction, over a single track, without giving the crews thereof telegraphic information of the relative positions of the trains, is reasonable, and not violative of duty.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 285; Dec. Dig. § 142.*]

5. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 141*)—DUTY TO PROMULGATE RULES.

A railroad company, operating only a small terminal railroad, is not bound to run scheduled or limited trains, nor to adopt or observe rules applicable to such trains. It may require all of its trains to run extra, and be kept under control in the sense that they may be instantly stopped to avoid collision or other causes of injury, and devolve upon the crews the duty of protecting themselves and one another by their diligence, caution, prudence, and the use of the signals prescribed by the standard rules.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 288; Dec. Dig. § 141.*]

6. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 145*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—RULES—SUPERSEDING.

The partial supersession of yard limit rules, by the adoption and use of certain orders inconsistent therewith, does not wholly dispense with them. They still apply in a modified form.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 288; Dec. Dig. § 145.*]

7. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 240*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—OPERATION OF TERMINAL RAILROAD.

If a company, operating its road under yard or yard limit rules, forbids the running of trains over a certain portion of the road without orders, limiting them in respect to the time of starting, and requiring them to run extra, and such orders are issued, the trains receiving them are not thereby scheduled in respect to speed or time, nor their crews relieved from the duty of vigilance and self-protection; nor is it negligence to start two such trains in the same direction on a single track, in close proximity to one another, without advising the crew of each of the location of, and orders given to, the other.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 752; Dec. Dig. § 240.*]

8. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 240*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

If two trains, running under such orders, are passing through a tunnel, and the crew of the one following find the tunnel filled with smoke, so dense as to prevent them from ascertaining, by sight, whether there is a train ahead of them, and so close as to render it dangerous for them to proceed, the presence of the smoke is sufficient to put them upon inquiry, and it is their duty to stop, if necessary, and not to proceed until the track is clear; and, if they fail to do so, and injury to one of them results, no recovery therefor can be had, since the cause thereof is the negligence of the person injured and his co-servants.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 752; Dec. Dig. § 240.*]

9. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 198*)—FELLOW SERVANTS—WHO ARE.

If trains of one railroad company are run over the track of another, under the complete control of a servant of the latter, known as a "pilot," the crews of such trains are fellow servants of the crews operating the trains of the owner of such track.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 493; Dec. Dig. § 198.*]

10. EXCEPTIONS, BILL OF (§ 13*)—SUFFICIENCY—INCORPORATING EVIDENCE.

A bill of exceptions is not open to the charge that it does not contain all the evidence adduced, if it purports to embody "the evidence" in the case, and the order of the court making it part of the record describes it as containing "all the evidence" introduced; such description being consistent with the terms of the bill, and presumed to rest upon knowledge, on the part of the court, derived from sources other than the bill of exceptions itself.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Exceptions, Bill of, Cent. Dig. § 13; Dec. Dig. § 13.*]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error to Circuit Court, Ohio County.

Action by Charles G. Jackson against the Wheeling Terminal Railway Company and another. There was a verdict for plaintiff, which was set aside on motion, and he brings error. Affirmed.

Dovener & Fickelson and J. J. Coniff, for plaintiff in error. J. B. Sommerville and H. M. Russell, for defendants in error.

POFFENBARGER, J. In an action for damages resulting from personal injury Charles G. Jackson obtained a verdict for the sum of $10,000 against the Wheeling Terminal Railway Company and the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company, in the circuit court of Ohio county, which was set aside on motion, and he obtained a writ of error to the judgment.

Objection to consideration of the case on its merits is based upon the contention that the evidence has not been made part of the record; it being urged that the bill of exceptions does not show that the evidence therein embraced is all that was adduced at the trial. The bill of exceptions does not use the word "all." In one place it says the plaintiff "asked the court to sign and seal his bill of exceptions, certifying all of the instructions and the evidence given during the trial of said cause, which is here accordingly done." Following this, there is a caption inserted reading as follows: "Transcript of Evidence in Case of Charles G. Jackson v. Wheeling Terminal Co. and B. & O. R. R. Co." Below this appears the style of the case, and a memorandum showing the names of the attorneys representing the parties. After this appears the following: "Be it remembered that on the trial of this cause, after the jury had been selected and sworn, as in the record is set forth, the following evidence was introduced by the plaintiff and the defendant, respectively." But the court, in the order which makes the bill of exceptions part of the record, says the plaintiff "presented to the court his bill of exceptions containing the instructions given in said cause, and all the evidence introduced in the trial in said cause." This recital, though in terms descriptive and susceptible of a construction, denying it the function of affirmation, is, it must be remembered, part of a solemn court order, possessing higher character than a pleading, and deemed to be true. We may summon to its aid the presumption that the court verified it by personal recollection, the notes taken during the trial, and the assent of the parties. It, in no sense, contradicts the bill itself. On the contrary, it accords with the terms thereof, saying it incorporates "the evidence" introduced, and literally importing completeness. Hall v. Hall, 12 W. Va. 1, invoked to sustain the position taken in the brief, is inapplicable, since it relates to a wholly different subject, namely, how far separate bills of exception can be read together, or used to sustain, or complete, one another.

The evidence proves, and tends to prove, the following material facts: The Wheeling Terminal Railway Company owns and operates a short terminal railroad, by means of which transfers of cars are made from railroad to railroad, and between the railroads and shippers in and around the city of Wheeling. Its road passes through a tunnel, under what is known as "Chapline Hill," 2,473 feet in length. It has its own engines, cars, crews, and officers, including a superintendent and train dispatcher, and operates its road under the standard railway rules and regulations, so far as they are applicable; but, in view of the character of the road and the nature of the company's business, some of the rules are deemed inapplicable. Some time before the injury complained of occurred, an arrangement was made between the Wheeling Terminal Company and the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company, by which the latter was permitted to run its coal trains over the tracks of the former. Whether other railroads were allowed to do likewise as to any of their trains is not disclosed. After this arrangement had been made, certain railway rules, not previously observed, were put in force. Until that time it seems the terminal company's trains could enter the tunnel without a special order from the train dispatcher, but afterwards no train was permitted to do so. Before this change was made, only the rules applicable to yards and yard limits were observed. There was one exception under the new order of things. The La Belle Iron Works used exclusively one of the two tracks in the tunnel for storage of cars, and ran on it a small engine, popularly known as the "La Belle Buck," for putting in, taking out, and shifting them. This engine came and went at its will. On every Baltimore & Ohio train there was stationed a terminal company employé, known as "pilot," while it was passing over the terminal tracks. The orders for such a train were given to the pilot, and the train crew obeyed his orders, he observing the orders issued by the dispatcher. No train, while on the terminal tracks, was scheduled as to them. All ran extra, the time of starting alone being fixed in the orders, and each train being expected to pass over the track with such speed as was practicable and consistent with the observance of the rules prescribing the duties of crews in charge of extra trains. When trains were sent in the same direction over the road, no notice was given to the crew of one, concerning the relative situation of, or the orders given to, the other, and they passed through the tunnel in the order in which they reached it. To such trains orders could be given, complete at the same time and place, the object being to forbid their starting before the time designated in the order, not to require them to start at that time. According to the testimony of several witnesses, qualified by occupation and experience to testify on the subject, this method of running trains over the same track in the same direction conformed to the rules and practice of railroad operation throughout the United States, Canada, and Mexico. Of course such orders are not given to trains going in opposite directions on the same track without provision for passing at some point.

On the morning of August 23, 1902, at the station of the terminal company, two orders were given practically at the same time. One was written and delivered right after the other. The first was handed to the conductor of the company's own train, propelled by engine No. 3, ordering it to proceed from north to south through the tunnel to what is known as the "Pan Handle Transfer," distant something less than a mile, and there pick up and bring back a stock car. The other was given to the pilot who was to pass through the tunnel on the train drawn by engine No. 3, and, at the far end thereof, take charge of the Baltimore & Ohio coal train, propelled by engines Nos. 216 and 218, and having in it 33 cars, and bring that train through the tunnel and conduct it off of the terminal tracks. At the south end of the tunnel a branch of the terminal road ran southwest a distance of 2,475 feet to the Pan Handle transfer, while another branch ran south about 1,945 feet to the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad, where the train in question came onto the terminal company's track. The pilot Burke went through the tunnel on the terminal company's engine in company with the plaintiff, a brakeman, and, on reaching La Belle Junction, situated at the south end of the tunnel, and at the point at which the road branches in two directions, as above stated, he got off. The Baltimore & Ohio train was then in sight, and moving in the direction of the tunnel. He signaled it to come on, and, when it reached the junction, boarded the front engine, leaving orders at the switch for the rear brakeman. The terminal company's train proceeded to the Pan Handle Junction, picked up the stock car, and started back with it, intending to follow the other train through the tunnel on the same track. The Baltimore & Ohio train was pulled by one engine and pushed by another. As the terminal engine came up, it was running backward and pushing the stock car ahead of it. Plaintiff and another brakeman were standing on the sill of the front end of the car. When the terminal train got well into the tunnel, its crew found it filled with a dense smoke, which rendered it impossible for them to see anything. Proceeding, nevertheless, they passed the center of the tunnel, the highest point in it, and, shutting off the power, drifted some distance, when a rear end collision occurred, the stock car being driven against the rear engine of the coal train. The plaintiff was so badly crushed that one leg and some of the toes of the foot of the other had to be amputated. All the crew of the terminal train admit the density of the smoke and their ignorance of the cause of it. Knowing the practice of the La Belle shifter, they say they thought the smoke might have come from it, and also that it might have been the smoke from their own engine, made in previously passing through. The order given to the terminal train became complete at 5 o'clock a. m.; that is, it could be acted upon after 5 o'clock, but not before. The train started, according to the testimony, about 5:05. The order for the Baltimore & Ohio train became complete at 5:16, and reached La Belle Junction in the hands of the pilot, at the south end of the tunnel, at 5:15. The witnesses who were on the Baltimore & Ohio train say it was running at from five to seven miles an hour at the time of the collision, and at that rate the time consumed in passing through the tunnel would have been from 4 to 5½ minutes. Burke, the pilot, testifies that, as he went over on the terminal engine, the plaintiff, Jackson, opened and closed a switch just north of the tunnel, and was told by witness not to lock it as he (Burke) wanted to use it when he "came right through." He also says that, when he alighted from the terminal train, at the south end of the tunnel, Jackson said to him, "There they are up there waiting on you," and it appears that the Baltimore & Ohio train was then in sight.

The duty of an employer to formulate and enforce rules, to be observed by his servants as a means of protecting them from injury by the acts of one another, as well as that of common carriers of passengers to do so for that purpose, and also the purpose of safety and protection to the persons carried by them, is asserted by all courts; and there is like unanimity in the decisions to the effect that the necessity for such rules, as well as their nature, depends upon the character and scope of the business. But there are functions to be performed, and conditions to be dealt with, even in an extensive and complex railroad system, not susceptible of control or government by general rules respecting all matters of detail. These must be intrusted to the caution and diligence of the employes using the means provided for such occasions and exigencies, rather than responding to specific directions, given in view of the peculiar conditions. Thus, in Railroad Co. v. Carruthers, 56 Kan. 309, 43 Pac. 230, there is a strong intimation that no system of rules for the control of operations within a railroad yard, descending into all the details of switching, shifting and coupling cars, could be devised and operated with success. In that case the court declared it incompetent for a jury to charge a railroad company with negligence in failing to prescribe a code of rules or system of signals for the giving of notice or warning of the approach of detached cars in a railroad yard, in the absence of evidence showing that such system would be feasible or useful. In the testimony of witnesses taken in this case, practical railroad men, having had years of experience in railroad operation, repeatedly declare that, in yards and within yard limits, trains run without regard to schedules of time and speed limits, and that the matter of safety to passengers and employes is intrusted to the watchfulness and care of the train crews, a general rule requiring every engine, when in the yards or yard limits, to be brought and kept within the control of the engineer, so that it can be stopped at any time, and the train crews being able to know, by means of observation and communication, through the signals prescribed by general rules such as blasts of the whistle, sounds of the bell, and motions of employes, where every train and engine is, and cause it to be handled so as to avoid collision and injuries. Of course there is not an entire absence of rules. General rules require the engines to be kept under control within the limits, as well as provide signals to be observed, and impose upon the brakemen, flagmen, and others the duty to be watchful, diligent, and prudent as each exigency arises. At the same time, it is to be observed that within these limits trains do not, as a general rule, run on any schedule, nor have any exclusive right to the track or right of way. There may be exceptions to this in cases of through trains not stopping at certain stations, but having occasion to pass through yards. A general notice of their time, afforded by their schedules, and an order requiring the track to be kept clear through the yard when they are expected to pass, may except them from the general rule, and so supersede what are known as "yard limits." It is easy to perceive, too, that even on the main line the safety of trains may be intrusted, to some extent, to duties imposed upon the train crews, rather than to instructions from the train dispatcher, without any violation of duty on the part of the company. There are many miles of space between stations on the lines of some railroads so that, in case of delay between them, caused by accident, it could not be known at the managing office until the time for arrival had passed; there being no means of communication with the stations from any point between them. If two or more trains, following one another, were not permitted to enter upon such a space, it would result in hours of delay, loss in operating, expenses and inconvenience to the general public. As the ingenuity of railroad men has devised means of enabling them to do so with perfect, or at least reasonable, safety, this loss of time and inconvenience becomes unnecessary, and therefore the law does not inflict it.

Experience has demonstrated that ordinarily trains are not delayed. Accidents constitute the exception, not the rule; and generally two or a dozen trains may follow one another over such a space without collision, interference, or the slightest danger to one another, if the crews perform their duties. For the exceptional cases provision is made by certain duties imposed upon these servants. In case one train stops for any reason, it is the duty of the rear flagman to go back a sufficient distance to enable him to cause the following train to stop and thus avoid collision. If a train is delayed, and a following train does not overtake it at the point of stoppage, means are provided for giving notice of the delay. One or more torpedoes are fastened to the track, and, exploding, indicate to the following train the rate of speed at which it should run, or a fusee is dropped from a moving train, which, burning for 10 minutes, will halt a following train until it burns out. In case of any indication of danger ahead, no matter what its nature may be, it is the duty of the crew to stop the train and send a flagman forward to investigate. What are known as extra or wild trains are frequently sent out after regular or scheduled trains. They are required to make the best time they can, observing the schedules of the regular trains, these being known to them, and it being their duty to observe them without any special instructions to do so. In such cases extra precautions are exacted of the crew. Prudence, caution, and safety do not require notice to be given to the crews of several trains, going in the same direction on a single track, of their relative positions. Experience has shown that it is thus practicable, without endangering employes or passengers, to devolve upon the train crews, under certain conditions, the management and control of the trains, and that it is necessary to do so to avoid a useless waste of time, and economize in the interest of the railroad company and the general public. Freeing the men, under such circumstances, from time and speed requirements, is in itself a rule or measure conducive to safety, and, at the same time, permissive of enlarged duty and responsibility on the part of the employes. If an employe were not required to do anything but take care of himself, no hardship would be inflicted upon him by the requirement. If his duties are such as to allow him no opportunity to take measures for his own protection, the employer must provide for his safety by keeping others out of his way. As limitations are imposed and freedom restrained, the means of self-protection are diminished. As limitations are removed, ability of the servant to protect himself is enlarged. Such rules as have just been indicated have been judicially approved. Nolan's Adm'x v. N. Y., N. H. & H. R. R. Co., 70 Conn. 159, 39 Atl. 115, 43 L. R. A. 305; Enright v. Toledo, A. A. & N. M. Ry. Co., 93 Mich. 409, 53 N. W. 536; Illinois C. R. R. Co. v. Neer, 31 Ill. App. 128.

In Nolan v. Railroad Co. the court declared as follows: "The legal duty of a railroad company operating a single-track road to its employes is not violated by failure to provide in its rules for giving those in charge of trains moving in the same direction telegraphic information of the relative position of the trains. A railroad company operating a single-track road is not negligent in failing to give those in charge of trains moving in the same direction telegraphic information of the relative position of the trains." In the opinion the court said: "The conditions in general attending trains moving in the same direction under the rules, without telegraphic information of their relative position, include: All trains, regular or extra, made up in all ways, even to a single engine; trains off their regular time, way freights being commonly behind time; stopping places for trains which are used only occasionally, and not at regular intervals; trains moving at all times of day and night, and in all conditions of weather and atmosphere; trains moving at various rates of relative speed. The special facts found, from which, apparently, the inference of an exceptional case or emergency is drawn, are the following: Train 474 consisted of an engine pushing a snowplow. Train 1,411 was upward of an hour behind its schedule time. Train 1,411 stopped to attach three freight cars at Kent Furnace, which is merely a siding where freight trains stop occasionally and at regular intervals. The rear train, when in motion, moved at a faster rate of speed than the forward train. The day was very cold, and the snowplow threw snow considerably, rendering it difficult for the lookout stationed on the snowplow to see ahead. Just before the accident the plow was not throwing much snow, and the lookout could see. We think the conditions shown by these special facts, considered by themselves, or in connection with all the special facts found, are within the conditions in general attending trains moving in the same direction, do not constitute an exceptional case or emergency unprovided for by the general rules, and did not throw upon the defendant or its train dispatcher the special duty of keeping the conductors of those trains informed by telegraph of their relative position. No other inference can be legally drawn from the facts." To the same general effect, see Kennelly v. Railroad Co., 166 Pa. 60, 30 Atl. 1014.

In view of these general principles it becomes necessary to determine what the duty of the Terminal Railway Company was. As has been stated, it used the standard code of rules, as far as they were deemed applicable, but how far they were applicable the evidence does not clearly disclose. It indicates that the trains were not scheduled, nor susceptible of government and control by schedules. Before the Baltimore & Ohio trains were allowed to go over its tracks, all trains were permitted to enter the tunnel without orders, and all trains ran extra, and without limitation. It is also said that the effect of the orders afterwards given was not to change the character of the trains from extra to regular, but only partially to supersede the yard limit rules. This implies that, in the absence of such orders, all trains and engines operated under yard rules, and this imports that all such trains were required to be run at a low rate of speed and kept under control, so that train crews would be able to protect themselves at all times, if they were diligent and careful in the performance of their duties. There is no evidence tending to show that any train on the road was scheduled, or that the two trains in collision were scheduled. No reason is perceived why a company, operating a short road, having many connections by switches, and used substantially for the purpose of switching and transferring cars from one railroad to another, and between railroads and points of consignment and delivery, may not, if it sees fit to do so, dispense with schedules, and operate its engines and trains as they are operated within the yard limits of a large railroad system. If it operates no scheduled trains, the rules relating to such trains could have no application. If all its trains and engines are made subject to the rules governing operations within yard limits, it is clearly under no duty to prescribe or observe any rules other than those which experience has shown to be adequate and reasonable under such conditions. These rules require nothing of the train crews that render them unable to provide for their own safety. It is their duty to know when the track ahead of them is clear, and not to proceed without knowing it to be so. They are under no time limit requiring them to maintain any particular rate of speed, and they are required to keep the trains under control, so that they can be almost instantly stopped, when they are unable to see that control of them may be safely released. For instance, if within the yard limits the engineer perceives a clear track for some distance, and knows, by reason of the switch connections, that nothing can obtrude itself so as to make a high rate of speed dangerous, it is possible he may put on the steam, and for the time being let the engine get beyond control in the sense that it cannot be instantly stopped; but, if he does this without knowing it is safe to do so, he does it without necessity, and not in obedience to any rule, but in violation of the rule and of his duty. Transportation under such limitations must necessarily be comparatively slow; but, if the railroad company sees fit to operate its road in that manner, there is no limitation upon its power to do so, nor is it under any duty to provide or adopt any rules beyond such as are reasonably safe. It seems logically clear, also, that a railroad company so operating may modify the yard limit rules by adoption and use of some orders applicable to schedule trains on main line roads, without wholly dispensing with yard limit rules, or adopting all the rules applicable to scheduled trains; and, if it does so, the adoption of such additional rules does not impose a duty, respecting them or trains operating under them, higher than, or different from, that which rests upon companies operating scheduled trains or extra trains under the same rules. In other words, if a railroad company may send one extra train after another on a single track, outside of the yard limits, without notifying each crew of the relation of its train to the other, it seems clear that the same thing may be done within the yard limits, without relieving the crews of the duties imposed upon them by the yard limit rules.

The employes of the Terminal Railway Company were supplied with books of rules, and the testimony indicates that they were all familiar with them, not only those applicable to operations within the railroad yards, but the others as well. In the exercise of their daily duties they observed such of them as were applicable. The conductor, engineer, and brakemen all knew what was required of them by these rules. The track on which they worked was similar to other railroad tracks. While they operated through a tunnel, that fact did not relieve them from the duties imposed upon them by the rules, nor impose upon the company the duty to formulate rules for operations within the tunnel different from those observed by other railroads running trains through tunnels; and it is not contended here that any special duty in respect to the tunnel was omitted. Something is said about a target, sometimes used in it for the purpose of giving notice of the passing of trains, not to the train dispatcher, but to some other officer, but the purpose of this is not made clear. It could not have been intended for the purpose of enabling the train dispatcher to control trains within the tunnel, for there was no means by which he could communicate with them while in it. The whole tendency of the testimony is to the effect that all the trains, whether in or out of the tunnel, were completely within the control of their crews, who were so far free from restrictions as to time and speed that they could protect themselves, and that the rules under which they were operating contemplated that they should do so. A thing peculiar to the tunnel was that, under certain atmospheric conditions, the smoke made by passing trains would remain in it for some time, while, under other conditions, it would clear out almost immediately, and, when the tunnel was free from smoke, the view through it was unobstructed, so that trains might follow one another through it with practically as much safety as they could follow one another elsewhere on the track. The light trains of the terminal company made comparatively little smoke, while the heavy ones of the Baltimore & Ohio Company made a great deal, enough to fill the tunnel full, so that nothing could be seen. This, we must assume, was well known to those who were daily passing through the tunnel and had constant opportunities to observe it.

In view of all the circumstances and conditions, we are of the opinion that there was no failure of duty on the part of the railway company in respect to the adoption and promulgation of rules, nor on the part of the train dispatcher in giving the orders under which the trains were running. These orders were taken from the forms prescribed by the rules, and given in accordance with the rules. Certain other orders could have been given which would have prevented the collision, and it is insisted that the train dispatcher failed in his duty by not giving them. It is to be observed, however, that the company was under no duty to do more than make a reasonable provision for the safety of its employes, and that it could devolve upon them the duty to preserve themselves from danger by relieving them of time and speed requirements so as to enable them to do so. The reasons for this view have already been stated, and there is no occasion to repeat them.

Some authority is cited for the position that a train dispatcher is not a fellow servant of the trainmen on a railroad; but it is unnecessary to inquire whether, by the weight of authority, or any decisions of this court, the proposition is true, since there was no failure of duty on the part of the train dispatcher.

Our conclusion is that the injury was the result of negligence on the part of the men in charge of the trains, all of whom were fellow servants. Those in charge of the terminal company's train were unquestionably so, and the Baltimore & Ohio train was under the control of the pilot, a servant of the terminal company. Its crew took their orders from him, and the train, while under his control, was operated under the Terminal Railway Company's rules. For the purposes of this case, therefore, the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company's servants were the servants of the Terminal Railway Company, and fellow servants of the crew of the other train. The presence of dense smoke in the tunnel was sufficient to put the crew of the following train on inquiry, and deter them from proceeding without knowing the cause of it. By the exercise of diligence and care they could have ascertained the danger, and it was their duty to do so.

Perceiving no error in the judgment complained of, we affirm it.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Twiggs County; J. H. Martin, Judge.

Action by Monroe Phillips and others against J. T. Bond. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs bring error. Reversed.

Jno. R. L. Smith, for plaintiffs in error. Olin J. Wimberly and Akerman & Akerman, for defendant in error.

LUMPKIN, J. An action of ejectment in the common-law form was brought on the several demises of Monroe Phillips, as executor of the will of Hayward H. Phillips, Monroe Phillips individually, Robert H. Cowart, by his guardian, Monroe Phillips, John Phillips, Mary J. Reed, Roxie A. Stapleton, Lorena R. Johnston, and Ophelia R. Phillips, against J. T. Bond. The defendant testified that he purchased the land from Mrs. Johnston and Mrs. Stapleton and went into possession; that he then sold the land to one Rogers, receiving $500 in cash and a mortgage for $2,500; that Rogers sold the property to the Reco Mining Company and put them in possession; and that he purchased at a sale made by the United States marshal under an execution against the mining company and took possession. In answer to the question, "The only title that you claim is this marshal's deed, is not that correct, outside of your mortgage?" He answered, "Yes, sir; I suppose so; that is all I could claim." There was introduced in evidence a warranty deed from Lorena H. Johnston and Roxie A. Stapleton to J. T. Bond, dated May 11, 1901, and recorded June 1, 1901, conveying the premises in dispute, and also a warranty deed from J. T. Bond to R. M. Rogers, dated June 4, 1901, and recorded June 22, 1901, and a warranty deed from R. M. Rogers to Reco Mining Company, dated June 24, 1901, and recorded December 2, 1901. The writ of execution from the United States court and the marshal's deed made in pursuance of the sale thereunder were introduced in evidence, the deed being dated November 5, 1906, and reciting that the sale was made on August 7, 1906, preceding. The execution stated that the judgment was recovered on March 25, 1902. The defendant offered in evidence a record from the superior court of the same county, in an action of complaint to recover the land now in controversy, brought by Monroe Phillips, executor, one of the lessors in the present case, against the Reco Mining Company, alleged to be a corporation of New Jersey. The suit was brought to the April term, 1902, of the superior court. The entry of service was in the following words: "Georgia, Twiggs County. I have this day served the defendant's agt., J. T. Dean, with a copy of the within writ, by handing copy to said agt."—signed by the sheriff and dated March 22, 1902. On April 7, 1903, the record shows that a jury found a verdict in that case in favor of the plaintiff for the premises in dispute, and a judgment was entered thereon. This record was rejected from evidence, on objection, on the ground that the return of service was not sufficient to show a legal service upon the defendant, and that therefore the proceeding and the verdict and judgment therein were not binding upon the defendant in the present case. The plaintiffs having rested their case, on motion of the defendant a nonsuit was granted, and the plaintiffs excepted.

1, 2. The controlling question in this case is whether the entry of service in the former suit was sufficient to show service on the defendant corporation. The sheriff's entry of service stated that "I have this day served the defendant's agt., J. T. Dean, with a copy of the within writ, by handing copy to said agt." The objection was that it did not recite that the sheriff had served the defendant corporation, but only that he had served its agent. Section 1899 of the Civil Code of 1895 is as follows: "Service of all subpoenas, writs, attachments and other process necessary to the commencement of any suit against any corporation in any court, except as hereinafter provided, may be perfected by serving any officer or agent of such corporation, or by leaving the same at the place of transacting the usual and ordinary public business of such corporation, if any such place of business then shall be within the jurisdiction of the court in which said suit may be commenced. The officer shall specify the mode of service in his return." It would doubtless have been more accurate if the sheriff had returned that he served the corporation by serving its agent personally with the copy of the petition and process directed to it. The statute itself does not, however, prescribe the exact form of the return to be made. It says that service of all writs against any corporation, except as otherwise later provided in the Code, "may be perfected by serving any officer or agent of such corporation," etc. It does not itself in express terms say that the service may be perfected on the corporation by serving any officer or agent thereof, but, of course, it means this. It declares in substance that, where not otherwise provided, the legal effect of serving a process necessary to the commencement of a suit against a corporation (which must be directed to the corporation to make it a party) by serving any officer or agent of such corporation with such process shall be to perfect service on the corporation itself. This contemplates personal service on the agent. The other mode of serving the corporation by leaving a copy at the place of transacting its usual and ordinary business is not here involved. An examination of other statutes in regard to serving various corporations will show that great verbal nicety is not used in some of them. Thus in Civ. Code 1895, § 1984, it is declared that "service of the process upon the agent of any such banks shall be as legal and effectual as if served on the president, cashier, or bank at its usual place of business." This had reference to service of process in a suit brought against a bank. Of course, it did not mean to say that service of process upon the agent was not service upon the bank, though such a technical, verbal criticism might be made from the language employed. It evidently meant that serving the agent with process directed to the bank should be effectual as a service on the bank. The section immediately following (1985) declares that, "when such process is served upon such agent, the proceedings thereafter shall be conformable to the provisions of existing laws in suits against banks; and the judgment, when obtained, shall be as binding and effectual as judgments against banks now are by law."

These laws as to service must be construed in connection with other laws which provide what must be served. It is required, in cases of suits begun in courts of record by petition, that the clerk shall annex a process calling on the defendant to appear at the term fixed by law for that purpose, and that a copy of the petition and process shall be served on the defendant. As corporations are artificial persons having no visible personality on which service can be made by the sheriff or serving officer, the Legislature has provided certain means by which service of process may be perfected upon them. One of these is by serving "any officer or agent of such corporation," except where otherwise provided. Suppose that the sheriff, in addition to the entry of service which he made in the present case, had added a statement that, under section 1899 of the Civil Code of 1895, the service which he had made upon the agent, as shown by the preceding portion of his entry, operated to perfect service upon the corporation, and that he declared it to have that legal effect, how much force would such declaration on the part of the sheriff have added to the effect which the law gave to the service on the agent? Here was a petition against a corporation, with a process annexed thereto, summoning the corporation to appear at the proper term of court; and the sheriff's entry showed that he had served the defendant's agent with "the within writ" by handing a copy to such agent. The corporation was sued, summoned, and a copy of the writ (presumably including the copy of the petition, as that was required to have the process annexed to it and be thus served) was delivered to the person to whom the law required that it should be delivered in order that service might be "perfected." Why does this not perfect the service? In Jones v. Tarver, 19 Ga. 279, a suit was brought against an individual, one mode of service permissible being by leaving a copy at the defendant's residence. The sheriff's return there involved showed that he had left copies "at the house of the defendant." This was held sufficient. In Morris v. Bradford, 19 Ga. 528, the entry of service considered was in the following terms: "Left a copy of the within bill of injunction at the residence of George W. Crawford, one of the defendants, this day, December 11, 1841." There was no answer of Crawford filed to the bill, and a decree was taken. It was held that this service was sufficient to give force and effect to a decree against him. In National Bank of Augusta v. Southern Porcelain Mfg. Co., 55 Ga. 36, it was held that "service upon the president of the company in the county of Richmond, where he resided at the commencement of the action, and where the books of the company were, and where the stockholders were under notice to meet, is sufficient service upon the company." From the original record of file in the office of the clerk of this court it appears that the entry there made was as follows: "I have this day served the defendant, James S. Hope, president, personally with a copy of the within petition and process." In Central Railroad v. Smith, 69 Ga. 268, the plaintiff brought suit against the defendant for a personal injury alleged to have occurred while the defendant was operating and running the trains of the Southwestern Railroad, which it had leased. The following entry of service was made by the sheriff: "I have this day executed the within writ by serving a copy thereof on R. T. Gilbert, agent Central Railroad & Banking Company at Georgetown." It was held that, "where one railroad in this state has leased and is operating another, in a suit against the lessee, an entry of service by the sheriff by serving personally its depot agent was sufficient." In Mitchell v. Southwestern Railroad, 75 Ga. 398, the return of service by the sheriff was as follows: "I have this day served Lott Warren, agent, at the depot, at Americus, Sumter county, Georgia, personally with a copy of the within, this March 20, 1883." A second original issued, with process directed to the sheriff of Bibb county, and was served on the president of the defendant in that county. The defendant traversed the entry of service and pleaded to the jurisdiction, alleging that it had no office and no agent in Sumter county, and that all of its property was held by the Central Railroad Company under a lease. It also made a motion to dismiss the case, on the ground that there was no legal service. It was held that the service was sufficient.

It was argued on behalf of the defendant in error that in none of the cases cited was the exact point discussed which is now made, namely, that the entry of the sheriff should state that the service was made on the defendant by delivering a copy to its agent, and not merely that he served the writ upon the agent of the corporation by handing it to him. It is true that the precise contention now made has not been discussed; but entries of service quite similar to, certainly no more formal than, that which was made in the present case have been treated as sufficient, especially after judgment has been rendered thereon without objection. In Keener v. Eagle Lake Land Co., 110 Cal. 667, 43 Pac. 14, service was made by a private individual (which apparently was permissible under the laws of California), and he made an affidavit showing such service on the defendant corporation. Judgment by default was rendered, and the defendant appealed. The appellant urged that the judgment was void because there was no proof of service of summons upon the defendant. It was held that, "in an action against a corporation, an affidavit of service of summons, stating that it was personally served upon a designated person, described as the managing agent of the corporation, by delivering to such managing agent personally a copy of the summons attached to a copy of the complaint, sufficiently shows that the service was made upon the corporation, and is prima facie proof that the person served was its managing agent upon whom the summons was authorized to be served for the corporation." In the opinion Harrison, J., said: "It is objected that this affidavit merely shows that the service was made upon Elledge, and does not show that it was made upon the corporation. * * * It sufficiently appears from the complaint that the defendant is a corporation, and the corporation is the only defendant in the action." So in the case before us the record of the former proceeding which was tendered in evidence showed that the only defendant was the Reco Mining Company, that process was issued against it alone, and that the sheriff returned that he had served "the defendant's agt.," naming him, with a copy of the writ by handing it to "said agt." It is clear that the corporation was the defendant against whom the plaintiff brought the action, that the sheriff, in making his entry of service, recognized the corporation as the defendant on whom he was attempting to perfect such service, and that he did this in the way pointed out by the statute, namely, by personally serving the defendant's agent. We agree with the Supreme Court of California in saying that "it would be sacrificing substance to form to hold that this service was not made upon the defendant." In Grand Rapids Chair Co. v. Runnels, 77 Mich. 104, 43 N. W. 1006, it was held that a return of service of process upon "Charles C. Comstock, as president of the Grand Rapids Chair Company, who is the owner of said goods and chattels described in within writ," sufficiently showed a service on the corporation named. In the opinion Morse, J., said: "It is not best to void the sheriff's return, and thereby nullify the whole proceedings in 19 suits, by hairsplitting."

Service, or waiver of service, is necessary to give a court jurisdiction to render judgment against the defendant. If there is an entire absence of a return of service, or if the return made is void because showing service upon the wrong person, or at a time, place, or in a manner not provided by law, the court should not proceed. The return of the officer is evidence of the service. "If, however, the fact of service appears, and the officer's return is irregular and incomplete, it should not be treated as no evidence, but rather as furnishing defective proof of the fact of service." Jones v. Bibb Brick Co., 120 Ga. 324, 48 S. E. 25. If the fact of service appears, but the return is irregular, it may be amended. As stated by Mr. Justice Lamar in his opinion in the case last cited, the decisions construing sections 1901 and 4710 of the Civil Code of 1895 may be reconciled by noting whether in the particular case the process was valid or void, whether the return was void or only defective, whether the issue was raised before or after judgment, and whether on the hearing the evidence or pleadings showed that the service was good or bad. In the case against the Reco Mining Company it does not appear that any point was raised upon the service before the judgment was rendered. If it should be conceded that the entry was not entirely regular in form, but would have been more perfect and exact if it had stated that the service was made on the defendant in the manner provided by the statute, it was not a void entry. There is a general presumption in favor of the judgments of courts of competent jurisdiction; and the record of the suit and judgment against the defendant should not have been rejected as a void proceeding, because of the form of the entry of service.

It was argued that, when the record was tendered in evidence and objection was made thereto, it was incumbent on the plaintiff to have the entry of service amended. If it might have been made more technically exact, it was not void, nor so imperfect as to authorize the rejection of the record from evidence because of it. If, in spite of the return, there was in fact no service, or if the agent was not one of such a character that service could be perfected upon him, after judgment this was matter which should have been set up in some direct attack upon the judgment, rather than by mere objection to the admission of the record in evidence. In Pennsylvania Casualty Co. v. Thompson, 123 Ga. 240, 51 S. E. 314, the entry of service was in these words: "I have this day served E. T. Moore, agent, personally with a copy of the within bill and proceeds." There was an entry of default made on the docket at the appearance term. At the trial term, and before the final judgment was rendered, the defendant appeared and moved to dismiss the case for want of service, which motion was overruled. On motion of the plaintiff the sheriff was then allowed to amend his entry of service as follows: "By permission of the court I hereby amend my entry of service, by saying that I served the defendant company, the Pennsylvania Casualty Company, of Scranton, Pa., by personally serving E. T. Moore, their agent, with a copy of the within writ and process, this April 1, 1904." The defendant then moved to open the default, offering to pay the court costs, and asking leave to demur and answer instant. This motion was refused. Exceptions pendente lite were taken to these rulings. The trial resulted in a verdict for the plaintiff. The defendant moved for a new trial, which was overruled, and it excepted. The opinion of Presiding Justice Fish concludes thus: "As the court erred in refusing to allow the defendant to demur and plead, it is unnecessary to pass upon the assignments of error made in the motion for a new trial." The entry of service there involved was more imperfect than that now under consideration by us. In that case it was not stated for whom Moore was the agent, nor was there anything in the entry to connect him with the defendant. The point was also made before final judgment.

It was argued that the rulings in cases of garnishments were practically controlling in regard to the entry of service here involved. But the two classes of cases are quite different. Section 4710 of the Civil Code of 1895 provides that "service of a summons of garnishment upon the agent in charge of the office or business of a corporation in the county or district at the time of service shall be sufficient." In this state the original summons of garnishment is served, not a copy of an original, which remains on file; nor is there any provision of law for keeping on file a copy of the summons thus served. West v. Harvey, 81 Ga. 711, 8 S. E. 449. The only evidence of record, showing to whom the summons is directed, is the entry of the officer. If his entry does not indicate service of a summons of garnishment directed to the corporation claimed to be garnished, there is nothing of record to show it. In Burnett & Goodwin v. Central of Ga. Ry. Co., 117 Ga. 521, 43 S. E. 864, 97 Am. St. Rep. 175, it was held that "an entry of service of a summons of garnishment, stating that the same was served 'personally on S. C. Hoge, agent in charge of the office of the Central of Ga. Ry. Company,' does not show a service upon the corporation, but only upon the person named as an individual; the words 'agent in charge of,' etc., serving merely to describe and identify the individual." As there was nothing to show to whom the summons of garnishment was directed, save the entry of service, it might be presumed that the summons followed the entry, and that it was directed, not to the company, but to the agent personally. An execution or process against a named person, with the added words "agent for" another, is a process against the person named, and not against the principal. If a summons of garnishment was issued against Hoge, although described as the agent in charge of the office of the Central of Georgia Railway Company, and was served upon him, although the entry of service may have contained a similar description, he, and not his principal, was the garnishee. In the opinion Mr. Justice Cobb said: "This rule should, if anything, be more strictly applied in cases of garnishments than in ordinary suits." This is true for the reasons above mentioned. But, while some of the expressions used in the opinion in that case might appear to have a broader application, they must be taken in connection with the case which was before the court. The ruling made in regard to garnishment proceedings of the character above indicated is not controlling in a case where there was a regular suit by petition, a single corporate defendant, a process directed to the sheriff and attached to the petition, requiring the defendant named to appear at the next term of the court, and an entry by the sheriff (whose duty it was to serve that writ on the defendant named in it) showing an effort to make service of it, and that he had served the defendant's agent personally with a copy of such writ.

3. In the brief of counsel for defendant in error it was suggested that the defendant Bond had sold the land to one Rogers, and had taken a mortgage for the balance of the purchase money, that Rogers had sold to the Reco Mining Company, and that Bond had acquired lawful possession. But the present action was a suit in ejectment in the common-law form. If Bond has a valid mortgage upon the property (as to which we express no opinion), it is only a lien, not a title. Civ. Code 1895, § 2723. A mortgagee in this state is not entitled to the possession of the mortgaged land by virtue of the mortgage.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur.

CLEMENTS v. LEDDEN.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. April 16, 1909.)

1. NEW TRIAL (§ 154*)—DISMISSAL OF MOTION—CLERICAL ERROR.

Where, during the term when a case was tried and a verdict therein rendered, a motion for new trial was made and a rule nisi granted, including an order allowing time for the preparation and presentation for approval of the brief of evidence, and where, in the light of the order itself, as well as of the other acts of the court and the surrounding facts, it was evident that by inadvertence the order stated that the "plaintiff" was allowed the time, instead of the "movant," who was the defendant in the case, this did not furnish sufficient ground to dismiss the motion for a new trial, the movant having in fact prepared a brief of evidence, which was agreed upon by counsel and approved by the court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see New Trial, Cent. Dig. § 313; Dec. Dig. § 154.*]

2. NEW TRIAL (§ 154*)—MOTION—DISMISSAL.

If a motion for a new trial was duly made in term time, and a rule nisi was issued calling upon the respondent to show cause why the motion should not be granted, it would not furnish ground for dismissing the motion if the order set it to be heard in vacation at an impossible date, naming a date which was already past; but the motion would stand for a hearing at the next term.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Calhoun County; W. N. Spence, Judge.

Action by E. Z. Ludden against J. W. Clements. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant brings error. Reversed.

At the December term, 1907, of the superior court of Calhoun county, the judge directed a verdict in favor of the plaintiff in the case of Mrs. E. Z. Ludden against J. W. Clements. On the 4th day of December, 1907, during the term at which the verdict was directed, the defendant filed his motion for a new trial. At the time the motion was presented to the judge, and before it was filed, the following order was entered thereon by him: "Read and considered. Let the plaintiff show cause before me at Bainbridge, Ga., in vacation, on the 1st Monday in February, 1907, why the motion should not be granted. The plaintiff is allowed until the hearing, whenever it may be, to prepare and present for approval a brief of the evidence in said case, this December 3, 1907." Counsel for respondent in motion for new trial also entered an acknowledgment of service in these words: "Due and legal service of the foregoing motion acknowledged. Copy and all other and further service waived, this December 4, 1907." On the first Monday in February, 1908, the motion was not heard; but the judge on that day, in vacation, passed another order as follows: "Motion for new trial filed by J. W. Clements in above-stated case having been set for a hearing at Bainbridge, Ga., before me on the first Monday in February, 1908; and, it appearing that the official stenographer has been unable to write out a report of the evidence, it is ordered that said motion be continued to be heard before me at Bainbridge, Ga., on the 10th day of February, 1908, in vacation; ordered, further, that the movant have until the hearing, whenever it may be, to prepare and present for approval a brief of the evidence in said case, and to amend the motion for a new trial. This February 3, 1908." At the time and place stated in the order last recited the motion for new trial came on to be heard, at which time counsel for respondent filed a motion to dismiss, as follows: "(1) Because the defendant failed to prepare and present to the court for approval a brief of the evidence within the time allowed by the rule nisi, nor has the court granted or signed any order allowing the defendant further time for same. (2) Because there does not appear in the rule nisi any authority or right to the defendant to prepare and present for approval a brief of the evidence, but same, which was drawn by defendant, makes it the duty of the plaintiff to prepare and present for approval a brief of the evidence, which is contrary to law; the plaintiff not being the movant. (3) Because movant's motion for new trial requires the plaintiff to show cause why a new trial should not be granted, setting the first Monday in February, 1907, which plaintiff could not do, as it was a matter of impossibility." Upon the motion to dismiss the judge passed the following order: "The within motion to dismiss read and considered. It appearing to the court that the facts set forth in the foregoing motion to dismiss are true and correct, it is therefore ordered that the motion to dismiss the motion for new trial be sustained, and the same is hereby ordered dismissed, this February 10, 1908." To this order the movant excepted. At the close of the assignments of error the bill of exceptions contains the following recital: "Said erroneous order and judgment was prejudicial to the said J. W. Clements, for that on the 10th day of February, 1908, he did appear in accordance with the terms of the order of February 3d, and then and there presented to the judge for approval a true and correct brief of the evidence, to which counsel had previously in writing agreed, and the judge did approve said brief and order the same filed as a part of the record; and the said Clements did also present to the judge an amendment to the motion for new trial, which amendment the judge allowed and approved, and ordered the same filed."

Pottle & Glessner, for plaintiff in error.
Smith & Miller, for defendant in error.

ATKINSON, J. A motion for a new trial, together with a brief of the evidence, must be filed during the term of the court when the verdict was found, unless further time for filing the brief should be allowed by order. But this may be done. The order granted on December 3, 1907, may be construed as composed of two parts: First, a rule nisi to show cause why the new trial should not be granted; and, second, an order allowing time to prepare and present for approval a brief of the evidence. As to the latter feature it was provided that the plaintiff was allowed until the hearing, whenever it might be, to prepare and present for approval a brief of the evidence in said case. One ground of the motion to dismiss the motion for new trial was based on the use of the word "plaintiff" in this part of the order, instead of the word "movant," and it was urged that there did not appear in the order any authority or right given to the defendant to prepare and present for approval a brief of the evidence, which was contrary to law. On the face of the order it is apparent that the presiding judge intended to set the case for a hearing and to allow time for the preparation of the brief of evidence. It may reasonably be inferred that he intended to allow such time to the party who would need it, and upon whom rested the duty of preparing the brief, and that the word "plaintiff," as there used, was inadvertently used instead of the word "movant." It is hardly probable that he intended to grant time to a party on whom there was no obligation to file a brief of evidence.

It is true that it is stated that the defendant prepared the order, but the judge adopted it and signed it; and it would be an unreasonable construction to hold that the inadvertent use of the word "plaintiff" for "movant" should destroy the right and privilege which was evidently intended to be conferred. This construction is rendered more certain by reference to the order which was passed on February 3, 1908. It recited that the official stenographer had been unable to write out a report of the evidence, and that the motion was continued to be heard on February 10, 1908, in vacation. It then proceeded: "Ordered, further, that the movant may have until the hearing, whenever it may be, to prepare and present for approval a brief of the evidence in said case, and to amend the motion for a new trial." In this action the judge recognized the fact that the preparation and presentation of a brief of the evidence was the duty of the movant, and that it was such movant to whom he intended to grant an extension of time for that purpose. If it should be held that in the original order he allowed time for the preparation and presentation of the brief of evidence, but erroneously placed the burden of doing so upon the wrong party, it may well be doubted whether even this would make the order void, or would simply make it erroneous. Considered, therefore, from any standpoint, the mere misuse of the word "plaintiff," instead of "movant," was not such a fatal defect as to authorize or require the dismissal of the motion for new trial. Such an order is to be reasonably construed. Gould v. Johnston, 123 Ga. 765, 769, 51 S. E. 608, and cases cited.

Taking up, then, that part of the order granted by the judge which constituted the rule nisi proper, or order to show cause why a new trial should not be granted, was the effect of it to authorize a dismissal of the motion on February 10, 1908? It was contended that this order, which was granted on December 3, 1907, required the plaintiff in the action (respondent in the motion) to show cause why a new trial should not be granted, setting the hearing for the first Monday in February, 1907, which was an impossible date, being already long past, and that therefore the motion should be dismissed. There are two ways in which this rule nisi can be viewed—one that the date set for the hearing, the "first Monday in February, 1907," was a mere inadvertence, when 1908 was intended. This was no doubt the fact. The order was granted on December 3, 1907. It is a matter of common knowledge how difficult it is at the close of one year and the beginning of the next to at once change the figure of the calendar, so as to write the new year instead of the old one. This order was granted during the term of court, and set the hearing "in vacation." The judge unquestionably did not intend to set it for hearing in a vacation which had been past for a year. Plainly it was meant to be during the vacation which would follow the then present term of the court, and would include the first Monday in February, 1908. If the rule nisi be construed as in fact returnable on such mentioned date, there would be no further difficulty in the case, because on that date further appropriate action was taken. But if we are constrained to treat the rule nisi as returnable on the first Monday in February, 1907, as the written order stands unchanged, then the effect would be that the presiding judge had granted a rule nisi, but had fixed an impossible date in vacation for the hearing. To authorize a hearing in vacation, but to set an impossible date therefor, would be equivalent to setting no date. In Eady v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co., 129 Ga. 363, 58 S. E. 895, where a motion for a new trial was duly filed during the term at which the verdict was rendered, and at that term the judge passed an order continuing the motion to an indefinite and unnamed day in vacation, but providing that if the motion was not previously heard in vacation it should stand on the docket to be heard during the next term of court, and no brief of evidence was filed with the motion, but in the order above referred to it was provided "that the movant have until the hearing, whenever it may be, to prepare and present the brief of evidence," and the brief of evidence was not filed until the next term after the order was passed, it was held that the court had jurisdiction at that term to approve the brief of evidence and to decide the motion on its merits. The result of fixing an impossible day in vacation for the hearing of a motion for a new trial would not be to cause its dismissal, but to cause it to stand until the next term of court, when it could be heard. If the order was not sufficient to authorize the judge to pass upon the motion, we do not see how it was any more sufficient to give him authority to dismiss it in vacation. If the error in fixing the date deprived him of jurisdiction to deal with the motion during the vacation, it equally deprived him of jurisdiction to dismiss it. See Miller v. Thigpen, 121 Ga. 475, 49 S. E. 286. At most, the rule nisi was irregular, not void; and irregularities in the form of such a rule have been held waivable. In fact, it has been held that, while a rule nisi ought to be granted, its absence may be waived, and will not wholly annul the proceedings had on the motion where such waiver has taken place. McIntire v. Tyson, 56 Ga. 468; Ga. R. Co. v. Usry, 82 Ga. 54, 8 S. E. 186, 14 Am. St. Rep. 140. If the presiding judge construed the order which was granted on December 3, 1907, as conferring no power upon him to act in vacation, he should not have proceeded further, but should have allowed the motion to stand until it could be dealt with at the next term of court. If he construed it as conferring authority upon him to act, he should not have dismissed it. See Arrington v. Cronin, 123 Ga. 870, 51 S. E. 708.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. April 14, 1909.)

1. ACTION (§ 50*)—MISJOINDER—PARTIES AND INTERESTS INVOLVED.

Where suit was brought against two railroad companies by an employé who had been discharged by one of them, in whose service he was at the time, and the petition showed no contract of employment with him binding both of them, and no such common action on their part as rendered both liable to him in relation to the subject-matter of the suit, and the matters charged against each were separate and independent, the petition was demurrable for misjoinder of parties and causes of action.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Action, Dec. Dig. § 50.*]

2. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 39*)—ACTION BY EMPLOYÉ—CONTRACT OF EMPLOYMENT—PETITION.

The petition alleged that in the railroad service promotion is a matter of merit, and an employé's rank, in point of seniority and dignity, determines the kind and lucrativeness of the employment and the beneficial preferences to which he may be entitled while in the service; that the plaintiff had been in the service of one railroad company for a considerable length of time, and had been promoted to the position of a passenger conductor; that he and other employées were transferred by that company to another railroad company, with an agreement between the two companies that such employées were to receive and maintain the identical rank with the second company, with the same rights, privileges, and benefits to which they were entitled in the former employment; that on the faith of this he acquiesced in the transfer; and that the second company, after retaining the plaintiff in its employment for a considerable length of time, discontinued him "in the position and service to which he had been accustomed, and to which he had been entitled as aforesaid." Held, that the petition set forth no such contract of employment between the plaintiff and either company, and no such breach of contract, as would authorize a recovery; and it was demurrable.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Chatham County; W. G. Charlton, Judge.

Action by C. L. Battle against the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company and the Southern Railway Company. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

C. L. Battle brought suit against the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company and the Southern Railway Company, alleging as follows: In the fall of 1899 the plaintiff entered the employment of the Savannah, Florida & Western Railway Company in the capacity of flagman and brakeman, running between Savannah and Jacksonville and Waycross and Gainesville. He continued in the employment of that company, and was promoted from time to time from the position of flagman and brakeman to that of extra freight conductor, freight conductor, and extra passenger conductor, and he continued in the employment of the company until it was purchased absorbed by, and consolidated with the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company, and thereafter remained in the employment of the latter company up to July 2, 1902, "and retained, while in the employment of said Coast Line Company, all the rights, privileges, and relative rank which he enjoyed while an employé of said Savannah, Florida & Western Railway Company." Promotion is a matter of merit, and an employé's rank in the service, in point of seniority and dignity, determines the kind and lucrativeness of employment and the beneficial preferences to which he may be entitled while in the service, and "in order to continue the beneficiary of the privileges and benefits inuring to an employé, by reason of his rank, that rank must be maintained at all times." On July 2, 1902, his rank with the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company was that of a passenger conductor, in which capacity he was entitled to a run on a passenger train south of Savannah, and to enjoy with that company due consideration for his employment with the Savannah, Florida & Western Railway Company. On the day mentioned he was transferred by the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company from its employment to the employment of the Southern Railway Company. This was done under an agreement and contract entered into between the Southern Railway Company and the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company and the plaintiff and other employées of the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company, which contract is evidenced by letters attached to the petition. Under the terms of that contract the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company was to transfer to the Southern Railway Company, and the latter was to receive, certain employées of the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company, among whom was plaintiff, which employées, when so transferred, were to have, receive, and maintain the identical rank, with the same rights, privileges, and benefits, to which they were entitled in their employment with the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company, and were to be employed by the Southern Railway Company in similar capacities to those occupied by them under the other company, and were in all respects to rank with the same degree of dignity and priority as though they had been employées of the Southern Railway Company for the same length of time and in the same capacity as regular employées of that company, "and were to receive the same consideration at the hands of the Southern Railway Company as their own employées." In the contract described the plaintiff was one of the parties, he was a party to the consideration, and the contract was entered into for his benefit and for the benefit of the defendant railway companies; and plaintiff had a legal and equitable interest in its performance, and it was in reliance upon such an agreement that he consented to be transferred from the employment of the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company to the employment of the Southern Railway Company, in the capacity of a passenger conductor. He was employed by the Southern Railway Company on July 2, 1902, and was given "the rights to which his rank and priority entitled him" until June 27, 1903, when, for no cause whatever, he was relieved from duty by the Southern Railway Company as a passenger conductor, and his run was given to employees of that company whose service with it was of longer duration than his had been, "but whose rights in the line of promotion, as determined by the agreement made with your petitioner at the time he entered the service of the Southern Railway, were of lower rank than petitioner's." After he was relieved from duty, he protested both to the Southern Railway Company and to the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company against the violation of said contract; and thereafter, on March 23, 1904, the Southern Railway Company reinstated him in his former capacity and in his regular run. After he was relieved from service, and before he was reinstated, he presented himself to the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company for reinstatement in their service, at the same rank and with the same degree of priority to which he would have been entitled, had he steadily remained in the employment of that company and had not permitted himself to be transferred to the Southern Railway Company, under the contract, agreement, and guaranty of the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company with plaintiff that his rights, in all respects, would be protected by the Southern Railway Company, the same as though he had continued in the employment of the other company; and the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company failed and refused to receive him back upon such terms. From March 23, 1904, the date of his reinstatement by the Southern Railway Company, to April 9, 1907, "he was given all his rights and privileges, in accordance with his rank and right of seniority, and his rights, during that period of time, were at all times recognized in accordance with the contract made on July 2, 1902"; but on April 9, 1907, the Southern Railway Company broke its contract and discontinued plaintiff "in the position and service to which he had been accustomed, and to which he was entitled as aforesaid." His services to the Southern Railway Company were at all times satisfactory, he discharged his duties faithfully and well, and no cause whatever exists, as far as efficiency and service are concerned, to authorize or warrant his discontinuance in the passenger service and in his regular run. Subsequently to April 9, 1907, he called upon the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company to carry out in good faith with him the contract and agreement under which he was transferred to the employment of the Southern Railway Company, and, to that end, to institute, in his behalf, a suit against the Southern Railway Company, calling upon it "to live up to this contract and agreement with the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company and your petitioner." This request was declined. Plaintiff's seniority and rank as a passenger conductor is a valuable asset to him, and is a means whereby he is enabled to earn a livelihood and the salary paid to passenger conductors on the run south of Savannah. The damage he has sustained consists in the loss of time from June 28, 1903, to March 23, 1904, at a salary of $100 per month, and lost time from April 9, 1907, to the commencement of the suit, at a salary of $100 per month, "and for such further lost time as he may incur in the future," and, "further, in the loss of his rank of seniority in the railway service, which said rank is a valuable asset to a railroad man, as upon it depends his salary, the nature of his work, and the desirability of the work assigned to him," and, still further, because his advanced years makes it difficult for him to start life anew in the railway service, as the opportunities are not open to a man of his years as to a younger man, and the salary which it would be possible for him to earn, starting anew, would be considerably less than that which he is now entitled to earn, by reason of his rank and seniority, and the work in starting anew would also be more arduous and hazardous, "all of which said items of damage were in the contemplation of the parties at the time said contract was made."

Plaintiff laid his damages at $1,000. Attached to the petition were copies of the three letters referred to in it as evidencing the contract. They are as follows:

"Savannah, Ga., July 20, 1903.

"Mr. C. L. Battle, Bartow, Ga. Classification of Employees—Plant System Employees Transferred to Southern Railway. Dear Sir: Replying to your letter of the 18th, beg to state that upon receipt of your first letter I wrote General Manager Ackert of the Southern Railway, explaining to him fully the conditions under which you and other Plant System employees were transferred to the Southern Railway; that is, that it was understood their rights would be protected. I have not yet heard from Mr. Ackert, but as soon as I do I will advise you. Very truly yours, [Signed] W. B. Denham, General Superintendent."

"Savannah, Ga., July 31, 1903.

"Mr. C. H. Ackert, General Manager Southern Railway, Washington, D. C. Classification of Employees—Plant System Employees Transferred to Southern Railway. Dear Sir: I have your favor of the 27th, in reply to mine of the 13th. I beg to hand you herewith copy of letter from your superintendent, Mr. Wells, regarding the rights of the men we turned over to your company on July 1, 1902. It was on my guaranty that they would always have their rights south of Savannah that they agreed to go to the Southern Railway, and you promised me yourself, in your car, in the presence of Mr. Dugan, that if you took these men in your service you would always see that their rights were maintained. Of course, the men feel that they have not been treated right, and I cannot help but agree with them. Yours very truly, [Signed] W. B. Denham, General Superintendent."

"Savannah, Ga., September 21, 1903.

"Mr. C. L. Battle, Bartow, Ga. Classification of Employes—Employes Transferred to Southern Railway. Dear Sir: Your letter of the 18th inst. received, and it certainly would afford me pleasure to do anything I could with Mr. Ackert, or the Southern Railway people, to have them carry out their agreement with me regarding the transfer of you men to the Southern; but you can readily understand that I have no authority to force Mr. Ackert to do this. He made the agreement with me in good faith, and I transferred you men to him with that understanding; but, if he fails to carry out the agreement, there is no way in the world that I can force him to do it. Now, as to allowing you to take your rights with the Atlantic Coast Line that you had previous to going with the Southern, this is a matter that will have to be decided by the men. Put yourself in the position of one of the Atlantic Coast Line conductors, and suppose that I was to place you back on the Atlantic Coast Line, where you were previous to going with the Southern; what would you think about it? You would say right away that I had no right to do it; that these men left the Atlantic Coast Line, and if they want to come back they should come back as new men. Now, I will say to you that if all of the men are willing that you should be transferred back to the Atlantic Coast Line, with the same rights that you had previous to going to the Southern Railway, I am perfectly willing for you to come back; but I do not think I have the authority to put you ahead of these men, and I have no doubt but that you will agree with us. Yours very truly, [Signed] W. B. Denham, General Superintendent."

Each of the defendants demurred to the petition generally and specially. Among the grounds of the demurrer of the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company were the following: (1) The petition does not show with sufficient fullness or certainty the terms of the contract alleged to have been made between the defendant railroad companies. (2) It does not sufficiently describe the employes who were the subjects of the contract, nor show what class of employes was the subject thereof. (3) It does not show the contract of employment between the plaintiff and the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company, in existence at the time of the transfer to the Southern Railway Company. (4) There is a misjoinder of parties and causes of action. The petition shows no community of interest between the defendants. It shows no joint contract between defendants and plaintiff. It shows no right to recover against the defendants jointly. The rights claimed by plaintiff are against the defendants individually and severally, and not jointly. Plaintiff seeks damages because of a failure of the Southern Railway Company to continue him in its employment, in which breach of duty, if any, the other defendant took no part and is not concerned. He seeks damages for the time he has been unemployed by the defendant, which damages, if any, were not caused by the Southern Railway Company. He seeks future damages because of the failure of the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company to employ him; and such damages, if any, the Southern Railway Company did not cause. The demurrer of the Southern Railway Company was substantially the same, except that the fourth ground stated that the plaintiff sought to recover damages for the time he had been unemployed by the Southern Railway Company, which were not caused by the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company, and for future damages because of the failure of the Southern Railway Company to employ him, which the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company did not cause.

The court sustained the demurrer and dismissed the action. The plaintiff excepted.

Oliver & Oliver, for plaintiff in error. Osborne & Lawrence, Garrard & Meldrim, and Shelby Myrick, for defendants in error.

LUMPKIN, J. (after stating the facts as above). The petition of the plaintiff was properly dismissed on demurrer, for two reasons: First. Because it sought to join separate and independent parties and causes of action, as to both of which there was a misjoinder. No breach of a common contract with or duty toward the plaintiff on the part of both defendants was shown. It was claimed that the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company had damaged the plaintiff in one way, and that the Southern Railway Company had damaged him in another, but not that there was any common violation of contract or duty by both of them jointly, causing damage to him. Second. No cause of action was set out against either defendant. While the petition made frequent references to the plaintiff's "rights" of priority in the line of promotion in his work, it failed to show that there was any such legal right, or exactly what it was, or how it arose. It showed no contract on the part of any of the companies mentioned, made with him, to employ him for any definite length of time, or not to discharge him except under certain specified circumstances, or that it would promote him in any particular manner. He was first in the employment of the Savannah, Florida & Western Railway Company, and it was alleged that, when that road was purchased by and absorbed and consolidated with the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company, he remained in the employment of the latter company, and retained "all the rights, privileges, and relative rank which he enjoyed while an employé of the said Savannah, Florida & Western Railway Company." But it was not shown that he had any contract with the first company which gave him any definite rights, privileges, or rank, or that he had any contract with the second company on that subject. So, also, it was alleged that, when he was transferred to the employment of the Southern Railway Company, he retained the same rights, privileges, and benefits to which he was entitled in his employment with the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company; but it was not alleged that there was any contract between either of the companies and him, by which he was employed for any definite time, or so as not to be subject to discharge or change in position. There were some general statements that in the railroad service promotion is a matter of merit, and that "an employé's rank in the service, in point of seniority and dignity, determines the kind and lucrativeness of employment and the beneficial preferences to which he may be entitled while in the service." But such general allegations can furnish no ground for a recovery of damages because of the discharge of the plaintiff. This is not a question of expediency, or even of ethical propriety, but of law; and the plaintiff's petition showed no infraction of any legal duty which authorized a recovery by him.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

LOUISVILLE & N. R. CO. et al. v. VENABLE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. April 19, 1909.)

1. CARRIERS (§ 158*)—INJURY TO FREIGHT—DAMAGES—LIMITING LIABILITY—NEGLIGENCE.

Under the evidence in this case it could not be held as matter of law that the shippers of the stone which was damaged were limited in their recovery to an amount stated in the bills of lading, if such damage resulted from negligence on the part of the carrier; and it being admitted on the trial that there was no issue in the case, as presented by the evidence, except the construction of the bills of lading introduced, there was no error in directing a verdict for the plaintiff for the amount admitted by the defendant to be due, if the court's construction of the bill of lading was correct. On the general subject, see Georgia So. & Fla. Ry. Co. v. Johnson, 121 Ga. 231, 48 S. E. 807; Central of Ga. Ry. Co. v. Hall, 124 Ga. 322, 52 S. E. 679, 4 L. R. A. (N. S.) 898, 110 Am. St. Rep. 170 (4), and cases cited.

(a) There was no exception or contention that the court should have submitted to the jury as a question of fact whether there was a bona fide effort to value the stone shipped and express such value in the bill of lading.

2. CARRIERS (§ 158*)—SHIPMENT OF FREIGHT—AMOUNT OF DAMAGES.

The more especially did the court not err "in not holding that the plaintiffs were limited in recovery of damages to the value of the stone as set out in the bills of lading received by the plaintiffs from the defendants," when the evidence showed that some of the bills of lading expressed a value of 20 cents per cubic foot, and others 40 cents per cubic foot, which the parol testimony stated was an erroneous entry, and should have been 20 cents, and some of them expressed no valuation at all.

1. MORTGAGES (§ 37*)—EQUITABLE MORTGAGE—ABSOLUTE DEED AS MORTGAGE—EVIDENCE.

A deed absolute on its face may be shown by parol evidence to have been intended to convey title only for the purpose of securing a debt, where the grantee has not taken possession of the property. Aakew v. Thompson, 129 Ga. 325, 58 S. E. 854.

2. MORTGAGES (§ 37*)—ABSOLUTE DEED AS MORTGAGE—EVIDENCE.

Where one brought a statutory complaint for land, and relied for a recovery upon title conveyed to him by the defendant by a deed claimed by the plaintiff to be absolute, and the defendant filed a defense, and offered testimony in support thereof, that the deed was given to secure a debt which had been fully paid before the action was brought, it was not error upon the trial to admit in evidence, over the plaintiff's objections, the following testimony of a witness for the defendant: "I asked Spencer [plaintiff] if he was not to make a deed back to Schuman's [defendant's] wife when the money was paid back. At first he laughed, and did not answer, and then said 'Yes.'" Such evidence was admissible as an admission by the plaintiff to illustrate the issue to be tried, and was not subject to the objection made thereto that it was irrelevant and incompetent, and there were no pleadings to authorize its admission.

3. TRIAL (§ 251*)—INSTRUCTIONS—APPLICABILITY TO CASE.

The record not disclosing that any of the pleadings in the case were verified, or otherwise

ADAMS v. PHILLIPS.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. April 17, 1909.)

EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 129*)—RECOVERY OF LAND—ACTION BY ADMINISTRATOR.

Where suit was brought by an administrator to recover certain land, and it appeared from the evidence introduced by the plaintiff that his intestate died in possession, and that afterwards a son of the decedent took possession with his family, and died while residing there, and that the widow of such son, who remained in possession after his death, was the defendant in the action, but there was no evidence that the administrator had ever been in possession, or that any order for sale of the land had been granted, or that there was any necessity for him to recover it in order to pay debts or distribute the estate of his intestate, a nonsuit was properly granted.

Error from Superior Court, Montgomery County; J. H. Martin, Judge.

Action by J. L. Adams, administrator, against Nancy Phillips. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

J. B. Gelger, for plaintiff in error. Graham & Graham and W. M. Lewis, for defendant in error.

ATKINSON, J. In an action of complaint for land the plaintiff, as administrator, was nonsuited. On the trial his evidence showed that the intestate died in possession of the land, and that the defendant was a widow of a deceased son of plaintiff's intestate, who survived the intestate. The evidence did not show whether the son died testate or intestate. At the time of the death of the son (defendant's husband), she was living with him on the property in dispute. It was not shown that the plaintiff, as administrator, had obtained an order to sell; nor was it otherwise shown that it was necessary for the administrator to have possession of the land in order to pay debts or make distribution among the heirs, nor was

It shown that the administrator had ever been in possession and had lost it.

The wife was an heir at law of her deceased husband. Civ. Code 1895, § 3355. There being no evidence that the husband left a will, it is presumed that he died intestate. Miller v. Speight, 61 Ga. 460; 14 Cyc. 20. As the defendant was heir to a son of plaintiff's intestate, she had an interest in the land, acquired under the laws of inheritance. That interest was not antagonistic to the title of the plaintiff's intestate, but was derived through it. In order to have recovered from the defendant's husband, it would have been incumbent on the plaintiff to show that he had an order to sell, properly granted, or that it was necessary for him to have possession for the purpose of distribution among the heirs, or for the purpose of paying debts, or that the land had been in his possession and without his consent was at the time of the trial held by the defendant. Dixon v. Rogers, 110 Ga. 509, 35 S. E. 781; Holt v. Anderson, 98 Ga. 220, 25 S. E. 496.

Civ. Code 1895, § 3358, provides: "The administrator may recover possession of any part of the estate from the heirs at law, or purchasers from them; but in order to recover lands, it is necessary for him to show upon the trial, either that the property sued for has been in his possession, and without his consent is now held by the defendant, or that it is necessary for him to have possession for the purpose of paying the debts or making a proper distribution. An order for sale or distribution, granted by the ordinary after notice to the defendant, shall be conclusive evidence of either fact." While this section in terms refers to the right of an administrator to recover possession of any part of the estate "from the heirs at law or purchasers from them," there is no reason why an heir of an heir should in this respect stand upon a different footing from an original heir or a purchaser from him. In either event the title is held derivatively from the estate which the administrator is seeking to administer, and the right of the administrator is only in a representative capacity. For the reasons indicated there was no error in granting a nonsuit.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

ROWE v. SPENCER.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. April 15, 1909.)

1. SALES (§ 145*)—BILL OF SALE—PLACE OF EXECUTION—PRESUMPTION.

In the absence of a recital in a bill of sale that it was executed elsewhere, the presumption is that the situs of its execution was the place named in the caption of the instrument.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sales, Dec. Dig. § 145.*]

2. EVIDENCE (§ 83*)—PRESUMPTIONS—OFFICIAL ACTS.

Unless it appears from the face of the paper that the officer before whom it was officially attested was without the territorial limits of his official jurisdiction in attesting the same, it will be presumed that he was acting within such jurisdiction.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 105; Dec. Dig. § 83.*]

3. SALES (§ 145*)—BILL OF SALE—PLACE OF EXECUTION.

Where a bill of sale is attested by a justice of the peace and notary public whose official signature does not disclose the county of his appointment, and the record of the bill of sale is attacked by evidence showing that the attesting official was not an officer of the county named in the caption of the bill of sale, it is competent to prove, in aid of the record, that the paper was actually executed in the county where the attesting officer held his commission.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sales, Dec. Dig. § 145.*]

4. SALES (§ 473*)—CONDITIONAL SALES—RIGHTS OF THIRD PERSONS—NOTICE.

The title of one who buys and pays for personal property held by his vendor under a conditional contract of sale, but which has never been recorded, and of which he has no notice, is unaffected by such conditional contract of sale; and this is true, although subsequently thereto he may have notice of the contract of conditional sale within the time the law gives for its record, where the bill of sale is not properly recorded within such time.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sales, Cent. Dig. §§ 1377-1390; Dec. Dig. § 473.*]

5. TRIAL (§ 296*)—HARMLESS ERROR—INSTRUCTIONS.

Where an erroneous principle of law is charged as to a material issue, the error is not rendered harmless by a subsequent statement of the correct principle, unless the judge expressly calls the attention of the jury to the incorrect statement and retracts it.

Error from Superior Court, Gwinnett County; Charles H. Brand, Judge.

Trover by E. A. Spencer against W. H. Rowe. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

F. F. Juhan, J. V. Pool, and J. A. Perry, for plaintiff in error. E. O. Dobbs and I. L. Oakes, for defendant in error.

EVANS, P. J. E. A. Spencer sold a pair of mules to C. W. Humphrey, reserving title in the purchase-money notes given therefor. These notes, with retention of title, were recorded in Gwinnett county within 30 days of their execution. The defendant, W. H. Rowe, purchased the mules from Humphrey before the record of the conditional sale. The original vendor brought an action of trover against Rowe to recover the mules or their value, which resulted in a verdict for the plaintiff. The court refused to set aside the verdict on motion for a new trial, and the defendant excepted.

1-3. The notes, with retention of title, were headed, "Flowery Branch, Ga., June 17, 1906," and purported to have been signed before "J. P. Neese, N. P. & J. P." The court allowed the attesting magistrate to testify that the paper was executed at Buford, in Gwinnett county, over objection that this evidence was incompetent, as contradicting the paper as to the place of its execution. Flowery Branch appearing by the recitals in the instrument to be in Georgia, the courts will take judicial cognizance of the fact that it is an incorporated town in Hall county. It appeared allunde that the attesting magistrate was a duly commissioned officer of Gwinnett county. In the absence of a recital in the bill of sale that it was executed elsewhere, the presumption is that the situs of its execution was the place named in the caption of the instrument. Doe ex dem. Truluck v. Peebles, 1 Ga. 3. The law will not impute malpractice in the officer by presuming that he would attest a paper beyond his territorial jurisdiction; and where there is nothing in the paper to indicate that the attesting magistrate is an officer of a county different from that stated in the caption, the clerk of the superior court would have the right to act upon the presumption as to the proper execution of the paper, and record the same. The rule is different where the attesting magistrate discloses in his official signature that he is acting beyond the scope of his jurisdiction.

In the case of Allgood v. State, 87 Ga. 668, 13 S. E. 569, the defendant was convicted of the crime of forgery. The instrument alleged to have been forged was a deed. It was headed, "Georgia, Carroll County," and purported to have been attested by A. J. Hansell and by J. H. Jones, a notary public of Fulton county, Ga. It was recorded in Carroll county. A certified copy of the record was offered in evidence, and this court ruled that it was incompetent, for the reason that the clerk of the superior court of Carroll county had no authority to record the deed in that county. The deed in that case appeared upon its face to have been attested by a notary public of Fulton county, who had no authority to witness a deed executed in Carroll county, where the deed was presumptively executed. The bill of sale in the present case was apparently properly executed; that is to say, it was prima facie executed at Flowery Branch, Ga., in Hall county, in the presence of a magistrate who, until the contrary was made to appear, is presumed to hold his appointment in Hall county. On the trial it appeared that the magistrate was actually an officer of Gwinnett, and that the paper was actually executed at Buford, in Gwinnett county. It was perfectly competent to prove these facts; for the presumption of the situs of the execution of the paper, and of the authority of the officer to witness it, are merely prima facie. But when a paper is prima facie entitled to record, and is recorded, and it is undertaken to overcome the presumption which the law indulges to establish its prima facie right to registration, it is competent, in aid of the record, to show that it was executed in the presence of an officer who had authority to attest the paper at the place of its actual execution, notwithstanding the situs of its execution may be at a place other than that stated in the caption of the instrument.

4. There was a sharp conflict in the evidence as to the domicile of Humphrey at the time of the execution, and also at the time of the record, of the conditional bill of sale. The defendant offered proof tending to show that he was a resident of Fulton county during this period, and the plaintiff submitted proof tending to show that he was a resident of Gwinnett county. It appeared from the evidence that after the purchase of the mules, but before the record of the conditional bill of sale, Humphrey's vendee had actual knowledge of the conditional bill of sale; but he did not have such knowledge at the time of the purchase. Exception is taken to the following charge: "If you believe from the evidence in this case that the plaintiff owned the mules sued for and sold them to Charlie Humphrey, and at the time he sold them and delivered them to Charlie Humphrey he took this conditional bill of sale sued on, by which he reserved the title to said mules until the balance of the purchase money was paid, and if you believe from the evidence that subsequent to that time, but within 30 days, Charlie Humphrey sold or traded the mules to the defendant in this case, and that the defendant had actual notice that the title to said mules was in the plaintiff within 30 days from the time plaintiff sold to Humphrey, and the defendant had this actual notice while he was in possession of the mules, the plaintiff in this case would be entitled to recover, although you may not believe that Charlie Humphrey was not a resident of Gwinnett county at the time, and the conditional sale was never properly recorded, and although you may further believe that defendant had such actual notice after he bought or traded for the mules, provided it was within 30 days from the time plaintiff sold the mules to Charlie Humphrey."

This charge was erroneous. A conditional sale, in order to affect innocent third parties, must be in writing, and recorded within 30 days from its date in the county of the residence of the maker. If not so recorded, purchasers of the property from the vendee, without notice of the retention of title by the vendor, will get a good title. If properly recorded within 30 days, one who purchases from the vendee before actual record buys subject to the rights of the original vendor of the property. It is only where such paper is properly recorded within 30 days from its execution that the constructive notice which arises from its record relates back to the time of its execution. The vice of the charge is the declaration that a bona fide purchaser of property incumbered by an unrecorded conditional bill of sale takes subject to the incumbrance if he subsequently has notice of it within the time allowed for record, although the incumbrance is not recorded within the statutory period for record. Singer Mfg. Co. v. Bradfield, 114 Ga. 303, 40 S. E. 271.

5. Counsel for defendant in error insists that this instruction, if erroneous, is cured by a subsequent charge that "if Rowe did not have actual notice when he bought, and Humphrey lived at the time in Fulton county, the plaintiff could not prevail." Where an erroneous rule is charged as to a material issue, the error is not rendered harmless by the subsequent statement, or even reiteration, of the correct rule, unless the judge expressly calls the attention of the jury to the incorrect statement and retracts it. Brush Electric Co. v. Wells, 103 Ga. 512, 30 S. E. 533; Augusta Ry. Co. v. Smith, 121 Ga. 32, 48 S. E. 681.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Wayne County; T. A. Parker, Judge.

Action by Walter Odum against Lula Odum for divorce. From an order granting a temporary alimony, plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

J. R. Thomas, for plaintiff in error. L. L. Thomas and Hines & Jordan, for defendant in error.

HOLDEN, J. The plaintiff filed his petition against his wife for a divorce, in Wayne superior court on the 6th day of February, 1908; and process was issued, requiring the defendant to appear at the March term, 1908. No service by the sheriff of this petition and process was made; but on the 16th day of May, 1908, on the back of the petition, the defendant, by her attorney at law, signed an acknowledgment of due and legal service of the petition and process, a waiver of a copy thereof and of all other and further service, and also a waiver of the jurisdiction of the court, and agreed that the succeeding term of Wayne superior court be made the trial term of the case. On the 19th day of May, 1908, the wife filed an answer to the petition, wherein, among other allegations, she averred that the acts of adultery charged against her in the petition were untrue. On the 22d day of August, 1908, the wife filed her petition for temporary alimony and counsel fees, and asked an injunction against the defendant disposing of any of his property. Service of this petition for temporary alimony was acknowledged by the husband, and upon the hearing thereof the court overruled the motion of the husband to dismiss the application on the ground that the wife alleged she was a resident of Tatnall county, Ga., and not a resident of Wayne county, where his suit for divorce was filed, which he alleged was a nullity. He contended that the suit for divorce filed by him was void, and that the proceedings for temporary alimony could not be maintained. This motion the court overruled, and, upon the hearing of the petition for temporary alimony, awarded alimony and attorney's fees to the wife.

The answer and the affidavit of the wife appear to have been made in Tatnall county, and she stated that she waived jurisdiction of Wayne superior court. This latter fact indicates she did not reside in Wayne county, where the husband's suit for divorce was filed. Counsel for both parties in this case seem to proceed on the idea that it is an undeniable fact that the wife resided in Tatnall county at the time of the institution in Wayne county of the suit for a divorce by her husband. If she resided in Tatnall county at the time the suit for divorce was filed, could she, under the facts of this case, maintain an application for temporary alimony? In Civ. Code 1895, § 4981, it is provided: "Appearance and pleading shall be a waiver of all irregularities of the process, or of the absence of process, and the service thereof." After the March term, to which the suit was brought, and before the trial term, the wife acknowledged service on the suit and filed an answer thereto. It is true that no service of the petition and process was made before the appearance term; but, when the defendant filed a plea to the merits, this was a waiver of service, and the case stood in the same position as if the defendant had been properly served. It is true that in a suit for divorce jurisdiction of the court cannot be waived, so as to permit a suit for divorce to be brought in a county other than that of the residence of the defendant. Code 1895, § 10; Watts v. Watts, 130 Ga. 683, 61 S. E. 593. It is also true that an application for temporary alimony will not lie unless there is a suit for divorce or for permanent alimony pending. Will the husband be permitted to say there was no suit for a divorce pending at the time of the application of the wife for temporary alimony?

While his application for divorce was on file, the wife had the right to file an answer thereto. If either party stated in their pleadings that the defendant was not a resident of the county in which suit was filed, the other party could controvert this allegation and thus make and have tried an issue on the question of jurisdiction. She could have appeared and filed a plea to the jurisdiction, and he could not say there was no suit pending against her until the court sustained the plea and dismissed the suit, or it was voluntarily dismissed by the husband. Pending an application by the husband for a divorce in a county wherein the wife did not reside when the application was filed, the court would have the right to award her counsel fees as a part of her temporary alimony for the purpose of contesting the issue on the question of jurisdiction, and have it properly tried and determined, and to award an amount for her support pending the final determination of such issue. The fact that the court had no jurisdiction might be the only ground on which a wife might desire to resist an application for divorce. She certainly would have the right to make the issue as to whether the court had jurisdiction as long as the husband kept his application for divorce on file; and she would have the right to apply for temporary alimony for her support and for counsel fees to pay her attorney for representing her in the litigation brought on by the application for divorce by her husband, even though the court had no jurisdiction to hear the application for divorce because brought in the county wherein the defendant did not reside. When the husband files an application for divorce in a county wherein the wife does not reside, as long as such application is pending she has the right to apply for temporary alimony and attorney's fees, whether any question of jurisdiction is or is not made by either party. If the husband files an application for divorce in a county having no jurisdiction to grant him a divorce, or on grounds on their face insufficient to authorize a divorce, the fact that the wife does not plead the want of jurisdiction in the court, or the insufficiency of the grounds alleged, would not defeat her right to apply for temporary alimony and counsel fees as long as the application for divorce was on file in the court. The court committed no error in not dismissing the application for temporary alimony.

2. Under the evidence submitted at the hearing, the court did not abuse its discretion in holding that the wife was entitled to alimony and attorney's fees, nor in awarding to her the amount specified in its order.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

STEWART & CO. v. EXUM.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. April 15, 1909.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 6*)—EVIDENCE OF EMPLOYMENT—SIMILAR CONTRACTS WITH OTHERS.

In an action for a breach of contract of employment, where one of the defendants had testified directly that the contract with the plaintiff was in writing, contained in a letter written and mailed to the plaintiff, but which the latter denied receiving, contending that the contract was in parol, it was immaterial whether the witness had made contracts with others for similar services by parol, or not; and there was no error in excluding a statement that he had never made a contract with any man to buy cotton for him, except in writing.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Dec. Dig. § 6.*]

2. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 6*)—WRONGFUL DISCHARGE—ACTIONS—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

Where an employer consented for his employé to perform some small work for another during the continuance of the employment, it was not competent for him to testify that this consent was based on his idea of what were the terms of his contract with his employé; such idea or basis of consent not being communicated to the employé, or known to him.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Dec. Dig. § 6.*]

3. MASTER AND SERVANT (§§ 21, 44*)—RIGHT TO TERMINATE CONTRACT—SATISFACTION OF EMPLOYEE—ACTIONS—INSTRUCTIONS.

If the contract of employment included a provision that the service should continue only so long as it was satisfactory to the employer, the latter might terminate the employment upon becoming dissatisfied.

(a) Where, in a suit by a discharged employé to recover for such discharge as being unlawful during a certain period fixed by the contract, the employer pleaded and introduced evidence to show that it was agreed that the continuance of the employment should be dependent upon the satisfaction of the employer, it was error to practically exclude such issue from the jury, and to instruct them, in effect, that the employer could not legally discharge the employé before the expiration of his term of employment, except for good and sufficient cause, "and the jury are the exclusive judges of what is a good and sufficient cause, basing their judgment upon the evidence in the case," and also that the employer would be justified in discharging the employé for "such incompetent and inefficient services or misconduct of the plaintiff as would justify them in so doing."

4. MOTION FOR NEW TRIAL—GROUNDS.

In the light of the note appended by the judge to some of the grounds of the motion for a new trial, and of the writing off from the recovery of certain items thereof, the other grounds of the motion not herein specifically mentioned do not present any error requiring a reversal.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Chatham County; George T. Cann, Judge.

Action by J. B. Exum against Stewart & Co. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants bring error. Reversed.

E. S. Elliott, for plaintiffs in error. Alexander & Edwards, for defendant in error.

LUMPKIN, J. J. B. Exum brought suit against Stewart & Co., alleging that the defendants had employed him on or about August 25, 1905, to act as a cotton buyer for them, with his headquarters at the town of Lyons; that his employment was to continue for four months, and his compensation was to be a salary of $50 per month and a commission of 15 cents per bale upon each bale purchased; that he faithfully performed his duties until on or about the 6th of October, when the defendants ceased to use his services and without legal justification abandoned their contract. The defendants admitted that they had employed the plaintiff, but denied the terms of the employment as stated by him. They alleged that they negotiated with him orally in regard to the employment, but that the contract was reduced to writing; that he was not to receive a salary, but 15 cents per bale as commission on each bale of cotton purchased by him; that the continuance of the employment was to be only as long as the services of the plaintiff were satisfactory to the defendants, and not for four months. They denied that he faithfully performed his duties but alleged that he was ignorant, inefficient, and incompetent; that his work was full of errors costly to them; that on October 11th, they discontinued the employment under the terms of the contract, because his services were not satisfactory, and also because he failed to reimburse them for the amount lost by them on account of his errors in the transaction of their business. They sought to recoup such alleged losses. The evidence was conflicting. The jury found for the plaintiff $207.27. The defendants moved for a new trial, which was refused upon the writing off of certain items by the plaintiff, and the defendants excepted.

1. The court refused to allow one of the defendants to testify that "I have never made a contract with any man to buy cotton for me, except in writing." This was complained of as error. The witness had testified positively that this particular contract was in writing, and other evidence had been introduced on that subject. It was immaterial for him to state what contracts he had made with others. Sometimes it is competent to show that a particular thing was done, by showing that the person claiming to have done it always so acted under certain circumstances; as, for instance, if one should testify that he wrote a letter, stamped it, and gave it to his clerk to mail, although the clerk might not remember the particular letter, he might testify that he mailed every letter which was given to him by his employer. Proof of custom or practice may sometimes be admissible to throw light on questions of detail or particular acts falling within the custom; but, under the testimony in this case, there was no error in rejecting the evidence offered, and doing so will not require a new trial.

2. During the time involved in the controversy the defendants consented for the plaintiffs to perform some other work, taking a small part of his time. One of them offered to testify that this consent was based on the construction placed on the contract by the defendants, namely, that the defendants had no objection to the plaintiff's going into other business if they were paying him 15 cents per bale for cotton as commission; but they would have objected if they were paying him $50 per month and also 15 cents per bale. This was properly excluded. There was no evidence that such a construction of the contract was stated to the plaintiff as the basis of the consent given by the defendants. Their reasons, not communicated to the plaintiff or known by him, were inadmissible.

3. The judge charged the jury as follows: "An employer is not legally justified in discharging an employé before the expiration of his term of employment, except for good and sufficient cause, and the jury are the exclusive judges of what is a good and sufficient cause, basing their judgment upon the evidence in the case, and they are to judge of the value and weight of the evidence." He nowhere in his charge submitted to the jury the contention of the defendants that they had the right to terminate the contract of employment when the services of the plaintiff were not satisfactory to them. The defendants made this a distinct issue in their pleadings, and introduced evidence tending to sustain the allegation. If this right formed a part of the contract between the plaintiff and the defendants, they could terminate the employment of the plaintiff when his services become unsatisfactory to them; and they would not be liable for so doing. MacKenzie v. Minis (Ga.) 63 S. E. 900.

It is not held that the defendants could receive the plaintiff's services for a time, terminate the further employment on the ground of a dissatisfaction, and refuse to pay anything for his services while they were accepted and received. That is not claimed in this case. Here, as in the case of Mackenzie v. Minis, supra, the question was as to the right of the employers to discharge the employé, or terminate the employment, when the services rendered were unsatisfactory to them. The defendants were entitled to have their contention on that subject submitted to the jury. The charge of the court practically excluded it, and left the jury to determine what was a good and sufficient cause for discharge, or, at most, to restrict the ground on which the contract could legally be terminated by the defendants, before the expiration of four months, to "such incompetent or inefficient services or misconduct of the plaintiff as would justify them in so doing."

4. There were other grounds of the motion for a new trial; but, when considered in connection with a note of the presiding judge to the motion for a new trial and the requirement that the plaintiff should write off certain items of the recovery, they do not require a reversal.

As the case will be remanded for another trial, we do not discuss the evidence.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur.

WALDREP v. TOWN OF CANON et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. April 16, 1909.)
APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 854*)—WRONG REASON FOR CORRECT JUDGMENT.

The recital in an order granting an injunction pendente lite that the judge is influenced to grant the writ for specified reasons affords no ground to the prevailing party to except to the judgment because the court should have assigned other matters alleged in the petition as being sufficient to justify the interlocutory order.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Franklin County; C. H. Brand, Judge.

Action by Kate Waldrep against the Town of Canon and others. From a judgment in her favor, plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

James K. Skelton and A. S. Skelton, for plaintiff in error. Claude Bond and J. B. Jones, for defendants in error.

EVANS, P. J. The plaintiff in error filed her petition to enjoin the town of Canon and its officers from enforcing an execution issued by the mayor of the town against her by a levy upon her property. The validity of the execution was attacked on several grounds, and on the interlocutory hearing the court granted an injunction pendente lite and in his order stated that in his opinion the injunction should issue so as to preserve the status until a final trial should settle the disputed issues of fact. The plaintiff excepts to the grant of the injunction, upon the ground that the court should have enjoined the defendants because the execution was invalid as matter of law.

The plaintiff prayed a pendente lite injunction. The court granted the writ. She is not concluded, by the judge's recital of his reasons for granting the interlocutory injunction, from insisting at the final trial upon all the attacks made in her petition respecting the invalidity of the execution. The judgment at the interlocutory hearing was a mere exercise of discretion, and not a final and conclusive adjudication of the whole law of the case. Crovatt v. Baker, 130 Ga. 507, 61 S. E. 127. The plaintiff, therefore, is not entitled to a reversal or modification of a judgment in her favor, whether or not the court might have rested his judgment upon the other grounds alleged in the petition as sufficient to justify the grant of an injunction until the final hearing.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

MORRIS v. ROUNSAVILLE BROS.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. April 17, 1909.)

TELEGRAPHS AND TELEPHONES (§ 15*) —
BREAKING OF POLE—LIABILITY TO PERSON CLIMBING.

Where one erects alongside a public road telephone poles on which telephone wires are placed, and a person climbs one of such poles by permission of the owner to remove the wire for the purpose of removing a building for another across such road, and the pole, because of its "rotten condition," breaks and injures such person, the owner of such poles is not liable in damages to the injured party because the poles were erected along the roadside "without authority or right, and contrary to law," and such pole was knowingly allowed to stand in a "rotten condition." The acts of alleged negligence were not acts of negligence relative to the party injured while climbing the pole for the purposes stated.

Error from Superior Court, Floyd County; Moses Wright, Judge.

Action by Mid Morris, by next friend, against Rounsaville Bros. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Geo. A. H. Harris & Son, for plaintiff in error. J. Branham and Jno. W. & G. E. Maddox, for defendant in error.

HOLDEN, J. Mid Morris, by his next friend, brought complaint against Rounsaville Bros. to recover damages on account of personal injuries received; his petition, as amended, making substantially the following allegations: The defendants are the owners of a private telephone line, the poles of which are placed alongside the public road. The plaintiff was engaged in moving a house for the Rome Tannery across this public road, and it was necessary to remove the telephone wire. The plaintiff placed a ladder against one of the telephone poles, and when he had climbed to the top round of the ladder, about 20 feet from the ground, the pole broke and fell with the plaintiff to the ground, causing him serious injury. The pole was rotten and in an unsafe condition under the ground, and up to about two inches above the ground. The plaintiff filed an amendment, which, properly construed, alleged that defendants gave him permission to climb the pole. The petition was dismissed upon demurrer, and the plaintiff excepted.

The amendment offered, stating that the defendants gave the plaintiff permission to climb the pole, simply had the effect of showing that the plaintiff was a licensee, if it can be said that he was acting within the privilege given him to climb the pole when he placed a ladder at an angle against the pole and climbed the ladder for the purpose of removing the wire. There is no allegation that the defendant made any statement to the plaintiff about the condition of the pole, or failed to warn him of its condition, or that it was unsafe to climb the pole, or place the ladder against it and climb the ladder, if there was any legal duty to thus warn him. Plaintiff does not allege that defendants are liable, or that a recovery is sought, because defendants failed to thus warn him. The only acts of negligence alleged against the defendants, on which a right of recovery was predicated, are as follows: "Petitioner shows to the court that the defendants had no right to erect the poles alongside the roadside, and to do so was an act of trespass, and an act of negligence per se; that it was negligent on the part of the defendants to allow said pole to stand alongside the roadside in the rotten condition that it was in. Petitioner shows to the court that the defendants knew of the rotten condition of said pole, and that it was negligence on their part to keep said pole in use. * * * Petitioner shows that the road alongside which said pole was erected is a public road, the property of Floyd county, and is worked, repaired, and maintained by said county for the benefit of its citizens, to be used as a highway of travel; and for said pole to be allowed to remain in use alongside of said road as alleged was a menace to the safety of its citizens, and was, therefore, an act of negligence upon the part of defendants to keep the same in use."

If it was an act of negligence on the part of the defendants to erect the poles alongside the roadside without authority, or knowingly to allow the pole to stand along the roadside in a rotten condition with reference to persons using the road as a highway for purposes of travel, these were not acts of negligence with reference to one climbing the pole for the purpose of removing the wire solely for his own benefit. There was no duty on the defendants to keep their poles in safe condition for persons to climb in order to remove the wires thereon, so as to move a house across the highway. If the erection of poles along the highway was without authority, this fact would not give a right of action to one injured while climbing the pole for the purposes stated. In order for acts to constitute negligence towards any particular person, there must be a breach of duty owing to such person at the particular time and under the particular circumstances; and to give a right of action for injuries resulting from such breach of duty, such negligence must be the proximate cause of the injuries. As stated in Georgia & Ala. Ry. Co. v. Cook, 114 Ga. 760, 762, 40 S. E. 718, 719: "Negligence relatively to one to whom no duty is due with respect to the matter in question does not give him a right of action." The only acts of alleged negligence averred by the plaintiff on which he seeks a recovery being acts of negligence (if acts of negligence with respect to any one) with reference to persons using the highway for purposes for which it might lawfully be used, and the plaintiff not having been injured while using the highway for such purposes, but while using the pole for the purpose of removing the telephone wire in order to remove a building across the road, the court properly sustained a general demurrer and dismissed the petition.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

1. TRIAL (§ 251*)—INSTRUCTIONS—CONFORMITY TO ISSUES.

The evidence authorizing a charge upon the subject of contributory negligence and apportionment of damages, it was not error for the court to charge thereon; and such charge is not subject to the complaint that "no charge should have been given on the subject of a diminished recovery, the plaintiff contending for full damages and claiming to have been free from fault." Tucker v. 2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1064)—REMARKS OF COURT—HARMLESS ERROR.

The reference made by the court in his charge to one of the contentions of the defendant as the "real contention," while an inapt expression, was not, in the light of the whole charge and the facts of the case, of such harm-

Error from Superior Court, Lowndes County; R. G. Mitchell, Judge.

Action by Hansell W. Compton and others against J. Floyd Fender. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs bring error. Affirmed.

Hansell W. Compton and others brought their action against J. Floyd Fender, praying an injunction to prevent the cutting of timber, and also to recover damages. The plaintiffs introduced a plat and grant from the state to Charles W. Compton, and then offered the answers of Hansell W. Compton to interrogatories. He testified that he lived in Atlanta, and was the son of Charles W. Compton, who died in 1884; that the mother of the witness and his sister survived their father; that his father died without leaving a will; and that he had charge of the interests of his mother and sister in the lot of land involved in the suit. He was asked if there had been any administration on the estate of his deceased father, and answered that there had been none. Objection was made to this latter question and answer, on the ground that it did not appear that the witness was the ordinary of the county in which Compton resided at the time of his death, or that he had examined the records in the office of the ordinary. The objection was sustained. There being no other evidence to establish the absence of administration, a nonsuit was granted, and the plaintiffs excepted.

Error from Superior Court, Hall County; J. J. Kimsey, Judge.

Action by H. T. Martin and others against W. M. Dyer and others, Commissioners of Roads and Revenues of Hall County, to restrain the sale of a tract of land used for the care of the county's poor. An injunction pendente lite was granted, and the commissioners bring error. Reversed.

W. A. Charters, F. M. Johnson, J. G. Collins, W. B. Sloan, and H. H. Dean, for plaintiffs in error. H. H. Perry, for defendants in error.

EVANS, P. J. The county of Hall owns a tract of land which is devoted to the care of the county's poor, and the commissioners of roads and revenues of that county passed an order for the sale of this property at public outcry, after publication of the notice of sale in the newspapers of Gainesville. Pending the publication of the notice three citizens and taxpayers of the county filed their petition praying that the sale be enjoined. The court granted a pendente lite injunction, to which exception is taken.

1. One reason assigned by the petitioners to stop the sale of the pauper farm is that the commissioners of roads and revenues of Hall county have no authority to pass such an order. The act creating the commissioners of roads and revenues of Hall county (Acts 1886, p. 265) confers upon them exclusive jurisdiction in governing and controlling all county property as they may deem best according to law, of levying county taxes, and in managing other county affairs specifically designated in the act. The sections of the Political Code of 1895 relating to the sale of real property owned by the county are as follows:

"Sec. 278. Unserviceable Property Sold.—When any public property shall become unserviceable, it may be sold or otherwise disposed of, by order of the proper authority, and an entry of the same shall be made in said book, and the money received therefrom shall be paid into the treasury.

"Sec. 279. 'Proper Authority.'—The 'proper authority' referred to in this chapter is the Governor of the state, for all officers of the state, and the county commissioners, or other officers having charge of county matters, for all officers of the county."

"Sec. 348. County Property, How Controlled.—The ordinary has the control of all property belonging to the county, and may, by order to be entered on their minutes, direct the disposal of any real property which can lawfully be disposed of, and appoint a commission to make titles thereto, and the conveyance of such commission in accordance with such order vests the grantee or vendee with the title of the county."

The power conferred upon the ordinary by Pol. Code 1895, § 348, to control all property belonging to the county, and to direct the disposal of any real property which can lawfully be disposed of, does not vest in that official exclusive power of sale of the county's property. The constitutional scheme of county government is that the powers in relation to roads, public buildings, taxes, and other county matters are to be exercised by the ordinary, except where the General Assembly confers such powers upon county commissioners of a particular county. Civ. Code 1895, §§ 5853, 5879, 5930. When the administration of county affairs in a particular county is lodged with commissioners, the power over county matters usually exercised by the ordinary devolves upon them, and they may discharge such functions with reference to county matters as are conferred on them by the act of their creation, which theretofore have been performed by the ordinary. Town of Decatur v. DeKalb County, 130 Ga. 483, 61 S. E. 23. It follows that under the act of 1886, creating commissioners for Hall county, the power to dispose of the real property belonging to that county is vested in the commissioners of roads and revenues.

2, 3. The complaining taxpayers further contend, even if the commissioners of roads and revenues had authority to dispose of the property of the county, that their power to sell is only where the property has become unserviceable, and that in determining that the property had become unserviceable they had abused their discretion. Petitioners in their sworn petition, which was used as evidence on the hearing, alleged that the pauper farm consists of about 315 acres of land, the larger portion of which is in a high state of cultivation; that the buildings thereon are in a good condition; that the ownership of the farm by the county is necessary for the purposes and requirements of the county; that the county has no other place or farm suitable for the accommodation and keeping of its paupers; that the farm is necessary to the county for the raising of supplies for the convicts of the county, of which the county has a large number at work on the roads, and for the support of its paupers; that it is located at the center of the county, and at the most convenient and accessible point, and has not become in any way unserviceable. At the hearing they supported their contentions by an affidavit, signed by several citizens, to the effect that the property is in every way well located and arranged for the purpose for which it is used, and is not unserviceable in any sense, but, on the contrary, is necessary for the comfortable caring for the county paupers, and that the property is well adapted for the use of a stockade for keeping the county convicts, and it would be injurious to the interests of the county, and unwise, to sell the property.

The county commissioners, in their answer, which was used as evidence on the hearing, averred that about two years before the passing of the order of sale there had been a popular meeting of the citizens of the county, at which resolutions were adopted requesting that the county pauper farm be moved to some other more suitable and convenient site, where they could be cared for and kept at less expense; that thereupon the commissioners investigated the matter of the suitability of the present farm for the use of caring for its poor; that it appears from the records in their office that the cost of maintenance for several years past has been between $1,500 and $2,000 in excess of the revenue derived from the farm, and about a year before the bringing of this petition they had purchased a tract of land containing 100 acres, which they proposed to devote to caring for the county paupers; that the two farms are several miles apart, and cannot be used together; that upon the present pauper farm are several cottages that are expensive to keep up, which will soon have to be recovered and repainted; that the wood upon the present farm is about exhausted, and the arrangement of the houses is such as to render it expensive to look after the paupers; that there are now 20 paupers upon the farm; that the farm can be sold for between $9,000 and $10,000, and the necessary improvements can be erected upon the 100-acre tract at from $3,000 to $4,000; that the 100-acre tract is well watered, and has a large supply of wood and timber thereon, and is a much more suitable and convenient place to keep the county's poor than the present pauper farm; and that in the erection of the buildings which they propose to build on the 100-acre tract the expense of maintenance will be considerably reduced.

The defendants also introduced an affidavit of four citizens that in their opinion it would be to the advantage of the county and the taxpayers to sell the pauper farm, and to build one large building on the property owned by the county for the purpose of caring for the inmates of the present county farm, and that it would be much less expensive to the county to maintain the inmates in one large central building than to incur the expense of keeping in repair the numerous buildings now on the county farm. Defendants also introduced a certified copy of the following order:

"It appearing to the board that the county of Hall owns a suitable place for county home other than the one now occupied for said purpose, and it further appearing that the present home can be sold for a good price, it is ordered that the present home and farm be sold to the highest bidder for cash, before the courthouse door in the city of Gainesville, Georgia, on Tuesday, October 27, 1908, at 11 o'clock. It is further ordered that a notice of said sale be published in the city papers. Order granted this 12th day of October, 1908. [Signed] W. M. Dyer, I. F. Duncan, J. D. Welch, Commissioners of Roads and Revenues of Hall County."

Before the commissioners can lawfully proceed with the sale of the real estate of the county it must appear that the same has become "unservicable." This word, as used in Pol. Code 1895, § 278, does not mean that the property proposed to be sold is practically without value, but that it cannot be used advantageously by the county. Regenstein v. Atlanta, 98 Ga. 167, 25 S. E. 428. Among the definitions of the word "servicable," given in Webster's International Dictionary, are "beneficial; advantageous." A county may own two tracts of land suitable or beneficial for the same purpose, and yet may not be able to devote both properties to beneficial use. One tract may be sufficient to answer the county's needs, and the other would not be needful or servicable to the county. In such a case it would be the part of wisdom for the county commissioners, charged with the administration of the county affairs, to investigate and determine which tract of land was not needed, or was unservicable to the county. Under the Code section above cited it would be within the power of the proper officials of the county to order the sale of the least desirable piece of the property, considering the uses for which it was intended to be put. In the present case it appears that the county owns two tracts of land, upon one of which the county poor are maintained. So far as the record discloses, the other tract is not put to any county use. In the administration of the county affairs the commissioners have determined that one of these tracts is unservicable, and that it is to the best interests of the county, a saving to the taxpayers, and a convenience to the paupers who partake of the county's liberality, that the home for the paupers be located on the 100-acre tract, and the larger tract be sold. This was clearly within the discretionary powers of these administrative officers; and, unless their discretion has been abused, the courts have no revisory power. As was said in Commissioners v. Porter Mfg. Co., 103 Ga. 617, 30 S. E. 549: "The discretion vested in the county authorities must be, from the nature of the case, a broad one, and therefore the reviewing power of the judge of the superior court must be exercised with caution, and no interference had unless it is clear and manifest that the county authorities are abusing the discretion vested in them by law." See, also, Anderson v. Newton, 123 Ga. 512, 51 S. E. 508; Gaines v. Dyer, 128 Ga. 590, 58 S. E. 175.

When the commissioners ordered the sale of the pauper farm, they exercised an administrative act; and the courts have no authority to inquire into the expediency of their action, unless it is made to appear that they either exceeded their powers under the law, or in the exercise of that power there was a manifest abuse of discretion. When their action, within the scope of the powers conferred on them by law, is sought to be restrained by a complaining taxpayer, the question is, not whether the court or other taxpayers may have honestly differed with the commissioners as to the wisdom of their course, but whether that course of action is so palpably against the best interests of the county as to amount to an abuse of their discretion. We are aware that a judge of the superior court, in passing upon an application for interlocutory injunction, is also invested with a discretion; and this court has repeatedly held that his discretion upon the facts will not be disturbed, unless it is abused. But it must also be borne in mind that a court of equity will not interfere with the administrative action of the governing officials of a county, within the scope of the powers delegated to them by the law, unless the act complained of is arbitrary and amounts to an abuse of discretion. An examination of the evidence presented to the judge of the superior court shows that there is a difference of opinion among the citizens of the county as to whether the pauper farm should be retained at its present location, or established upon the 100-acre tract. Looking at the reasons advanced for the different conclusions in a calm and dispassionate way, we can see how the commissioners might incline to one or the other proposition. They were called upon under the circumstances to act, and we can see nothing in the evidence submitted to the chancellor which would justify him in holding that they were guilty of an abuse of discretion.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur.

Error from Superior Court, Pike County; E. J. Ragan, Judge.

Application by James M. Smith and others for writ of quo warranto, against C. J. Lester. From a judgment dismissing the application, relators bring error. Affirmed.

A. A. Murphy and Rollin H. Kimball, for plaintiffs in error. O. H. B. Bloodworth and J. F. Redding, for defendant in error.

HOLDEN, J. James M. Smith and others, relators, made application to the judge of the superior court of Pike county for leave to file an information in the nature of a quo warranto in order that they might inquire into the right of the respondent to hold the office of judge of the city court of Barnesville. The information, which was ordered filed, contained the following material allegations: Prior to the filing of the information the respondent was commissioned as judge of the city court of Barnesville and has since been acting as such judge. Prior to the filing of the application he was elected city attorney of Barnesville by the mayor and council of that municipality, which position he accepted, and has since been exercising the duties thereof. The office of judge of the city court of Barnesville was vacated by respondent when he accepted the office of city attorney. Respondent is paid a regular salary as city attorney, and is required to represent the city in all litigation. Copies of ordinances of the mayor and council were attached to the application, wherein the appointment and duties of respondent as city attorney are shown, and also the fact that he received a monthly salary as such. Relators prayed that respondent show cause why he should not be ousted from the office of judge of the city court and such office be declared vacant. The respondent demurred to the application, on the ground that there was no cause of action set forth in the same, and that it showed on its face that the relators were not entitled to maintain said cause, or to the relief sought therein. To an order sustaining the demurrer, and dismissing the application, the relators excepted.

The relators contend that the office of judge of the city court of Barnesville was vacated by the respondent when he accepted the office of city attorney of Barnesville, for the reason that the duties of the two offices are incompatible in fact, as well as rendered incompatible by the provisions of Civ. Code 1895, § 4284. That section is as follows: "It shall be illegal for the judge of any city court in this state to also hold any municipal office or appointment in the city where such court is held." If this section has application to city courts of the character of that existing in the city of Barnesville, and if the position of city attorney of Barnesville is an appointment of the kind referred to in the section above quoted, did the acceptance of such appointment by the respondent vacate, or render subject to vacation, the other of-office which the respondent held as judge of the city court of Barnesville? In Throop on Public Officers, § 30, it is said: "At common law there is no limit to the number of offices which may be held simultaneously by the same person, provided that neither of them is incompatible with any other. * * * If two offices are incompatible, by the acceptance of the latter the first is relinquished or vacant, even though it should be a superior office."

While this is the common-law rule, we do not think it has any application in this case, in the presence of the Code section above quoted. Under the provisions of this section it is made illegal for the judge of any city court to also hold any municipal office or appointment in the city where any such court is held. The meaning of this section is that, after a person becomes judge of the city court, he cannot, while holding such office, legally accept or hold any municipal office or appointment therein referred to. The effect of making it illegal for the person holding the office of judge to accept and hold such municipal office or appointment is to make him ineligible for such office or appointment while holding the office of judge. The provisions of this section are not the same as providing that one person shall not at the same time hold the office of judge and a municipal appointment; but these provisions mean that, after a person becomes judge of a city court, it shall be illegal for him, while holding such office, to accept or hold any municipal office or appointment referred to in the section. The common-law rule was that a person could not hold two incompatible offices, and, while holding one, the acceptance of another was an implied resignation of the former. In such cases the person has the right to resign the office which he holds, and has the right to accept the other office; but in this case, under Civ. Code 1895, § 4284, the judge of the city court has no right to accept a municipal office or appointment in the city where such court is held, and his pretended acceptance and holding of such municipal office or appointment is illegal and without authority of law.

Having no right to accept and hold such municipal office or appointment, such pretended acceptance and holding of such office or appointment no more vacates the office of judge of the city court than would the performance of any other illegal act which does not, by provision of law, vacate the office. In Throop on Public Officers, § 32, it is said: "An exception also occurs where the second office is conferred by an appointment in violation of statute. Thus, where a statute rendered the members of a city council ineligible to certain offices, it was held that the appointment by the council of one of its members to such an office, and his acceptance thereof, did not effect an abandonment or forfeiture of the office of councilman, because the appointment was absolutely void." In this connection, see McWilliams v. Neal, 180 Ga. 733, 61 S. E. 721, and authorities there cited. The effect of making it illegal for the judge of the city court, while holding such office, to hold any municipal office or appointment is to render him ineligible to hold the latter; and the effect of his pretended holding, or undertaking to hold, the municipal office or appointment, does not operate to vacate the office of judge.

The court committed no error in sustaining the demurrer, and the judgment is affirmed. All the Justices concur.

ATKINSON, J. On September 16, 1902, Corbitt took a note from Flanders, due on November 16, 1903, and, besides the promise to pay, the instrument contained a mortgage on a mule, and after the description were added the words, "and for which this note is taken." It was recorded. On the back of the note was indorsed a credit of $20, dated November 24, 1903. On August 17, 1903, an act was approved regulating the law of year's support (Acts 1903, p. 76) Flanders died on March 29, 1904. On April 4, 1904, his widow applied for year's support. Appraisers were appointed, and to their report a caveat was filed by Corbitt, for the use of Pierce Trading Company. The case was carried to the superior court by appeal, and was submitted to the presiding judge without a jury. He held that, inasmuch as the mortgage was given prior to the act of 1903, the widow's claim for year's support was superior to the lien of the mortgage. The mortgagee excepted.

Prior to 1875 it was held that a widow's claim for dower and year's support was superior to the lien of the mortgage for purchase money of land. On February 24, 1875 (Acts 1875, p. 100), an act was approved which provided that "whenever the vendor of land shall make a deed to land, and at the same time take a mortgage for the purchase money, the widow of the vendee shall not be entitled to dower in said land as against such vendor until the purchase money is paid." In Wilson v. Peeples, 61 Ga. 218, it was held that, where a mortgage was executed prior to the date of such act, a mortgage executed to secure the repayment of money used by the mortgagor in the purchase of real estate would be postponed to the widow's dower and the year's support of the family, although it appeared that the mortgagor died in 1877. On September 16, 1891 (Acts 1890-91, p. 227), the provisions of the act of 1875, preventing the taking of dower as against a purchase-money mortgage given concurrently with the execution of a deed to the vendee, were extended so as to include year's support. Both of these acts referred only to real estate. On August 17, 1903 (Acts 1903, p. 76), an act was approved which provided that "whenever the vendor of personal property shall, at the time of selling and delivering such personal property, take a mortgage thereon to secure the purchase money thereof, neither the widow and minor child or children, nor the minor child or children of the vendee, shall be entitled to a year's support in said personal property so mortgaged, as against said vendor, his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, until the purchase money of said personal property is fully paid; provided, that said purchase-money mortgage shall expressly state that the same is executed and delivered for the purpose of securing the debt for such purchase money."

The general rule is that laws have a prospective rather than a retrospective effect, and this law on its face shows that it was intended to operate in respect to sales and mortgages which should be thereafter made. It uses the future tense, not the present or past, and requires that mortgages given under it, to have the effect provided by it, "shall" contain a certain recital. It did not undertake to change the status of every instrument which might have been executed in the past, although such a paper might contain a statement similar to that provided for in the act. In principle this case is controlled by that of Wilson v. Peeples, supra. The widow's right to a year's support was superior to the lien of the mortgage, and the presiding judge properly so held.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

NEAL et al. v. BOYKIN.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. April 14, 1909.)

1. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 32*)— SETTING ASIDE LETTERS OF ADMINISTRATION —EVIDENCE.

The allegations of the equitable petition brought to set aside the judgment of the court of ordinary granting letters of administration on the estate of a nonresident, to the effect that he left no property in the county where the application was made at the time of his death, and that none was there at the time when the application was made, except a promissory note on an insolvent debtor residing in another county of this state, which had been fraudulently carried to the county where the application was made for the purpose of giving colorable jurisdiction there, were not sustained by the evidence.

2. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 12*)— APPOINTMENT OF ADMINISTRATOR—VALIDITY.

Although a resident of another state left, at the time of his death, no property in the county of this state where application for letters of administration was subsequently made, yet where personal property of the estate was brought into such county after his death, and was there located at the time when application was made for letters of administration and when they were granted, the court of ordinary of that county had jurisdiction to grant the letters, unless the property was carried there in bad faith, and with the intention of conferring improperly a colorable probate jurisdiction.

3. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 12*)— GRANT OF LETTERS—ASSETS OF NONRESIDENT DECEDENT.

Where assets forming a part of the estate of a nonresident decedent are located in two counties of this state, administration can be granted in either, and the ordinary first commencing the exercise of jurisdiction will retain it.

Error from Superior Court, De Kalb County; L. S. Roan, Judge.

Action by John Neal and others against B. M. Boykin. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs bring error. Affirmed.

J. J. Bull and J. D. Kilpatrick, for plaintiffs in error. Green, Tilson & McKinney, for defendant in error.

LUMPKIN, J. John Neal and others filed their equitable petition against B. M. Boykin for the purpose of setting aside the grant of letters of administration to the defendant by the court of ordinary of De Kalb county and of enjoining him from exercising any authority thereunder. On demurrer the petition was dismissed, and the plaintiffs excepted. The judgment was reversed. Neal v. Boykin, 129 Ga. 676, 59 S. E. 912, 121 Am. St. Rep. 237. On the trial the case was submitted on an agreed statement of facts, and each side contended that the presiding judge should direct a verdict. The judge directed a verdict for the defendant. The plaintiffs moved for a new trial, which was refused, and they excepted.

The disposition of the case made by the presiding judge was correct. The case made by the petition was not sustained by the evidence. The plaintiffs alleged that the judgment of the ordinary of De Kalb county, granting letters of administration to Boykin, was procured by fraud; that Boykin and Dixon (who was apparently the executor of Neal under a will probated in Florida) had conspired together, and the latter had sent to the former a promissory note due by one Culpepper, a resident of Talbot county, who was insolvent, and so known to be at the time; and that this was done for the purpose of giving jurisdiction to that court, Neal having left no assets there. It was, moreover, alleged that the application of Boykin for letters of administration was kept concealed from the relatives of the decedent and their attorney, who also had acted as agent for the decedent and for the Florida executor. As a ground for appealing to a court having equitable jurisdiction, it was alleged that, "the appointment of the defendant being obtained by fraud, and the court appointing him being without jurisdiction, the petitioners, being remediless in a court of common law, bring this their petition in equity." The agreed statement of facts showed no conspiracy, fraudulent effort to confer jurisdiction, or concealment on the part of Boykin. It showed that, in addition to the note, at the time when the application for administration was made, there were in De Kalb county certain articles of silverware and a gold watch and chain; that Neal left a will, which was probated in Florida, but not in Georgia, because it had only two witnesses; that prior to the discovery of this fact the executor named in the will had sent the note of Culpepper to Boykin, with the request that he endeavor to collect it; that it was a sealed note, and not barred by the statute of limitations; and that Culpepper resided in Talbot county. There was no evidence that he was insolvent, or the note worthless. While Neal left, at the time of his death, a considerable amount of real and personal property in Talbot county, and also certain nephews, before his death he had adopted, by legal proceedings in Florida, the two half-sisters of Boykin, who were minors. After his death they came to De Kalb county, bringing with them the small articles of silverware, and lived with Boykin, who became their guardian. They were the sole legatees under Neal's will, and, if the adoption was valid, would be his sole heirs in the absence of a will; he leaving neither wife nor other children.

There is some suggestion of a desire on the part of the plaintiffs to attack the validity of the will and the proceedings in Florida by which Neal adopted these two minor girls; but there is no indication in the record that there is any valid ground for making such an attack. The will was probated in Florida, and admitted to record according to the laws of that state. The order or decree of adoption was granted by the circuit court there. No reason is shown why either of them is invalid, except in so far as the lack of attestation according to the laws of this state may effect the recognition of the will here. A nephew, other than those who are parties to the present proceeding, made an application in Talbot county to be appointed administrator, after the grant of letters in De Kalb county, and his application is still pending. He and two other nephews have already applied, by petition to the court of ordinary of De Kalb county, to have set aside the grant of letters of administration to Boykin, on the ground of want of jurisdiction, and their petition has been refused. That court, with knowledge of the facts, was of the opinion that it had jurisdiction. If the adoption of the two girls by Neal was valid, they became his heirs, his nephews had no interest in the estate, and there would be no reason to set aside the grant of administration in De Kalb county at the instance of the latter. This would leave as plaintiffs in the present proceeding only two creditors of the decedent.

Though not sustaining the equitable allegations in the petition, the plaintiffs relied upon the naked legal proposition that the court of ordinary of De Kalb county was without jurisdiction, because there was no property of the deceased there at the time of his death, while there was such property in Talbot county, and that the existence of personal property in De Kalb county at the time of the application for administration did not confer jurisdiction upon the court of ordinary of that county. Civ. Code 1895, § 3393, is as follows: "Every application for letters of administration must be made to the ordinary of the county of the residence of the deceased, if a resident of this state, and if not a resident, then in some county where the estate or some portion thereof is." Section 4234 is as follows: "The ordinary can grant administration upon no person's estate who was not a resident of the county where the application is made at the time of his death, or being a nonresident of the state, has property in said county, or a bona fide cause of action against some person therein." The question arising under these sections is whether a court of ordinary in this state is without jurisdiction to grant letters of administration upon the estate of a nonresident decedent, unless at the time of his death he leaves property located in the county where the administration is sought, or whether the location of personal property within the state at the time when the application is made will confer jurisdiction in the county where it is located. The section first quoted above provides that, as to nonresident decedents, every application for letters of administration must be made "in the county where the estate or some portion thereof is." Does this mean "is" at the time when the application is made, or at the time when the owner died? In the second of the above-quoted sections does the statement that the ordinary can grant administration upon the estate of no person who was not a resident of the county of the application at the time of his death, or, being a nonresident, "has property in said county," restrict the jurisdiction to the existence of property in the county at the time of the death of such person?

If the sections of the Code are to be construed as excluding jurisdiction to grant letters of administration in Georgia altogether unless the decedent left property in this state at the time of his death, then any one might remove personal property of an estate into Georgia, and hold it indefinitely without the courts of this state having power to preserve it by administration and placing it in the hands of a legally appointed administrator, who is under bond for the proper performance of his duty. If there were Georgia heirs and creditors, they could not have the property administered in a regular and orderly manner for the payment of their claims and distribution according to law. If there were no foreign administrator to recover the property, it would remain in an unprotected condition, for lack of a legal custodian, unless this should be held to be a case where "the law by reason of its universality is deficient," and equity should give aid. If there were a foreign administrator, and "if there be none appointed in the state," under our statutes he might bring suit, subject to the requirement that he file an exemplification of his letters of administration. Civ. Code 1895, §§ 3521, 3522. If he recovered the property, it would be to carry it to a foreign jurisdiction for administration. In the present case there was no effort to probate a foreign will, by production of the will itself (Civ. Code 1895, §§ 3297-3300), or such a will devising realty, by means of an exemplification of the probate in another state (sections 3301, 3302), or a foreign will bequeathing personalty, by means of a similar exemplification (section 3303). Nor was this a controversy between the executor appointed in the foreign jurisdiction and the applicant for administration in De Kalb county. Both the plaintiffs and the defendant treat the Florida will as invalid in Georgia. Both proceed on the theory that there must be an administrator in Georgia, but they differ as to who should be appointed and the court which should appoint him.

Referring to Civ. Code 1895, §§ 4234, 4235 (which latter section provides that the ordinary first granting letters acquires exclusive jurisdiction), Bleckley, J., says: "Substituting counties for ecclesiastical divisions and subdivisions, these sections are not substantially different from the common law." Arnold v. Arnold, 62 Ga. 637. There is no statutory provision in this state limiting the amount of property which will authorize an administration, and; unless in extreme cases the doctrine of de minimis should apply, assets of the decedent may be said generally to be "bona notabilia." As used in the English probate law, these words mean notable goods, or property worthy of notice, or of sufficient value to be accounted for (which by the statute of 1 James I was established at £5). 1 Williams on Executors (3d Ed.) 250. If all the goods of the deceased lay within the same jurisdiction, an administration granted by the ordinary was proper; but, if the deceased had bona notabilia (that is, goods of sufficient amount) in different dioceses, administration was granted by the metropolitan of the province, by way of special prerogative, to prevent the confusion arising from the appointment of many different administrators. 2 Bl. Com. 508. The question of whether assets must have been located within the diocese at the time of the death of the decedent does not seem to have been a subject which received much consideration in decisions, although in some of the text-books such appears to have been assumed to be the case. The questions arising were also usually as to the grant of letters by the ordinary or the metropolitan of the same ecclesiastical province, not as to property which might be brought from another country. See, on the subject, Scarth v. Bishop of London, 1 Hagg. 273.

In Schouler on Executors (3d Ed.) § 25, it is said: "The rule of strict construction would seem to refer the locality of personalty in such cases to the situs as existing at the time of the deceased owner's death. Such an interpretation, however, is too narrow to meet the practical needs of a probate appointment for local purposes in modern times—an appointment which perhaps may not be invoked for years after one's death. Hence, for the welfare of creditors and other interested parties, this right of local appointment is more liberally asserted in many of the courts, and local jurisdiction is upheld on the ground that bona notabilia exist when letters are applied for, notwithstanding the goods were brought into the country, or the debtor removed thither, subsequently to the death of owner or creditor; and this seems the better opinion, unless such a bringing in or removal was in bad faith, and with the intention of conferring improperly a colorable probate jurisdiction." A quotation was made from this authority approvingly when the case was formerly before this court; but, as it was alleged that the note was fraudulently sent to De Kalb county in order to confer colorable jurisdiction, Mr. Justice Beck says: "And so we hold in the present case that if the note was brought into De Kalb county, as alleged in the petition, as a part of a fraudulent scheme for the purpose of giving falsely a colorable and pretended jurisdiction to the court of ordinary of that county, it would not be bona notabilia within the county of De Kalb for the purpose of founding administration." 129 Ga. 680, 59 S. E. 912, 121 Am. St. Rep. 237. It was also said that the note, which then appeared to be a simple contract, would be an asset at the domicile of the debtor in Talbot county. It was thus impliedly recognized that, had there been bona fide assets in De Kalb county at the time of the application for administration, the court of ordinary of that county would have had jurisdiction. In Ott v. Hutchinson, 91 Ga. 31, 16 S. E. 106, the exact point now before us was not discussed. The decedent, at the time of his death, left assets in the county where the application for administration was made, and the court says: "Where a nonresident dies leaving property in this state," etc.; but the charge of the judge of the trial court, to which exception was taken, stated that if, at the time when the application was made, the applicant was a creditor of the nonresident decedent, and the latter then had some estate in the jurisdiction, the jury should find for the applicant. The judgment was affirmed by this court. See, also, Pinney v. McGregory, 102 Mass. 186.

The charge of fraudulently carrying property to De Kalb county to confer jurisdiction upon the court of ordinary is eliminated under the evidence, and there is no question of mere temporary presence of property within the jurisdiction, as where a foreign administrator or traveler is passing through the state, carrying with him property left by a decedent in another state. Under the agreed statement of facts, there was sufficient property in De Kalb county to confer jurisdiction upon the ordinary of that county, whether or not the sealed note be treated as a specialty having a situs there. The cases of Arnold v. Arnold, 62 Ga. 637, supra, McLaren v. Bradford, 52 Ga. 649, and Patillo v. Barksdale, 22 Ga. 356, do not conflict with the ruling here made. The point now decided was not then under consideration, and expressions used in the opinions must be considered in the light of the questions before the court.

Doubtless preceiving what might arise from holding that no court of ordinary in this state could grant letters of administration, unless the decedent left property located in this state at the time of his death, it was suggested in the brief of counsel for the plaintiff in error that if there were no county in the state in which the nonresident decedent left property located at the time of his death, and no court of ordinary in the state would have jurisdiction to appoint an administrator immediately upon the death of the decedent, and if thereafter some person should tortiously and wrongfully bring property into some county in this state, and should wrongfully and tortiously hold it there, probably the courts would so construe the two sections of the Code cited above as to permit the appointment of an administrator in the county where such property was thus held; but it was urged that where a nonresident decedent left, at the time of his death, property located in a county in this state, thereby giving jurisdiction in that county, the court of ordinary of no other county in the state could acquire jurisdiction to appoint an administrator, even though other property belonging to the estate of the decedent should be tortiously brought into such other county and be there held. This argument commingles two separate questions: First, are the courts of ordinary of this state without jurisdiction to grant letters of administration on the estate of a foreign decedent, unless at the time of his death he leaves property located in this state, or (omitting the question of a fraudulent effort to confer jurisdiction) is the existence of personal property located in a county of this state at the time when an application for the grant of administration is made, and so remaining, sufficient to confer jurisdiction upon the court of ordinary of that county? And, second, if the location of personal property at the time of the application and the hearing thereof is sufficient to give the county where it is situated jurisdiction to grant letters of administration, but there is another county in the state where there was property at the time of the death of the decedent, and where it has since remained, which court of ordinary would have priority of jurisdiction in respect to the grant of letters? The first of these questions is one of the existence of jurisdiction. The second refers to the matter of priority as between two courts, either of which might have had jurisdiction before one undertook to exercise it. There is nothing in the statutes which would authorize the construction that sometimes the location of personal property in Georgia at the time of the application for administration would confer jurisdiction upon a court of ordinary, and sometimes it would not. The question last stated is answered by the decision in Arnold v. Arnold, 62 Ga. 623, supra, in which it was held: "Where a nonresident intestate left assets in two counties of this state, administration can be granted in either, and the ordinary first commencing the exercise of jurisdiction will retain it." See, also, Civ. Code 1895, § 4235.

MORTGAGES (§ 163*)—LIEN—PRIORITY.

Where title to real estate is conveyed by a duly recorded deed to secure a debt, and the grantee takes the deed and advances the money loaned, without notice and before the record of a materialman's lien upon the property, the title thus acquired is superior to such lien.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; J. T. Pendleton, Judge.

Action by the Bennett Lumber Company against Belle Martin and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Moore & Pomeroy, for plaintiff in error.
E. V. Carter and Ebb. T. Williams, for defendants in error.

HOLDEN, J. The plaintiff alleges that Mrs. Martin contracted with Spencer to make certain improvements on a described lot of land owned by her. Spencer purchased from petitioner certain material to be used in making improvements, which was so used. The plaintiff fully complied with its contract with Spencer in furnishing materials between the 2d day of October, 1905, and the 11th day of December, 1905, and the plaintiff claims a lien on the property described in the petition for the purchase price of such materials. On the 3d of October, 1905, Mrs. Martin conveyed the land to the Dickinson Trust Company by deed to secure a loan of $1,500. The suit was brought against Mrs. Martin, Spencer, and the defendant company, asking that the lien claimed be foreclosed against the property, and that the judgment of foreclosure have priority over the deed of the defendant, and for other relief. Counsel for both parties treat the claim of lien of the plaintiff and the deed of the defendant company as having been duly recorded. The defendant company filed a demurrer to the petition, and to the order of the court, sustaining this demurrer and dismissing the petition as to the defendant company, the plaintiff excepted.

The question involved in this case is whether or not, under the facts as alleged, the claim of lien of the plaintiff has priority over the deed to the defendant company. The plaintiff in its petition alleges: "That said loan of $1,500 was made by said Dickinson Trust Company to said Mrs. Belle Martin for the purpose of erecting a residence on said described premises, and that said Dickinson Trust Company well knew that at the time said deed was executed said building had not been erected, nor had the labor and material therein been paid for; * * * that said Dickinson Trust Company did not pay to said Mrs. Belle Martin the sum of $1,500, or any part thereof, upon the 3d day of October, 1905, but that said amount was paid to said Mrs. Belle Martin, or said Spencer, or materialmen, as the work thereon progressed; and that petitioner furnished all or part of the material set forth in Exhibit A before said sum of $1,500 had been paid." A bill of particulars of the material furnished by the plaintiff was attached to the petition, and therein, of date October 2d, the day prior to the execution of the deed, several items of material are charged. If it can be said that any of the material was furnished by the plaintiff before the execution of the deed, there is no allegation that the defendant knew of this fact. It is alleged that the defendant paid to Mrs. Martin, or Spencer, or materialmen, as the work on the residence progressed, the $1,500 loaned by it to Mrs. Martin; but it is nowhere alleged that the defendant knew that the plaintiff furnished any material to be used in improving the property. As it was alleged that the money was loaned for the purpose of erecting a residence on the property conveyed to the defendant, and that the defendant paid to Mrs. Martin, or to Spencer, the contractor, or to materialmen, as the work on the residence progressed, the amount loaned, it is to be presumed that the money was used for the purpose for which it was loaned, to wit, the erection of the residence on the property. It is nowhere alleged that the defendant, before paying out the full amount of the loan, had any notice that the plaintiff had furnished, was furnishing, or even would furnish, any of the material for the improvements being made.

Civ. Code 1895, § 2804, provides that liens in favor of materialmen shall be inferior to certain liens and claims therein specified, but that they shall be superior to all other liens not therein excepted. It has been held that under this section the lien of the materialman is superior to the lien of a mortgage. Langston v. Anderson, 69 Ga. 65; Tanner v. Bell, 61 Ga. 585; Georgia Loan Co. v. Dunlop, 108 Ga. 218, 33 S. E. 882. This ruling is based on the fact that the lien of a mortgage is not one of the liens excepted in the section above referred to. While that section provides that the lien of a materialman shall be superior to the liens not therein excepted, there is no provision that the lien of a materialman shall be superior to a title acquired without notice of the existence of such lien. It has accordingly been held, in the case of Ashmore v. Whatley, 99 Ga. 150, 24 S. E. 941, that a bona fide purchaser of the absolute title of real estate, who buys without notice of a materialman's lien upon the property, which at the time of the purchase has been neither recorded nor foreclosed, takes the property divested of such lien. It does not appear from the allegations of the petition that at the time the defendant company took the deed, or during the time it was advancing the money loaned by it to Mrs. Martin, the claim of lien by the plaintiff was recorded or foreclosed, or that the defendant had any notice of the existence of the claim of lien by the plaintiff.

The rights acquired by the holder of a security deed are in many respects different from those of the holder of a mortgage lien. Civ. Code 1895, § 2771, provides that a deed made to secure a debt shall pass the title of the property to the vendee until the debt is paid, "and shall be held by the courts of this state to be an absolute conveyance, with the right reserved by the vendor to have said property reconveyed to him upon the payment of the debt or debts intended to be secured agreeable to the terms of the contract, and not a mortgage." The title acquired under such deed is superior to the right to a year's support, or dower, though such right to a year's support and dower are superior to the lien of a mortgage. When a judgment has been obtained on any indebtedness secured by the deed, before the property can be levied upon and sold, there must be a reconveyance by the grantee to the grantor. As stated in Shumate v. McLendon, 120 Ga. 396, 48 S. E. 10, a security deed conveys absolute title, and leaves the grantor no interest in the land which can be levied on under a judgment obtained after the deed was executed. This subsequent judgment cannot even be levied upon the land thus conveyed to secure a debt, without first tendering to the holder of the security deed his debt, with interest. If the debt secured by the deed is infected with usury, the deed is void. This is not true with reference to a mortgage. If there is no waiver of the right to homestead by the debtor, he can homestead the property mortgaged, and the exemption will be good against the lien of the mortgage. If the grantor in a security deed homesteads the property conveyed, the exemption is not valid as against the title of the grantee in the deed.

It has been held in many instances by this court that a bona fide purchaser of property, without notice of the general and special liens of landlords and laborers, acquires a title superior thereto. In the case of Frazer v. Jackson, 46 Ga. 621, it was held: "A bona fide purchaser of the absolute title to personal property, without notice of any unrecorded statutory lien upon it, takes the same divested of any such lien." The lien provided for materialmen is a statutory lien. In the case of Clark v. Dobbins, 52 Ga. 656, it was ruled: "A warehouseman and factor who, without notice of any lien, makes advances on cotton which was produced on rented land and stored with him by the tenant, has such a qualified property in and lien on the cotton as to entitle him to reimbursement for such advances and pay for proper charges, before the landlord can enforce his claim for rent against the cotton." On page 658 it was said: "In such case the right of the factor is that of a purchaser to the extent of the advances made, and he has a special property in the thing or article on which he has advanced his money." In the case of Holmes v. Pye, 107 Ga. 784, 33 S. E. 816, where it was held that a bona fide purchaser of cotton raised on rented premises, without notice of the lien of the landlord for rent, took the same freed therefrom, on page 786 of 107 Ga., and page 817 of 33 S. E., it was said: "It is to be noted that the superiority of landlord's liens, as fixed by the statute, is over other liens."

So it is with Civ. Code 1895, § 2804, par. 4, above referred to, which provides that the liens of materialmen shall be superior to liens not therein excepted. There is no provision of our law that the lien of a materialman shall be superior to the title acquired by a bona fide purchaser. While it is true that the lien of a materialman for material furnished in the improvement of real estate is superior to the lien of a mortgage, it is not superior to the title acquired by a bona fide purchaser before the record of such liens and without notice thereof, or the title acquired by one to whom a deed is made conveying the property to secure a debt before such record and without such notice. It not appearing from the allegations of the plaintiff's petition that the defendant ever had any notice of the claim of lien by the plaintiff at the time of the execution of the deed, or before the money borrowed was fully advanced, the court committed no error in sustaining the demurrer.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

Error from Superior Court, Troup County; R. W. Freeman, Judge.

Action by W. A. Holmes against Sam P. Burpee. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

E. T. Moon and D. B. Whittier, for plaintiff in error. E. A. Jones and D. J. Gaffney, for defendant in error.

HOLDEN, J. The defendant in error brought suit against the plaintiff in error for damages, making substantially the following allegations: Burpee, the defendant in the court below, through Carlyle, on January 15, 1906, sold the plaintiff a mule, which at the time was incumbered with a mortgage, which was afterwards foreclosed and the mule taken from the plaintiff and sold. "That your petitioner did not know, at the time he purchased said mule, it was under or subject to a mortgage. Neither did said Sam P. Burpee nor Stanmore Carlyle inform him that there was a mortgage on said mule. That at the time the said Sam P. Burpee sold said mule to petitioner he well knew of the existence of the said bank's lien. That he knew of the same when he and the said Stanmore Carlyle, his agent, sold said mule, or induced said W. A. Holmes to purchase the same, knowing full well that the mule was subject to the mortgage held by said bank. * * * That the said Sam Burpee, at the time he sold or had said mule sold to said W. A. Holmes, * * * knew of the existence of the said bank's superior lien, and that said mule was subject to said lien." After the mule was levied upon, the plaintiff notified the defendant, who agreed to give the plaintiff another mule in the place of the one sold him, or pay him the value of the mule, which promise the defendant failed to carry out. The plaintiff sued out an attachment against the defendant on the grounds of his being a nonresident and causing his property to be removed beyond the limits of the state, and filed his declaration in attachment. The defendant in his answer denied that he sold the mule to the plaintiff, but alleged that the mule was the property of Carlyle, and that Carlyle sold the mule to the plaintiff as his own property. He denied that he knew that there was a mortgage on the mule at the time of the sale. Upon the trial of the case a verdict was rendered in favor of the plaintiff for $125, and to the order of the court overruling his motion for a new trial the defendant excepted.

1. The evidence shows that Carlyle sold the mule to the plaintiff; but there is evidence that the defendant admitted that the mule belonged to him, and that Carlyle acted as his agent in selling the mule. There is no evidence, however, that Carlyle or the defendant, at the time the mule was sold to the plaintiff, knew of the existence of the mortgage thereon under a foreclosure of which the mule was levied upon and sold. The defendant contends that the action is one for fraud and deceit, and that, there being no evidence that at the time the mule was sold to the plaintiff there was any knowledge on the part of the defendant, or Carlyle, that a mortgage on the mule existed, the verdict was contrary to evidence. In order to recover in an action of deceit, it is necessary to allege and prove the scienter. Cooley v. King, 113 Ga. 1163, 1165, 39 S. E. 486. In order to maintain an action under Civ. Code 1895, § 3813, or under section 3814, it is necessary, as stated in De Vaughn v. Harris, 103 Ga. 105, 29 S. E. 613, and in Gordon v. Irvine, 105 Ga. 144, 148, 31 S. E. 151, respectively, to show actual moral fraud. Is this action one for fraud and deceit, or one for the breach of an implied warranty as to title? There is no allegation that the defendant, or Carlyle, made any representation to the plaintiff that there was no mortgage on the mule at the time of the sale. The petition simply alleges that the defendant knew at the time of the sale of the existence of the mortgage and failed to inform the plaintiff of its existence.

Civ. Code 1895, § 3814, provides: "Willful misrepresentation of a material fact, made to induce another to act, and upon which he does act to his injury, will give a right of action. Mere concealment of such a fact, unless done in such a manner as to deceive and mislead, will not support an action." Under this provision, proof of concealment in the manner therein set forth would be sufficient to authorize a jury to infer actual moral fraud on the part of the seller; but the plaintiff does not allege in the petition any intention on the part of the seller to deceive or defraud the plaintiff in withholding from him or concealing the information which the defendant is alleged to have had about the existence of the mortgage. If the seller of the mule knew at the time of the sale that there was a mortgage on the mule, duly recorded and to which the mule was subject, and merely failed to inform the buyer of this fact, without any intention to deceive or defraud him, this would not constitute actual moral fraud. There is an allegation in the petition that the buyer did not know of the existence of the mortgage. There is no allegation of the value of the mule, or the amount due on the debt secured by the mortgage. It may be true that the seller of a piece of personalty may know of the existence of a mortgage thereon to which the property is subject, and may intend to pay off the mortgage himself, or, because of the existence of the mortgage, sell it for a less sum than its value, honestly believing, and for good reasons being justified in the belief, that the buyer also has knowledge of the outstanding mortgage, and expects to discharge it as a part of the cost to him of the property purchased; and the circumstances might be such that there would be no fraud or deceit, or concealment of the existence of the mortgage "in such a manner as to deceive and mislead" the buyer.

There is no allegation that there was any intention on the part of the seller to deceive or mislead the plaintiff, or that the plaintiff was deceived or misled; nor is there any allegation that the plaintiff was "defrauded." The allegation in the first paragraph of the petition is that "defendant is indebted to your petitioner in the sum of $125, for that" defendant sold plaintiff a mule which was subject to a mortgage, and that the mule was afterwards levied on under the execution issued upon the foreclosure of the mortgage. The second paragraph alleges that the mule was sold under the mortgage execution, "to the loss and damage of petitioner." The petition further alleges that the defendant subsequently admitted "his liability, * * * promising to pay the same." It is nowhere alleged that the plaintiff was misled, deceived, or defrauded, or that the defendant, or his agent, intended to deceive, mislead, or defraud the plaintiff. The allegations that at the time of the sale the defendant knew, but the plaintiff did not know, of the existence of the mortgage, and defendant failed to inform plaintiff of this fact, simply make and emphasize the fact that there was no waiver by the plaintiff of the implied warranty of title by the defendant in the sale, and that the facts and circumstances were such that the implied warranty was not "expressly or from the nature of the transaction excepted." In this case there is no allegation whatever in the petition that the defendant knew that the plaintiff did not know of the existence of the mortgage. In the case of Perdue v. Harwell, 80 Ga. 150, 4 S. E. 877, it was held that the action was brought upon the contract, and not upon the tort, and on page 153 of 80 Ga., and page 878 of 4 S. E., the court says: "Another, and perhaps the stronger, reason is that the declaration filed by the plaintiff does not allege fraud or deceit on the part of the defendant. It does not even hint at either in any part of the declaration, showing that the pleader relied upon the contract, and not upon the tort."

We do not think that the petition in the present case was an action for fraud and deceit, but was an action for damages for breach of an implied warranty. Upon the trial of a case, proof of facts connected with the concealment of a material fact might show actual moral fraud; but in construing a petition, to determine whether or not a party is proceeding in an action for moral fraud perpetrated upon him, the absence of an allegation that the defendant actually intended to mislead, deceive, or defraud, and the absence of allegations of circumstances indicating moral fraud, and the absence of allegations that plaintiff was misled, deceived, or defrauded, must be considered in determining whether the action is based on fraud and deceit or is an action ex contractu. There is nothing in the ruling herein made in conflict with the decision in the case of Gordon v. Irvine, 105 Ga. 144, 31 S. E. 151.

There are allegations in the petition that the defendant, after the property was taken under the mortgage, promised to deliver to the plaintiff another mule or pay the plaintiff the value of the property. We do not think these allegations can be properly construed as constituting a suit to recover upon such subsequent promise; but they were simply allegations of a subsequent admission of liability made by the defendant.

We do not think there is any merit in the complaint of the defendant that the court committed error in refusing to award a nonsuit, or to direct a verdict, or to grant a new trial on the ground that the action was one ex delicto, and there was no evidence showing fraud or deceit on the part of the defendant, or his agent, who sold the mule to the plaintiff. According to a proper construction of the petition, the action was one for damages from breach of implied warranty of title.

2. Civ. Code 1895, § 3555, provides that, if there is no express covenant of warranty, the seller (unless expressly or from the nature of the transaction excepted) warrants that he has a valid title to personalty and the right to sell it. It would be a breach of such implied warranty if, at the time of the sale, there was a valid and duly recorded incumbrance upon the property, to which it was subject and under which it was afterwards taken from the buyer and sold. Snowden v. Waterman, 100 Ga. 588, 589, 28 S. E. 121. See, also, 30 A. & E. Enc. Law, 181.

3. The plaintiff in error contends that the evidence does not disclose the fact that the plaintiff has been damaged, and bases this contention on the following statement made by Holmes in delivering his testimony: "At the time the mule was levied on it was out here in possession of a negro to whom I had sold it." In making the motion for nonsuit, and the motion for the court to direct a verdict for the defendant, he did not claim that by reason of this statement by the plaintiff the evidence showed that plaintiff was not damaged. Holmes further testified: "I kept that mule about 12 months before it was taken away. * * * He [Burpee] said that it was his mule, and that he was responsible to me for the mule. * * * I didn't file any claim to the mule, or try to maintain my title in the mule as against the levy. * * * I told him I wouldn't take $125 for the mule I had. * * * I swore in that trial * * * that Carlyle had cheated and defrauded me out of $125. He or somebody had." Another witness testified that the defendant said: "You can just rest satisfied Mr. Holmes will be paid in full for his mule." This witness further testified that Burpee said he would bring a mule "to take the place of the mule that Mr. Holmes had lost." In view of the testimony above quoted, and of other testimony in the case, indicating that the mule belonged to Holmes at the time of the levy and sale, we think the jury were authorized from all the testimony to conclude that at the time the mule was levied upon and sold it belonged to the plaintiff, and that he sustained damages to the amount of the verdict in the loss of the mule. The evidence discloses the fact that the mortgage was duly recorded and a lien on the mule at the time of the sale to the plaintiff. The evidence supported the verdict, and the court did not abuse his discretion in overruling the motion for a new trial.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

1. LIBEL AND SLANDER (§ 38*)—AFFIDAVITS—PRIVILEGE.

The publication of false and libelous matter only by signing an affidavit to be used upon the hearing of a case in equity, or upon the hearing of any other issue in which the use of affidavits is permissible, is absolutely privileged, and will not support an action for libel.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Libel and Slander, Cent. Dig. § 119; Dec. Dig. § 38.*]

2. LIBEL AND SLANDER (§ 50½*)—PRIVILEGED COMMUNICATIONS.

Error from City Court of Savannah; Davis Freeman, Judge.

Action by M. D. Bibb, administratrix, against W. B. Crawford. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

Bibb brought suit against Crawford, alleging that the latter had made and published an affidavit containing certain libelous language set forth in the petition. It is alleged that the language was falsely and maliciously used. It is stated in the petition that the libelous matter was published; but it is not stated how or to whom it was published. The affidavit purports on its face to have been made for use in a suit pending in Bartow county; but whether it was so used or not does not appear from the record. The court sustained a general demurrer to the petition.

Garrard & Meldrim and John T. Norris, for plaintiff in error. Cann, Barrow & McIntire, for defendant in error.

POWELL, J. (after stating the facts as above). 1, 2. It is undoubtedly true that, if the publication of the affidavit by the defendant was only by making it and introducing it or allowing it to be introduced in evidence in the trial of the case pending in a court of competent jurisdiction (and this is the insistence of his counsel), the defendant could not be held liable, no matter how false or malicious it might be, for he could claim an absolute privilege. Francis v. Wood, 75 Ga. 648; Wilson v. Sullivan, 81 Ga. 238, 7 S. E. 274; Conley v. Key, 98 Ga. 115, 25 S. E. 914; Hendrix v. Daughtry, 3 Ga. App. 481, 60 S. E. 206; Buschbaum v. Heriot, 5 Ga. App. —, 63 S. E. 645. "An action for defamation will not lie for anything sworn or stated in the course of a judicial proceeding before a court of competent jurisdiction, such as defamatory bills or proceedings filed in chancery, or in ecclesiastical courts, or affidavits containing false and scandalous assertions against them." 2 Addison on Torts, § 1092.

However, the present petition does not state how or in what manner the libel was published, nor was the plaintiff required by special demurrer, or otherwise, to give this information. So far as we are judicially informed, the defendant may have caused it to be published in a newspaper, or may have shown it to persons other than those connected with the court. The privilege that a witness may speak freely upon the stand, or in affidavits, where that form of testimony is permissible, gives no immunity as to any publication of the scandalous matter, other than as connected with the suit or action in which the testimony is given. Where the libel is contained in an affidavit used in a judicial proceeding, as is true in cases where the testimony is delivered upon the witness stand, the sole redress against the witness is by a prosecution for perjury. But if a witness who has testified by affidavit publishes the false matter otherwise, as by exhibiting it to persons not connected with the suit or the court, the fact that the same paper might afterward be used in a judicial proceeding, or that it has been previously so used, affords no protection.

8. The defense of privilege, being affirmative in its nature, can be raised by demurrer only when all the facts essential to its existence appear in the petition.

Green Dowdy was convicted of larceny from the house, and he brings error. Affirmed.

I. T. Irvin, Jr., for plaintiff in error. R. C. Norman, Sol., for defendant in error.

POWELL, J. The defendant was charged with larceny from the house, in that he stole certain cotton seed from an outhouse of a Mr. Ray. The proof was that he and another negro, named Bradley, went "to the cotton seed house" of Mr. Ray and stole the cotton seed therefrom. The only point made as to the legal sufficiency of the evidence is that the indictment charged an outhouse and the proof showed a cotton seed house. This is not a material variance. The judge, who tried the case without the intervention of a jury, was authorized as a trier of the facts to infer from his general experience and observation that a cotton seed house is an outhouse.

The plaintiff in error cites the case of Thompson v. State, 92 Ga. 448, 17 S. E. 265, in which it was held that "an allegation in an indictment that a grindstone was stolen from a 'wagon shed house' is not supported by evidence showing that the grindstone in question was stolen from under a 'buggy shed house.'" The italics in the foregoing quotation were inserted by the Supreme Court itself, and plainly were intended to emphasize the fact that the larceny did not take place in the house, or from the house, but "under" a shed. To steal from under a shed is not larceny from the house in this state. McCabe v. State, 1 Ga. App. 719, 58 S. E. 277.

The plaintiff in error also excepts to the admission of testimony that the defendant and the negro Bradley were frequently seen together about Mr. Ray's place during the period in which the larceny was supposed to have been committed. There was no error in admitting this testimony.

It will be presumed, until the contrary appears, that the judge acted on good and lawful cause. The defendant making the Sib Douglas was convicted of illegally selling intoxicating liquor, and he brings error. Affirmed.

H. A. Wilkinson, for plaintiff in error. J. A. Laing, Sol. Gen., R. R. Arnold, and Jas. G. Parks, for the State.

POWELL, J. The defendant was convicted for illegally selling liquor. The testimony for the state shows that a Mr. Lee gave his negro porter, Tom Brinson, 25 cents, and told him to go to the defendant and buy him a half pint of whisky. As soon as the porter left on this mission, Lee called to a Mr. Pritchard and told him that he had sent for the liquor, and asked him to watch the transaction, so that if the defendant sold the liquor he could furnish testimony in addition to that of the porter. The porter went to the defendant's house and returned with a half pint of corn whisky, which he delivered to Lee. Lee then turned this bottle of whisky over to Pritchard, who had seen the porter go into the defendant's house, and who was awaiting the result of the visit. Pritchard and another person then went to the defendant's house and found a jug of whisky containing about three quarts of the same kind of liquor. When this jug of whisky was found in the defendant's house, and he was confronted with the situation, he admitted that he had sold the bottle of whisky to Lee's porter that morning. The porter, however, when called to the stand by the state to testify, said that, although he was given the quarter by Mr. Lee to buy the whisky, when he approached the defendant he said he did not have any to sell; that a proposition was then made to borrow some, and the defendant loaned him a half pint under a promise that he would return it in a few days; and that on the following Tuesday morning he went to another town and purchased a two-gallon jug of whisky, filled up the half-pint bottle, and returned it to the defendant. Upon the statement of the Solicitor General that he had been entrapped by the witness, the judge allowed the state (after laying the usual foundation) to prove that when this witness returned with the liquor and delivered it to Mr. Lee he stated that he had bought the whisky from the defendant. In connection with the admission of this testimony the judge cautioned the jury that it was not admitted as independent proof of the defendant's guilt, but that it was admitted solely for the purpose of impeaching the negro porter as a witness. It was further shown that the witness' statement to the effect that he had gone to another town and bought whisky, which he had returned to the defendant, was untrue. The defendant, in his statement, denied selling the whisky, admitted that he had delivered it to the porter, and claimed that he had merely loaned it to him, and that the loan had been repaid the following week.

The contention of the defendant's counsel is that there is no proof of the corpus delicti—the sale of the whisky—otherwise than by the alleged confession of the defendant. This court thoroughly recognizes the rule that the corpus delicti must be established by evidence other than a confession; that a confession, wholly uncorroborated by other evidence, will not support a conviction. However, it is a part of the same rule that the corroborating testimony need not show the fact beyond a reasonable doubt, but is adequate if it tends materially to corroborate the confession and to connect the defendant with the crime. The circumstances that the defendant had been sent to buy the whisky, and not to borrow; that he proceeded forthwith on the mission, and returned with the whisky, and not the money; that there had been a delivery of the whisky; that the defendant's subsequent explanation that he had made a loan proved in part at least to be untrue, by reason of the fact that the person to whom the whisky was delivered, and by whom it was said to have been returned, had had no opportunity to have gone off for it and to have returned it—all tends strongly to raise the inference that the defendant had sold the whisky, and was certainly sufficient to corroborate his voluntary confession that he had sold it.

The point is also made in the motion for a new trial that the court erred in allowing the state's counsel to show that the negro porter had stated to Mr. Lee that he had bought the whisky from the defendant; but it is not meritorious, when considered in connection with the purpose of its admission and the cautionary remarks made to the jury by the presiding judge at the time of its admission.

Judgment affirmed.

WELLBORN v. SOUTHERN RY. CO.
(No. 1,527.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. May 4, 1909.)

CARRIERS (§ 62*)—PRINCIPAL AND AGENT (§ 101*)—IMPLIED CONTRACT OF CARRIAGE—SPECIAL CONTRACT—EFFECT.

Whenever a shipper delivers property to a common carrier for transportation, there arises at once by implication of law a contract of carriage between the parties. Where the shipper seeks to hold the carrier liable for breach of this contract in failing to deliver the goods safely at destination, he need not, in order to make out a prima facie case, show any written bill of lading, but may prove the contract of carriage by showing delivery of the property to the carrier, through himself or agent. If the agent delivers the property in his own name, and his principal is undisclosed, the latter is bound by any special contract, so far as the terms thereof are legal and binding, which is made between the agent and the carrier; but if the company receives the goods as those of the principal, and without knowledge or consent of the latter the carrier attempts to make a special contract with the agent, the principal is not bound thereby, unless he does some act from which the law infers a ratification.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Franklin County; Jos. N. Worley, Judge.

Action in a justice's court by W. G. Wellborn against the Southern Railway Company. There was an appeal to the superior court, where a nonsuit was granted, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

Wellborn brought an action against the Southern Railway Company in a justice's court, and alleged a breach of the company's contract to carry the property safely. The case was appealed to the superior court, and there a nonsuit was awarded. It appears from the testimony that Wellborn desired to ship a car load of stock from Lavonia, Ga., to Atlanta, and that he instructed a Mr. Jones to deliver the stock to the railroad company and to load the same upon the cars. Jones had no further authority in the matter than to load the stock for Wellborn. The agent of the company, however, asked him to sign a special contract of shipment in the name of the plaintiff, and he thereupon at the agent's request signed the plaintiff's name to the special contract. One of the horses sent by this shipment was injured while being transported. The plaintiff, on the witness stand, denied that he had signed the special contract, or had authorized Jones to sign it, and stated, further, that he did not know of the existence of the contract at the time he paid the freight on the car of stock when it was delivered at destination. When it thus appeared that there was a written contract of shipment, and the plaintiff was unable to produce it and introduce it in testimony, the judge excluded testimony offered for the purpose of showing that there had been a delivery of the property to the carrier, and awarded a nonsuit on the ground that the written contract was the highest evidence.

H. H. Chandler and Jas. H. Skelton, for plaintiff in error. A. G. & Julian McCurry, for defendant in error.

POWELL, J. (after stating the facts as above). If Jones, without disclosing his agency, or without the agent of the company being aware that the plaintiff was his principal, had offered the shipment to the railroad company for transportation, and had made, as a part of this transaction, a special contract of carriage, or if the plaintiff, knowing that Jones had made this special contract, had ratified his act in so doing, by taking the benefit of any particular advantage which had accrued by reason of that contract, such as riding on a pass given as a part of it, then the rights of the parties would have been governed by the special contract of shipment, so far as legally enforceable. Central of Ga. Ry. Co. v. James, 117 Ga. 832, 45 S. E. 223; Durant Co. v. Sinclair Co., 2 Ga. App. 213 (4), 58 S. E. 485.

It appears from the testimony in the present case, however, that the agent had no further authority than merely to carry the stock to the railroad and put it upon the car, and that the agent of the railroad knew that Wellborn was the real shipper, and, indeed, had this servant who brought the stock to sign a special contract in Wellborn's name. It further appears that Wellborn did not know of this transaction, and there is no testimony that he ever in any way ratified it. It was, therefore, no contract of his. He did not sue upon this contract of carriage, but sued upon that implied contract which arose from delivery of the shipment to the carrier for transportation. It is not necessary to produce or account for a bill of lading, in order to show that property has been delivered to a carrier for transportation. The plaintiff had a right to stand upon the implied contract, and the court erred in granting a nonsuit.

Further, it would seem that the act approved August 18, 1906 (Acts 1906, p. 102), would prohibit the making of special contracts of carriage with a view of limiting the carrier's liability as against the initial shipper or holder of the bill of lading.

WILLIAMS v. STATE (No. 1,758.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. May 4, 1909.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 67*)—CONTRACT OF EMPLOYMENT.

A contract "to pull and tie a certain 14-acre tract of fodder on the Barrow place, when the same was ready to be pulled, at the rate of 60 cents per day, or 70 cents per 100 bundles," is sufficiently definite as to time of beginning, work to be performed, and wages to be paid.

2. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 67*)—CONTRACTS TO LABOR — OBTAINING ADVANCEMENTS FRAUDULENTLY—EVIDENCE.

The evidence, taken in connection with the defendant's statement, affirmatively shows that there was no intent to defraud when the provisions were procured from the prosecutor by the defendant on his labor contract, and therefore the verdict was unauthorized.

Al Williams was convicted of procuring advancements fraudulently on the faith of contracts of labor, and brings error. Reversed.

Howell B. Simmons, for plaintiff in error.
W. G. Martin, Sol., for the State.

HILL, C. J. Plaintiff in error was convicted of a violation of the act of 1903 (Acts 1903, p. 90) providing for punishment of those who with fraudulent intent, procure advances on the faith of contracts of labor. The evidence, briefly stated, is as follows: According to the prosecutor, the defendant came to his place and wanted some provisions, and he let him have "one sack of flour, worth 80 cents, 4 lbs. meat, 45 cents, 1 plug of tobacco, 15 cents, and a package of soda, 5 cents," on the promise of the defendant that he would "pull and tie a certain 14-acre tract of fodder on the Barrow place, when the same was ready to be pulled," and he was to pay the defendant for this work at the rate of 60 cents per day, or 70 cents per 100 bundles. The defendant never pulled the fodder or paid for the provisions. At the time that the agreement was made with the defendant, he was working on a neighboring farm for Mr. Bryant, who got sick and died in the fall. The prosecutor testified that he frequently saw the defendant, and never made any demand on him to pull the fodder or to return the money nor informed him that the fodder was ready to be pulled. He also swore that the defendant came to see him about pulling the fodder, but it was "after everybody in the neighborhood had finished pulling fodder." This was all the evidence for the state.

The defendant, in his statement to the jury, admitted that he had made the contract in question with the prosecutor, and had received from him the provisions named in the accusation. He gave, as a reason why he was late in his offer to perform his contract, the fact that his employer, Mr. Bryant, was taken sick in the summer, that he was kept busy waiting on him until he died in the fall, and that after his employer's death he helped the widow gather her crop; that after his employer died, and he had finished helping gather the crop for the widow, he went to Mr. Scott, the prosecutor, to pull the fodder for him according to his contract, and found that the fodder had been pulled; that he then made arrangement with his "boss" to pay all that he owed the prosecutor, and he did not know that the claim of Mr. Scott had not been paid, until he had him arrested a year later.

It is insisted that the evidence in this case is not sufficient to warrant a conviction, because the alleged contract was not definite as to the time it was to begin or end, or as to the labor to be performed. We do not concur in this opinion. We think the contract was definite in every particular. The defendant was to do a definite, specified piece of work, for a definite, specified wage (to pull and tie a certain 14-acre tract of fodder on the Barrow place, when the same was ready to be pulled), for which the defendant was to be paid at the rate of 60 cents per day, or 70 cents per 100 bundles. The defendant agreed to pull the fodder when "ready to be pulled." We think, however, that the prosecutor should have informed the defendant when his fodder was ready to be pulled, in view of the fact that the defendant, according to the prosecutor's own testimony, was permanently employed elsewhere, and was only to do this special piece of work for the prosecutor "when the fodder was ready to be pulled." Now, the prosecutor testifies that he saw the defendant every day, but made no demand on him to do the work, and did not inform him that the fodder was ready to be pulled. All fodder does not ripen at the same time, and the fact that defendant was late in offering to perform his contract was not material, unless it was necessary to pull and tie the fodder before he offered to perform. It does not appear, from the evidence, that it became necessary for the prosecutor's fodder to be pulled before the defendant offered to pull it. It may have been "late corn," and the best agriculturists differ as to the stage of ripeness when fodder should be pulled (so says Russell, J.). The defendant, in his statement, gave good reasons why he was delayed in performing his contract. He was compelled to wait on his employer, who was sick during the whole summer, and to help gather the crop for the widow after his employer had died.

We are clear that the evidence in this case, taken in connection with the defendant's statement (which on material facts is fully corroborated), proves that the defendant had no fraudulent intent when he procured from the prosecutor the small quantity of provisions on his promise to do the particular work; and for this reason the verdict of guilty was unauthorized, and a new trial should have been granted.

Judgment reversed.

Action by T. B. Whitfield against Fred Wagner & Son. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants bring error. Affirmed.

Whitfield brought suit against Fred Wagner & Son, a partnership composed of Fred Wagner and Fred Wagner, Jr., to recover damages for breach of contract. He alleged that he entered into a contract with the defendants to paint the courthouse which the defendants were constructing for Crisp county; that he was to be paid the sum of $450 for this work; that the defendants agreed to furnish him all of the materials to be used at dealers' prices, with the exception of 400 pounds of lead, which they agreed to furnish him free of charge, and they also agreed to advance him sufficient money to pay his laborers at the end of each week; that he entered upon the performance of his contract, employed laborers, bought material, and carried on the work under the contract for 30 days or more, when the defendants violated the contract with him by stopping him from performing the same and refused to carry out their agreement to furnish money for his weekly pay roll, or to pay for the material bought and used by him in doing the work under his contract; and that by reason of the breach of their contract the defendants have injured and damaged him in the sum of $250.93—this aggregate amount consisting of $55.35, which he had actually expended for material that went into the building under the terms of his contract, and the amount of $195.58 paid by him to laborers for their work under the contract. He attaches a bill of particulars containing an itemized statement for both items of damages claimed. The defendants filed a plea of the general issue. The contract was admitted, and the fact that it was not completed by the plaintiff was also admitted. The evidence was in conflict only on the one issue as to whether the plaintiff had voluntarily abandoned his contract, or whether the defendants, without cause, had prevented him from performance. The verdict was in favor of the plaintiff.

Error from City Court of Polk County. Action by F. M. Helms against the Southern States Portland Cement Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

J. L. Tison, for plaintiff in error. Janes & Hutchens, for defendant in error.

POWELL, J. This case previously came to this court on demurrer, and we held that the petition set out a cause of action. Southern States Portland Cement Co. v. Helms, 2 Ga. App. 308, 58 S. E. 524. The case then proceeded to trial, and resulted in a verdict in favor of the plaintiff. The case comes here again on exceptions to the refusal of the trial judge to grant a nonsuit, and to the overruling of a motion for a new trial, based on the general grounds alone.

It is never necessary to pass upon a refusal to grant a nonsuit where the record contains the exception that the verdict as finally rendered is without evidence to support it, since the latter exception raises the whole question more adequately than an exception to the overruling of a motion for nonsuit would present it. Even if the motion for nonsuit were well taken at the time it was made, and was therefore improperly overruled, yet if the subsequent testimony cured the deficiency in the plaintiff's proof, the judgment would not be reversed because the court refused to grant the nonsuit at the time the motion was made. On the other hand, if the subsequent testimony did not cure the deficiency, a verdict in favor of the plaintiff would be without evidence to support it, and would be set aside on that ground; so there is never any need to except to the refusal of a nonsuit, where the case has resulted in a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, and the defendant has excepted to the verdict on the ground that it is without evidence to support it.

The evidence in this case is conflicting as to almost every material question of fact; but construing it most favorably to the plaintiff, it will support the verdict. This court has no power to interfere with the action of the jury and of the trial judge upon the mere question of fact involved.

Judgment affirmed.

WELLS v. STATE. (No. 1,791.)

MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 67*)—FRAUDULENT BREACH OF CONTRACT—STATUTORY PROVISIONS.

The conviction in this case is utterly contrary to the law and the evidence.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Reidsville; C. L. Morgan, Judge.

Jasper Wells was convicted of procuring money and supplies on a contract to perform services with intent to defraud, in violation of Act Aug. 15, 1903 (Acts 1903, p. 90), and he brings error. Reversed.

H. C. Beasley, for plaintiff in error. H. H. Elders, Sol., for the State.

POWELL, J. The defendant was charged with cheating and swindling under the act of 1903 (Acts 1903, p. 90). The state's contention, supported by the testimony of the prosecutor, was that the defendant contracted with the prosecutor to work for him as an ordinary farm laborer at $16 per month until he should pay and return to him the sum of $30.85, which the prosecutor had paid to another person at the defendant's request; that in addition to paying this $30.85 the defendant was to work on until he had repaid all advances that the prosecutor might make him in the meantime. The defendant went to work, and worked 3 months and 6 days, and then moved away. At the time he left the prosecutor's place the defendant still owed him the $30.85, after crediting him with his wages, and also owed a balance of $16.66 for supplies advanced to him pending the performance of the labor.

If we should hold that the act of 1903 covered such a transaction as this, no court having jurisdiction to do so would hesitate to declare the act unconstitutional and void, for its repugnancy to the federal Constitution and the peonage statutes enacted thereunder, as well as for its repugnancy to our own state Constitution. It has been held, too often to require the citation of any authority, that this statute is applicable only where the cheating and swindling has been accomplished through the fraudulent procurement of money, under a definite contract of employment. It may be that under the testimony in the record the contract between the prosecutor and the defendant as to the time of its beginning is definite enough; but when was it to end? The defendant was to work until he repaid not only the $30.85, but also all further advances. After three months had elapsed, the defendant owed the $30.85 and also $16.66 more; and at this rate the defendant, though he were a young man at the beginning, and though he might live to the ripest old age, would go down to his grave with his contract still unperformed. Under every decision rendered by this court and by the Supreme Court upon the application of this statute, the defendant is not guilty.

LAMPTON v. CEDARTOWN CO.
(No. 1,520.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. May 4, 1909.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 315*)—INDEPENDENT CONTRACTOR—NEGLIGENCE.

One who employs an independent contractor to do a specific piece of work, not in itself unlawful, is not liable for an injury caused by a casual act of negligence of the contractor while the work is in progress.

2. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 318*)—INDEPENDENT CONTRACTOR—LIABILITY OF OWNER.

The fact that the owner of a building to be constructed furnishes to the contractor the material for the building, or stipulates in the contract that the work of constructing the building shall be performed by the contractor according to plans and specifications of an architect, and to the satisfaction of the engineer of the owner, does not make the latter liable for an injury resulting proximately and solely from a negligent act of the contractor in the work of construction.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 1257, 1258; Dec. Dig. § 318.*]

3. NEGLIGENCE OF INDEPENDENT CONTRACTOR.

The evidence for the plaintiff clearly showed a case of employer and independent contractor, and a tort for which the latter, if any one, was liable. The judgment of nonsuit was therefore properly awarded.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Polk County; T. A. Irwin, Judge.

Action by Ella Lampton against the Cedartown Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Ella Lampton sued the Cedartown Company for damages on account of personal injuries. At the conclusion of her evidence the court awarded a nonsuit, and this judgment is assigned as error. Briefly stated, the evidence makes the following case:

While the plaintiff was walking on the sidewalk of Main street in the city of Cedartown a piece of lumber fell from the top of a building in course of construction and owned by the defendant, not striking her, but causing her, in order to avoid injury therefrom, to make a sudden jump and to fall against a pile of brick, from which she received the injuries complained of. The building was being erected by two separate contractors for the defendant. One of these contractors was to do the woodwork, and the other the brickwork. The piece of lumber which fell was described as a "scantling," which the contractor for the brickwork and one of his employes were using as a "straight edge," and at the time that it fell these two men were using it in their work; one having one end of it and the other the other end. The contracts for the erection of the building were in writing, and provided that the contractors, for a stipulated sum, were to furnish all the labor and tools and to do all the work in the construction of the building in a most thorough and workmanlike manner, and according to plans and specifications prepared by the architect and to the satisfaction of the engineer of the defendant. It further provided that the contractors were to take all precautions required by the city authorities to protect the public from injury, and were to be responsible for any and all damages occurring to passers-by resulting from the neglect of such precautions and care. The engineer testified, for the plaintiff, that all the work of erecting the building was done under the two contracts in question, and that he had no connection with the work, except to see that it was done according to the plans and specifications of the architect.

Wm. Janes and Janes & Hutchens, for plaintiff in error. C. R. Turner and Trawick & Ault, for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. (after stating the facts as above). The general and well-settled principle of law that where one person employs another by contract to do a particular piece of work, reserving to himself no control over the manner in which the work is to be performed, except that when completed it shall comply with certain plans and specifications prepared by an architect, he is not liable for any injury which may occur to others by reason of any negligence of the contractor, has been adopted as statute law of this state. Civ. Code 1895, § 3818, provides as follows: "The employer generally is not responsible for torts committed by his employé when the latter exercises an independent business, and in it is not subject to the immediate direction and control of the employer." In other words, a person who employs an independent contractor to perform a specified piece of work is not liable for injuries caused by any mere casual tort which the latter's servants may commit while the work is in progress. The application and limits of this doctrine are to be determined by the particular facts of each case.

Independence of control in employing workmen and in selecting the means of doing the work is the test usually applied by the courts to determine whether a contractor is an independent one or not, and this is the test applied by the statute of this state, supra. The test has never been better expressed than by Wood in his work on Master and Servant (section 593): "When a person lets out work to another to be done by him, such person to furnish the labor and the contractee reserving no control over the work or workmen, the relation of contractor and contractee exists, and not that of master and servant, and the contractee is not liable for the negligent or improper execution of the work by the contractor." This does not mean that the specific work to be done shall not be done according to definite plans and specifications of the employer, or that he may not reserve, through the direction of an architect or an agent, a general supervision, to see that the work is properly done according to plans and specifications, provided the methods and instruments of doing the specific work are left under the exclusive control of the contractor.

It is contended in this case that the work was not to be done by an independent contractor, because the owner of the building furnished the material for its construction, and that the work was to be done according to the plans and specifications of the architect and to the satisfaction of the engineer of the owner; in other words, that by these stipulations the owner of the building in question reserved the right to exercise control over the details of the work in question. The injury in this case had no connection with any material that was used, but was purely a casual act of negligence occurring in the course of construction, when the contractor had absolute and entire control of the work. In nearly all cases of independent contractors the owner or proprietor usually retains control by a skilled architect, "not for the purpose of controlling the contractor in his methods, but for the purpose of assuring himself that the results enumerated in the specifications of the contract are reached by the contractor step by step as the work progresses." 2 Thompson on Negligence, § 41.

Nor did the fact that the contract in this case required that the work was to be done to the satisfaction of the engineer of the defendant make the case one of master and servant. Certainly, it would not prevent one from being an independent contractor that the stipulation in his contract required that his work be done to the satisfaction of the contractee or employer. The Supreme Court of this state has in several cases made an application of the principle of law now under discussion to particular facts. See Harrison v. Kiser, 79 Ga. 588, 4 S. E. 320; Atlanta & Florida R. Co. v. Kimberly, 87 Ga. 161, 13 S. E. 277, 27 Am. St. Rep. 231; Ridgeway v. Downing Co., 109 Ga. 591, 34 S. E. 1028. And it deduces from all the cases this general rule, which, after all is but a judicial interpretation and elaboration of the principle announced in section 3818 of the Civil Code of 1895: "Where an individual or corporation contracts with another individual or corporation exercising an independent employment, for the latter to do a work not in itself unlawful or attended with danger to others, such work to be done according to the contractor's own methods and not subject to the employer's control or orders, except as to results to be obtained, the employer is not liable for the wrongful or negligent acts of the contractor or the contractor's servants." See, also, Johnson v. W. & A. R. Co., 4 Ga. App. 131, 60 S. E. 1023. And in the case of Atlanta & Florida R. Co. v. Kimberly, supra, after stating this general rule, the court enumerates and defines the exceptions which are now embodied in section 3819 of the Civil Code of 1895.

It is not pretended that the facts of the present case bring it within any of the enumerated exceptions to the rule. The principle of law is so well settled that we deem it entirely profitless to extend this discussion. We think the facts clearly show that this was a case of an independent contractor, and that the judgment awarding a nonsuit should be sustained.

Judgment affirmed.

Where testatrix devised her estate to her husband for life, with remainder to her niece, provided she lived with the husband until she became free by age or marriage, the devise was not defeated because, on account of the insanity of the husband, his admission to an asylum, and the breaking up of his home, the niece was without her fault, and contrary to her will, compelled to leave.

Appeal from Superior Court, Cleveland County; Justice, Judge.

Special proceeding by Ursulla Lynch and others against Ralph Melton and others for the sale for partition of certain land. From the judgment, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Ryburn & Hoey, for appellants. Quinn & Hamrick, for appellees.

CLARK, C. J. By consent the judge found the facts which may be succinctly stated as follows: The testatrix, wife of J. D. Simmons, was childless and took her orphan niece, L. E. Melton, to live with her at the age of four years on the death of the latter's mother. When the child had reached 10, the testatrix died, leaving a will with the following clause therein: "I give and devise to my beloved husband J. D. Simmons, the tract of land on which we now reside, containing 33 acres of land and also all my personal effects of whatsoever character, for his special benefit during his natural life, then to go to my niece L. E. Melton, if anything left at his death, provided she lives with her said uncle until she becomes free by age or marriage, otherwise to go as the law directs." After the death of the testatrix the little girl continued to live with her uncle a few months, when he evinced symptoms of insanity, and, being conscious of it, he asked her father to take the child to his home in Oklahoma, which he did. The child was willing and anxious to stay with her uncle, but it was unsafe to remain and he had decided to break up his home. Soon after he was admitted to the insane asylum, and died something over two years after the testatrix.

A will must be so construed as to effectuate the evident intent of the testator. Here the child was evidently the object of the testatrix's bounty, and the just construction of the clause of the will above quoted is that she devised a life estate in the land to her husband with a vested remainder in fee to her niece, defeasible if she voluntarily failed to live with her uncle until she became married or of age. Without her fault and contrary to her will, she was compelled to leave by the insanity of her uncle, and his determination to break up his home, and at the uncle's request the child was removed by her father to his own home. His honor properly held that the fee was vested in remainder in L. E. Melton expectant upon the death of the life tenant, and had not been divested. The performance of the condition having become impossible without any fault on the part of the devisee, the condition in the eye of the law was not broken, and there was no defeasance. Woods v. Woods, 44 N. C. 290; Thomas v. Howell, 1 Salk, 170; 1 Inst. 206; Hammond v. Hammond, 55 Md. 575; Merrill v. Merrill, 10 Pick. (Mass.) 511. Where plaintiff, to whom a tract of land was devised upon condition that he should remain with the widow of the testator until her death, was wrongfully ejected from the land by the agent of the widow (who was a devisee of the land of which the plaintiff's was a part), the plaintiff's estate upon the widow's death cannot be defeated upon the ground that the condition was not performed by the plaintiff's not remaining on the plantation until the widow's death. Harris v. Wright, 118 N. C. 422, 24 S. E. 751.

In Finley v. King, 3 Pet. 346, 7 L. Ed. 711, Marshall, C. J., said: "It was admitted in argument, and is certainly well settled, that there are no technical or appropriate words which always determine whether a devise be on a condition precedent or subsequent. The same words have been determined differently, and the question is always a question of intention. If the language of the will shows that the particular clause, or if the whole will shows that the act on which the estate depends must be performed before the estate can vest, the condition is, of course, precedent, and, unless it be performed, the devisee can take nothing. If, on the contrary, the act does not necessarily precede the vesting, and where the estate had previously vested, it will become absolute by the death of such person." Again in the same case he says: "Conditions belong to cases where all means to accomplish the testator's purpose are in his view and being; but when subsequent events change the existing state of things so essentially as to render the performance impossible, for instance, if a devise be made on condition that the devisee consent to marry a particular person, and that person dies, the performance is rendered impossible by the happening of an event subsequently which the testator never contemplated; and, where the estate had previously vested, it will become absolute on the death of such person."

The appellants rely upon Tilley v. King,

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. & Am. Digs. 1907 to date, & Reporter Indexes 109 N. C. 461, 13 S. E. 936, but the facts in that case are not similar to this. There the testator clearly intended to provide support and attention for himself and wife in their declining years, and the devise to his grandson was made to compensate him for his services if he "stays with us until after our death and takes care of us." The devisee P. H. Tilley voluntarily left the wife of the testator about one year after the death of testator and seven or eight years before her death. There was no providential hindrance to his compliance with the prescribed conditions as in the case at bar.

The judgment below is affirmed.

STATE v. DAVIS.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. May 5, 1909.)

1. FALSE PRETENSES (§ 38*)—INDICTMENT—VARIANCE.

There was a variance between the allegations and the proof, in a prosecution for obtaining goods by false pretenses, where the indictment charged that accused, by false and fraudulent representations as to the qualities of a sorrel horse, obtained a claybank mare, etc., and the proof tended to show that the claybank mare was obtained by accused in exchange for a bay saddle horse.

2. FALSE PRETENSES (§ 4*)—"OBTAINING GOODS BY FALSE PRETENSES"—ELEMENTS OF OFFENSE.

To constitute the offense of "obtaining goods by false pretenses" there must have been a false representation of a subsisting fact, which was calculated to deceive, intended to deceive, and which did deceive, and by which one obtained value from another without compensation.

3. FALSE PRETENSES (§ 39*)—BURDEN OF PROOF.

In civil actions for losses from false representations, and in criminal prosecutions founded on the same species of fraud, the burden is upon plaintiff or prosecutor to show, not only the false representation, but also that a reasonable reliance upon its truth induced him to part with his money or property; the only difference in the two cases being as to the quantum of proof.

Geo. W. Wilson, Tillett & Guthrie, O. M. Gardner, and S. B. Sparrow, for appellant. T. W. Bickett, Atty. Gen., for the State.

HOKE, J. The charge in this bill of indictment was, in substance, to the effect that the defendant, by means of false and fraudulent representations in reference to the qualities of a certain sorrel horse, obtained from the prosecutor, G. B. Ford, a claybank mare, in good condition, sound and gentle, and worth $225. The proof on the part of the state tended to show that the claybank mare was obtained by defendant in exchange for a bay "saddle horse," and in reference to this trade there was no charge, or evidence tending to support it, that the exchange was affected by means of false representations. Under the authorities cited there would seem to be a clear case of variance between the allegation and the proof, and the jury should have been so instructed. State v. McWhirter, 141 N. C. 809, 53 S. E. 734; State v. Corbett, 46 N. C. 264.

Apart from this, there was no sufficient evidence presented in the case to sustain a conviction of the offense charged, or to justify the submission of the question to the jury. Considering the proof offered in the light most favorable to the prosecution, it appears that, after the exchange of the mare for the bay horse, the prosecutor, having kept the horse about a week, became dissatisfied and sent him back to defendant's stable, with a message that the horse did not suit, and that he would call to see defendant about it later; that the prosecutor did call, and told defendant that the horse taken in exchange for the mare was not sound, and he wished to set aside the trade. The defendant declined to do this, but offered to let the prosecutor have another horse, if he could suit him, and showed prosecutor one of the horses in the stable. Prosecutor asked defendant if he would guarantee the horse to be sound and all right. Defendant replied he would not, nor would he guarantee any horse in his stable to be sound and all right. Prosecutor replied, "Well, if you won't, you can keep both horses," and started away. Davis then said, "How do you like that sorrel horse there in the wagon?" "Will you guarantee that to be sound and all right?" Defendant replied, "No; I will not guarantee any horse, nor a hair on any horse, I have, to you," and prosecutor replied, "Then I don't want it," and started off. When he had gotten away about 30 yards, defendant said, "If you think the sorrel horse will suit you, I will guarantee him to be sound and all right in every way, and a good worker," and prosecutor said, "Well, then, send it down." The horse was sent, and at dinner time prosecutor went out to his stable to make examination of it, and discovered that it was either blind, or had such deficient eyes that it could not see its way in traveling. On cross-examination prosecutor said that, while not a horse trader, he did trade horses sometimes, and was a fair judge of a horse.

In State v. Phifer, 65 N. C. 321, "this crime of obtaining goods by false pretense is said to exist where there has been a false representation of a subsisting fact, which is calculated to deceive, intended to deceive, and which does deceive, and by which one man obtains value from another without compensation." And this definition, in the same or substantially similar terms, has been approved by us in numerous decisions of the court. Speaking of this offense, and more especially of the requirement that the statement must be "calculated to deceive," in State v. Moore, 111 N. C. 672, 16 S. E. 885, Associate Justice Avery, for the court, said: "As well in civil actions brought to recover of another for losses incurred by false representations, as in criminal prosecutions founded upon the same species of fraud, the burden is on the actor or prosecutor to show, not only the false representation, but that a reasonable reliance upon its truth induced the plaintiff or prosecutor to part with his money or property, the only difference being as to the quantum of proof."

There was evidence on the part of defendant tending to exculpate him entirely from the charge; but, considering the testimony in the light most favorable to the state, we do not think the facts bring the case within the principle of these decisions. Claiming to have been already once deceived by defendant, the prosecutor, standing within a few feet of the horse in question, and after having been twice told that no warranty would be given, without making any examination whatever, directs that the animal be sent to his stables on a guaranty by defendant that the horse is sound and all right, and when the alleged defect is so observable and patent that it was at once noticed as soon as the horse was looked at. It is plain that the prosecutor intended to rely on the pecuniary obligations arising by reason of an express warranty, and that the testimony in no sense presents a case of false representations of a subsisting fact, reasonably relied upon by the prosecutor. We must not be understood as holding that the presence of an express warranty in a horse trade of itself protects one from liability to a criminal prosecution under the statute if the facts otherwise justify it; but a careful consideration of all the facts of this transaction leads to the conclusion that no indictment should be sustained. The case comes under the principle announced and sustained in State v. Moore, supra, and, on the testimony as it now appears, the defendant was entitled to the instruction prayed for: "That if the jury believed the evidence they should render a verdict of not guilty."

New trial.

NORRIS v. LAWS et al.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. May 5, 1909.)

1. WASTE (§ 1*)—NATURE AND ELEMENTS.

Waste is a spoil or destruction, done or permitted, to lands, houses, trees or other corporeal hereditaments by the tenant thereof, to the prejudice of him in reversion or remainder.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waste, Cent. Dig. § 1; Dec. Dig. § 1.*]

2. WASTE (§ 3*)—"VOLUNTARY WASTE."

"Voluntary waste" is active or positive, and consists in some act of destruction or devastation.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waste, Cent. Dig. § 5; Dec. Dig. § 3.*]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 2, p. 1807.]

3. WASTE (§ 3*)—"PERMISSIVE WASTE."

"Permissive waste" is such as is merely permitted by the tenant, and consists in the neglect or omission to do what will prevent injury to the estate or freehold, as, for example, to suffer a house to become decayed for want of proper repair.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waste, Cent. Dig. § 5; Dec. Dig. § 3.*]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 6, p. 5818.]

4. LIFE ESTATES (§ 28*)—WASTE BY LIFE TENANT—QUESTION FOR JURY.

It is for the jury, in an action for waste, to say whether a life tenant of land, in what he has done or omitted, has acted with the same care that a prudent owner of the fee would have exercised had he been in possession, cultivating and using the land for a support or for profit.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Life Estates, Cent. Dig. § 32; Dec. Dig. § 28.*]

5. TRIAL (§ 191*)—INSTRUCTIONS—ASSUMING FACTS IN DISPUTE.

In an action for waste by cutting timber and clearing land, where the evidence was conflicting whether the value of the land was diminished or increased by clearing, a charge that the jury should consider the changed conditions as to the greatly increased value of timber and timber lands in proportion to cleared or farm lands in reaching a conclusion as to the necessity for clearing any part of the premises was erroneous, as assuming that clearing the land diminished its value.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. § 420; Dec. Dig. § 191.*]

6. LIFE ESTATES (§ 13*)—RIGHT TO CUT TIMBER.

The right of a life tenant to clear land sufficient for her support and a reasonable enjoyment of her estate does not depend solely upon the value of the timber land as compared with the value of cleared land; and, while she would ordinarily have no right to cut the timber merely for the purpose of selling it, she may clear the land to the extent that a prudent husbandman would do under the circumstances, if owner of the fee, without being guilty of waste.

Clark, C. J., and Hoke, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Superior Court, Wake County; Neal, Judge.

Action by Rufus Norris against John W.

Laws and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed for new trial.

This action was brought to recover damages for waste alleged to have been committed by the defendant, Lovie Laws, upon the land described in the pleadings. There was evidence, on the part of the plaintiff, tending to show that in 1901 James Norris died owning 86 acres of land, and leaving a will, by which he devised 10 acres to a nephew, subject to the control of testator's wife, Lovie Norris (now Lovie Laws), until said nephew should become of age. He was 17 years of age at the time of the trial. James Norris devised another 10 acres to his brother, subject to the life estate of his widow, and the remainder of the land, 66 acres, he devised to his wife, Lovie Norris, for life, and at her death to his father, Rufus Norris, the plaintiff in this action. The waste is alleged to have been committed upon the 66 acres of land. At the death of James Norris, in May, 1901, there were about 20 acres of land in cultivation, being a part of the 66 acres in which plaintiff had a remainder. The land and the buildings thereon, though old, were in fairly good condition. James Norris made a living for himself and wife on the place. The first year after his death the land was leased by his widow to her father-in-law, the present plaintiff, Rufus Norris, but on account of the heavy rains her tenant did not make much on the land, and paid her very little rent. Afterward the feme defendant leased the land for a bale of cotton per annum, and thereafter worked for wages until some two or three years later, when she was married to her codefendant, John W. Laws, since which time the defendants have been living upon the land of John W. Laws, which is about eight miles distant from the 66 acres of land above described. During the year 1906 the defendants began to cut and remove wood from a portion of the land, and sold the standing timber, which was fit for sawlogs, to one J. H. Weaver, and thereafter cut the timber on 10 or 12 acres of the land, making about 32 acres in all of open land, including 2 or 3 acres "turned out" or abandoned. The timber was cut from 10 or 12 acres in one place, and from 4 acres on another part of the land, some distance away, and the wood was sold by the defendants. The wood so cut was not dead or fallen trees. The 10 or 12 acres cleared were heavily timbered, and were on a hillside near a branch. There was other land just as good and perhaps better, for farming purposes, being level, thinly timbered, and adjoining the body of cleared land, which would require no dyking. The land which was cleared by the defendants had to be dyked to keep it from washing away, and was not a proper clearing for farming purposes, but was about the roughest part of the land. The defendants sold 10 or 12 car loads of cordwood, which was cut on the premises, and was worth about $20 a car, and 58,800 feet of lumber, worth about $2.50 per thousand feet. The timber or wood cut was in excess of what was necessary for farming purposes. The farm had not been properly cultivated since James Norris' death until 1908. The land which was cleared at the time of Norris' death, if it had been properly cultivated, would have supported the widow, who had no children, but since his death it has been injured by poor cultivation, and nothing has been done to restore fertility to the soil, though it was susceptible of improvement. Defendants cultivated a part of the cleared land, sublet a part, and turned out about three acres as "old field," the land thus turned out or abandoned being strong land. If the farm had been properly cultivated, there would have been no need of clearing any of the said land. The former owner, F. M. Norris, had lived and raised a large family on the place by farming, and there was sufficient land already open. The defendants allowed the buildings to fall into decay and the fences about the house to be destroyed. No repairs of any kind were made upon the premises until the spring of 1908 after this suit was brought. The proceeds of sale of wood and timber were used in improving the premises of the defendant, John Laws, and none of it was used in repairs or improvements on the land in question. Defendants contended that this was not so. There was further evidence on the part of the plaintiff, tending to show that cutting the wood and standing timber on the land permanently damaged the premises $200, and that the damage done the premises as a whole amounted to between $200 and $400. The feme defendant told the plaintiff that she intended to have the timber while she was living, as she could not use it after she was dead. There was also evidence on the part of the plaintiff tending to show that the timber is now worth more than the land, and timbered lands more than cleared lands. That all lands, especially timbered lands, owing to the growing scarcity of timber in that vicinity, have greatly risen in value since James Norris' death—that is, from 50 to 150 per cent.—and that a railroad was built shortly before his death and ran within a few hundred yards of the premises. The land was sold for taxes in the year 1905, and was not redeemed by the defendants until after notice from the plaintiff of their default.

There was evidence, on the part of the defendants, tending to show that the clearing was necessary for farm purposes, and was done in good faith; that the land was not damaged thereby, but improved in value, and would rent for more than it did before; that the land was worth more than when James Norris died, as much as $200 or $300 more, that the clearing of the 10 or 12 acres was in a proper place. The lands were worn out and run down by bad methods of farming when James Norris died, and would not produce sufficient crops to support feme defendant, and the two or three acres turned out were worthless, worn out, and wet bottom lands. There was not enough cleared land for the reasonable support of the feme defendant. The buildings and stables have, since this suit was brought, been repaired by the defendants, and are now in as good condition as when Norris died. The crop of 1908 was the best which has been raised on the land since his death, and the farm will sell or rent for more than it would when he died; one witness testifying that it would rent for twice as much, and sell for $300 or $400 more. The 10 or 12 acres on which the timber was cut was cleared in the spring of 1908, and put into cultivation. It was not cultivated immediately after the timber was cut, because it would have required "grubbing," which was costly, and the defendants let the land lie idle for two years for the roots to rot, and then dyked it to prevent washing, and cultivated it. The plaintiff offered evidence tending to prove that the defendants did not intend to cultivate at all, but were cutting and selling wood and timber, and using the proceeds in making improvements on the land of the defendant John Laws, and that the claim that the defendants were clearing the lands for cultivation was an afterthought, and first set up after the institution of this suit.

Exceptions taken by the defendants were to the charge of the court, which were as follows: "(1) If the jury shall find from the evidence that the feme defendant sold timber trees, and used the proceeds of such sale, either cash or lumber, in improving other buildings than those on the premises, and neglected to repair the buildings on the premises described in the complaint, this is waste. (2) If the feme defendant had fire wood or timber cut on the premises, or allowed it to be cut in excess of what was necessary for farm purposes, and sold the same for profit, it is waste unless the wood or timber cut and disposed of was from dead or fallen trees. (3) It is the province of the jury, and it is their duty, to consider the changed conditions as to the greatly increased value of timber and timber lands in proportion to cleared or farm lands, in arriving at a conclusion as to the necessity for clearing any part of the premises. The jury should also consider the growing scarcity of timber and wood, and its increasing value, also the improved methods of farming, the improved methods of improving the fertility of 'old fields' and lands depleted of fertility by long cultivation, in arriving at a conclusion as to what was a proper use of the premises; also, in arriving at a conclusion, the character of the cultivation of said lands since the life estate of the feme defendant vested in her, and whether the same was such as an ordinarily prudent owner of the fee would have used in its cultivation, for exhausting the land by improper tillage is waste. (4) If the life tenant, Lovie Laws, negligently allowed the premises to fall into decay, it would be waste; and this is so even though there was no timber on the place suitable for the purpose of repairing buildings thereon. (5) It is left to you, gentlemen of the jury, to say whether in your 'discretion' the destruction of the timber or giving up a cultivated field in the light of all of the evidence in the case had proved a lasting injury to the inheritance. (6) The defendants would not be liable for mere error in judgment, provided they acted in a prudent manner, exercising that usual good judgment that would be exercised by the ordinarily prudent person under similar circumstances and surroundings; and, touching the question of permitting the buildings to decay and go to waste, the question is as to whether the condition of the buildings was such as that a prudent owner of the fee would have felt that he ought to repair and keep them up in order to prevent permanent injury to the inheritance." The defendants in apt time excepted to each of the instructions given by the court. The following issues were submitted to the jury: "(1) Did defendants commit waste upon the lands in which plaintiff has a remainder? (2) If so, what are plaintiff's damages?" The jury returned as their verdict that the defendants had committed waste upon the premises, and assessed the plaintiff's damages. Judgment was entered upon the verdict for the damages assessed and the forfeiture of the premises, whereupon the defendants appealed.

J. H. Pon, for appellants. B. C. Beckwith, for appellee.

WALKER, J. (after stating the facts as above). The accepted definition of waste is a spoil or destruction, done or permitted, with respect to lands, houses, gardens, trees, or other corporeal hereditaments, by the tenant thereof, to the prejudice of him in reversion or remainder, or, in other words, to the lasting injury of the inheritance. 2 Blk. Com. 281. Voluntary waste is active or positive, and consists in some act of destruction or devastation. Permissive waste is such as is merely permitted by the tenant, and consists in the neglect or omission to do what will prevent injury to the estate or freehold, as, for example, to suffer a house to become decayed for want of proper repair. Black's Dict. p. 1236, and authorities cited. The plaintiff alleges that the inheritance or remainder belonging to him has been damaged by both kinds of waste committed and permitted by the defendants upon the premises in question. We have held that what is a permanent injury to the inheritance must often depend upon the facts and circumstances of the particular case under consideration, and the jury must determine, under proper instructions from the court, whether the tenant for life, in what he has done or omitted to do, has acted with the same care as a prudent owner of the fee would have exercised, if he had been in possession, cultivating and using the land for a support or for profit. Shine v. Wilcox, 21 N. C. 631; King v. Miller, 99 N. C. 583, 6 S. E. 660; Sherrill v. Connor, 107 N. C. 630, 12 S. E. 588, and other authorities therein cited.

The charge in many respects is sustained by the authorities we have cited, but in one respect the court committed an error. The jury were instructed as follows: "It is the province of the jury, and it is their duty, to consider the changed conditions as to the greatly increased value of timber and timber lands in proportion to (as compared with) cleared or farm lands, in arriving at a conclusion as to the necessity for clearing any part of the premises." In this and other parts of the instruction, the court assumed that facts had been established about which the testimony was conflicting. There was evidence that, instead of diminishing the value of the land, the cutting of the timber and clearing the land had enhanced it, and also evidence that cleared land had risen in value more than timbered land. It was misleading, therefore, to assume the contrary to be true, and upon that assumption to base an instruction to the jury which might control them in rendering their verdict. That the error was a material and prejudicial one cannot admit of a doubt. The instruction was erroneous in another respect. The right of the tenant for life to clear land sufficient for her support and a reasonable enjoyment of her estate cannot be made to depend solely upon the value of the timbered land as compared with the value of cleared land, because, if this were true, the tenant for life could not clear any land, or not a sufficient quantity for her support, if the timber cut from it, or the land with the timber standing upon it, is more valuable than the land would be when cleared. She would have no right, at least ordinarily, to cut the timber merely for the purpose of selling it, as is held in the cases we have cited; and, if this cannot be done, and there is not sufficient land already cleared for her support, she could not use the land at all, but must let the trees stand and continue to grow for the benefit of the reversioner or remainderman, if the timbered land is more valuable than if it were cleared. It is very true that there should be a due or proper proportion between timbered and cleared land, such, it is said, as a prudent husbandman would maintain in the use and management of the premises. But this is far from saying that the relative value of timbered and cleared land determines the right of the tenant for life to make additional clearing if, in the exercise of prudence and judgment, it was required for her support and the reasonable enjoyment of her estate. The standard by which the conduct of the life tenant is to be gauged, or the test, as to whether waste has been committed or not is that stated in Sherrill v. Connor (which we now approve), and the cases therein cited. It is the rule of the prudent husbandman, and what he would do, under the circumstances, if owner of the fee. This is quite strict enough in its application, and the life tenant should not be held to too rigid an accountability. Judge Gaston, in Shine v. Wilcox, supra, said it will not do to hold that the clearing of the forest, so as to fit it for the habitation and use of man, is waste; and we add, whether it is or not must depend upon the peculiar facts of any given case, and the finding of the jury thereon, when properly directed by the court under the rule of law we have laid down, and which has been generally adopted by the courts.

The question presented in this case was not confined alone to the relative value of timbered and cleared land, but the jury should have been so instructed as to ascertain the general result in respect to whether there had been a lasting injury to the inheritance, and especially as to how much land the plaintiff was entitled to clear for her reasonable support, in the exercise of that degree of prudence which the careful husbandman would observe in the cultivation and management of the land. It is true that the jury may consider all the facts and circumstances of the case in order to reach a just conclusion, and, among others, the value of timbered and of cleared land may be considered for the purpose of determining whether the clearing had been done in a prudent manner; but we think the instruction, which we have quoted, was too broad, and was calculated to mislead the jury in passing upon the respective rights of the parties. This error was not corrected by any other instruction given by the court. His honor finally brought the case to the true test in his concluding instruction, but it did not reach and remove the error we have pointed out. The question as to whether timbered land was more valuable than cleared land should have been left to the jury for their determination upon the conflicting testimony, without any assumption of the fact that timbered land was the more valuable. This was not an incurable error, but it was not corrected by anything said by the court in the other parts of the charge.

Other errors are assigned, but it is not necessary to discuss them, as the questions raised by these assignments may not again be presented. The case must be submitted to another jury with proper instructions of the court upon the issues and evidence.

New trial.

CLARK, C. J. (dissenting). The charge called in question was an instruction to the jury that they could "consider the changed conditions as to the greatly increased value of timber and timber lands in proportion to cleared or farm lands in arriving at a conclusion as to the necessity for clearing any part of the premises. The jury should also consider the growing scarcity of timber and its increasing value; also the improved methods of farming, the improved methods of improving the fertility of 'old field' and land depleted of fertility by long cultivation; in arriving at a conclusion as to what was a proper use of the premises; also, in arriving at a conclusion, the character of the cultivation of said lands since the life estate of the feme defendant vested in her; and whether the same was such as an ordinarily prudent owner of the fee would have used in its cultivation." It is difficult to see how the judge erred in so charging. He did not assume any facts in regard to which there was conflicting evidence. Nor did he make the reasonable enjoyment of the life estate "depend solely" upon the relative value of timbered and arable land. The learned judge simply placed before the jury, for them to "consider" the surrounding and attendant circumstances, as the jury might find them to be, with the object in view of finding whether or not the conduct of the life tenant was "such as an ordinarily prudent owner of the fee would have used." This conforms to the rule laid down in Sherrill v. Connor, 107 N. C. 630, 12 S. E. 588. What in one age or community under the recognized conditions of agriculture would not be waste, because such as a prudent owner would do with his own, might be waste in another age, or in another community, under changed conditions, because no ordinarily prudent owner would so act. The fact is eminently one for a jury to pass upon.

It would seem that the charge was unobjectionable, and there was no error for which a new trial should be awarded.

HOKE, J., concurs in this dissent.

HAUSER v. WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH CO.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. May 5, 1909.)

1. NEGLIGENCE (§ 121*)—ACTIONS—BURDEN OF PROOF—PROXIMATE CAUSE.

In addition to showing negligence, the burden is on plaintiff to show that such negligence was the proximate cause of his injury, in order to recover therefor.

In an action for delay in delivering a telegram by which plaintiff was prevented from attending his sister's funeral, the burden was on him, not only to show negligent delay in delivery, but that he could not have attended the funeral after receiving the telegram by exercising ordinary diligence; that being essential to a showing that defendant's negligence was the proximate cause of plaintiff's damage.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alexander County; Justice, Judge.

Action by Frank Hauser against the Western Union Telegraph Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed, and new trial ordered.

Armfield & Turner and Tillett & Guthrie, for appellant. J. H. Burke and L. C. Caldwell, for appellee.

WALKER, J. This action was brought to recover damages for mental anguish alleged to have been caused by the negligence of the defendant in transmitting and delivering a telegram informing the plaintiff of his sister's death. It is alleged that by reason of the negligence he was prevented from attending the funeral. The message is as follows: "Rockford, N. C. July 20, 1908. Frank Hauser, Taylorsville, N. C. Gertrude Williams dead. Come at once. A. Hauser." It appears that the plaintiff's sister died at Yadkinville, which is about 10 miles from Rockford. He could have gone by either one of two routes from Taylorsville, where he lived, to Yadkinville: (1) By train from Taylorsville to Statesville, and thence by driving to Yadkinville, a distance of 38 miles. (2) By driving to Wilkesboro from Taylorsville, a distance of 20 miles, and thence by rail to Rockford, and thence by driving to Yadkinville. He did not know that he could have gone to Yadkinville by way of Wilkesboro in time for the funeral, and he did not intend to go after he received the message, as it was delayed, and he thought it was too late for him to reach Yadkinville before the funeral, but he would have gone if the message had been delivered before the train left for Statesville. There was other testimony as to whether the plaintiff had exercised care and diligence in attempting to go to Yadkinville after he received the telegram. The court submitted issues to the jury, which, with the answers thereto, are as follows:

"(1) Did the defendant negligently fail to deliver the telegram as alleged in the complaint? Answer. Yes.

"(2) Could and would the plaintiff have attended the funeral of deceased if the telegram had been delivered in reasonable time? Answer. Yes.

"(3) Notwithstanding the negligence of defendant, if any, could the plaintiff, by the exercise of ordinary diligence, have attended the funeral of deceased? Answer. No.

"(4) What damage, if any, is the plaintiff entitled to recover of defendant? Answer. Two hundred dollars."

Numerous exceptions were taken by the defendant during the trial of the case, but the only one which we think it necessary to consider is the following objection to an instruction of the court, which the plaintiff assigns as error: "The defendant contends that if the said plaintiff had exercised due care and reasonable diligence, such as the law exacts of him, he could have attended said funeral after the said telegram was delivered, and, if you should so find from the evidence, you will answer this issue 'Yes.' (The burden of proof upon this issue is on the defendant.)" The burden of proof was not upon the defendant to show that the plaintiff had not exercised diligence, but upon the plaintiff to show, not only that the defendant had been guilty of negligence, but that its negligence was the proximate cause of the damage to him. Hocutt v. Telegraph Co., 147 N. C. 186, 60 S. E. 980. It is not enough to show that there has been negligence in order to entitle a plaintiff to recover. He must, in addition, show that the defendant's negligence was the proximate cause of his injury. Negligence is not actionable unless it is the proximate cause of the damage. Brewster v. Elizabeth City, 137 N. C. 392, 49 S. E. 885. The burden is always upon the plaintiff to prove every requisite of his cause of action. This is not a question of contributory negligence which would shift the burden of proof to the defendant, but it is one of the essential elements of the cause of action that the negligence of the defendant should proximately cause the damage.

There was error in misplacing the burden of proof by the instruction to which the defendant excepted.

WHITLOCK v. DIXON et al.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. May 5, 1909.)

1. DEEDS (§ 68*)—EVIDENCE—CAPACITY OF PARTIES.

That a grantor was 72 years old, and was engaged to marry the grantee, with whom he boarded, was not evidence of mental unsoundness.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Deeds, Dec. Dig. § 68.*]

2. DEEDS (§ 211*)—UNDUE INFLUENCE—EVIDENCE.

Any burden resting on a grantee to show freedom of the grantor from undue influence was sustained, where she went on the stand and made a full statement of her relations with the grantor, which was sustained by other witnesses, showing no immoral acts on the part of either, and that he boarded with her, a woman of his own station in life, and paid her board, and intended to marry her.

Appeal from Superior Court, Mecklenburg County; Council, Judge.

Action by Fannie Whitlock against J. C. Dixon and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. No error.

Action to recover possession of a lot in the city of Charlotte. It was admitted that, prior to November 30, 1907, the title was in Malachai Reinhardt. Plaintiff claims title by virtue of a deed executed by Reinhardt to her November 30, 1907, and duly recorded. The infant defendants claim as heirs at law, being the children of a deceased daughter. The adult defendant represents the infants, who are his children. The plaintiff introduced the deed, and rested. Defendants alleged that the grantor was mentally unsound when he executed the deed, and that it was obtained from him by fraud and undue influence. The controversy was tried upon the general issue, which the jury answered for plaintiff. Defendants assigned errors, and appealed from the judgment.

W. F. Harding, for appellants. Shannon-house & Jones, for appellee.

CONNOR, J. The evidence tended to show that Reinhardt, at the time he executed the deed, was about 72 years old; that after the death of his wife he resided with his son-in-law in the home which belonged to him; that several years prior to his death he suffered a stroke of paralysis, "but got over it, so that he returned to his work." He "got hurt," in November prior to his death, in the shop in which he worked. Some time prior to the date of the deed he "quit staying" with his son-in-law, Dixon, and stayed at the house of plaintiff, where he died February 3, 1908. There was evidence that he was fond of his grandchildren and frequently said that he was going to provide for them. The deed was dated November 30, 1907, reciting a consideration of $5, and reserving an estate for his own life. On December 9, 1907, Reinhardt executed a will, in which he devised to his grandchildren a lot in Charlotte, worth about $150, giving to plaintiff his other property. The will was drawn and witnessed by a lawyer. Defendants' witnesses testified that Reinhardt was a man of good sense—seemed all right, except that he complained of a "hurting in his head." Plaintiff testified that she was engaged to be married to Reinhardt, and that he proposed to make deed to her for property—said he was going to see a lawyer. He told her that he had made a will—brought her the papers, sealed, and told her, if he died, to take them to Mr. Whitlock, an attorney in Charlotte, as he was executor. He said he was getting old, and had no one to take care of him. Their relations were proper and lawful. One witness said that he had heard reports affecting plaintiff's character. A number of witnesses testified to her good character.

His honor instructed the jury that the burden of proof was upon defendants to show incapacity and undue influence. He further instructed them that there was no evidence that Reinhardt "was not of a sound and disposing mind," or that he did not know what he was doing, when he executed the deed. Defendants assign this for error. We have examined the evidence carefully and concur with his honor. We do not find any suggestion that he was mentally unsound, unless his age and his engaging himself to marry plaintiff be so taken. This we could not do, in the light of human observation and experience. It may not have been a wise step for a man of 72; but he said "he was getting old and had no one to take care of him." This is not an unusual reason given by men in his condition.

His honor, at the request of defendant, instructed the jury that, "if they found from the greater weight of the evidence that the plaintiff exercised such an influence over Reinhardt as to induce him against the free exercise of his own will in executing the deed, they should answer the issue "No." The defendants' contention that, under the decisions of this and other courts, the burden of proof is cast upon the plaintiff, is based upon the assumption that a relationship has been shown to exist between Reinhardt and plaintiff, lawful or otherwise, from which a presumption of control or power over him arose. Such was the case in Westbrook v. Wilson, 135 N. C. 404, 47 S. E. 467. While his honor presented this view to the jury, we think it doubtful whether the evidence sustained it. We do not find any evidence of any improper relations, or certainly, if any, it is very slight, consisting of loose and unsatisfactory declarations. Reinhardt was an old colored man, who had no family, except his son-in-law and his grandchildren. He boarded for awhile with one of the witnesses, and then went to the home of plaintiff, who, it seems, was an ignorant colored woman of his own station in life, and paid her board. There is no contradiction of his purpose to marry her. No immoral act is shown on the part of either. Even if the burden was upon her to explain the circumstances under which the deed was executed, she went upon the stand and made a full statement of her relations with Reinhardt, and was sustained by other witnesses. The jury accepted her evidence as true. He made provision in his will for his grandchildren, by giving them a lot. It does not appear how much his entire property was worth; but it is evident that it did not amount to much. He was a laboring man, making small wages.

We have examined the entire evidence, and find no error in his honor's charge. He followed the decisions of this court, and the jury found that plaintiff's version of the transaction was correct.

There is no error.

BATTLE et al. v. LACY, State Treasurer.
(Supreme Court of North Carolina. May 5, 1909.)

1. STATUTES (§ 15*)—ENACTMENT—READING OF BILLS—"PLEDGE FAITH OF STATE."

Act 1909, authorizing the State Treasurer to deliver to certain persons bonds issued under Act March 4, 1879 (Laws 1879, p. 183, c. 98), in discharge of an indebtedness, does not "pledge the faith of the state," within Const. art. 2, § 14, providing that no law shall be passed to pledge the faith of the state, unless the bill therefor shall have been read three times in each House of the General Assembly.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Statutes, Cent. Dig. § 12; Dec. Dig. § 15.*]

2. STATUTES (§ 15*)—READING OF BILLS—"PLEDGING FAITH OF STATE."

For the General Assembly to order the State Treasurer to pay a debt with money is not "pledging the faith of the state," within Const. art. 2, § 14, relating to the reading of bills.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Statutes, Cent. Dig. § 12; Dec. Dig. § 15.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Wake County; Lyon, Judge.

Controversy between R. H. Battle and another against B. R. Lacy, State Treasurer, submitted without action. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Attorney General Bickett, for appellant. Walter Clark, Jr., and Jas. H. Pou, for appellees.

BROWN, J. At the session of 1909 the General Assembly enacted a law intended to be in full settlement of a claim of the estate of David L. Swain against the state, which has been the subject of negotiation between the estate of the late Governor Swain and the state authorities for many years. This settlement has been accepted by the representatives of said estate, but the Treasurer refuses to deliver the bonds called for because the act was not passed in accordance with article 2, § 14, of the Constitution, providing that: "No law shall be passed to raise money on the credit of the state or to pledge the faith of the state, directly or indirectly, for the payment of any debt, * * * unless the bill for the purpose shall have been read three several times in each House of the General Assembly and passed three several readings, which readings shall be on three different days and agreed to by each House, respectively, and unless the yeas and nays on the second and third readings shall have been entered on the journal." The act in question reads as follows:

"Section 1. That the State Treasurer be and he is hereby authorized and directed to deliver to the said Walter Clark and Richard Battle, executors of Eleanor H. Swain, deceased, thirty-five hundred dollars ($3,500), par value, of the four per cent. bonds of this state, of the series issued under the act of March 4, 1879, with interest coupons attached only from the ratification of this act. This payment is to be in full satisfaction and discharge of said indebtedness.

"Sec. 2. This act shall be in force from and after its ratification.

"In the General Assembly read three times, and ratified this 6th day of March, A. D. 1909."

From the facts agreed it appears that the act of March 4, 1879 (Laws 1879, p. 183, c. 98), was enacted in strict accordance with the section of the Constitution above cited, and that the bonds referred to in the act of 1909 are bonds heretofore issued under the act of 1879 and purchased by the State Treasurer as a cash investment and carried as treasury bonds or cash and not canceled. It appears also that, since the Legislature of 1879 authorized the issue of certain bonds, it has been customary for the Treasurer to buy and sell the said bonds, as the condition of the treasury might require, and from time to time certain of said bonds have been repurchased and held in the treasury, and the same were available for resale or for such other disposition as might be made of them by the General Assembly, that the General Assembly of 1887 directed that the claim due the estate of the Rev. Solomon Pool be settled and discharged by the delivery of certain of said bonds, and the said debt was so discharged by the delivery of the same, and other claims against the state or departments of the state government have been liquidated by the delivery of bonds in like manner. Upon these facts it would seem that the act of 1909 does not raise money on the credit of the state and does not pledge the faith of the state. The act simply directs the payment of the sum agreed upon out of the cash assets of the treasury, and does not create a new debt. The bonds in question are not due and have never been canceled. They are negotiable securities in daily circulation. It is not "pledging the faith of the state" for the General Assembly to order the State Treasurer to pay a debt with money. Upon the same principle, it is not "pledging the faith of the state" for the General Assembly to order the State Treasurer to pay a debt by delivering over some of these bonds, previously issued, in lieu of money.

These bonds having been legally issued, the faith of the state is pledged absolutely until they mature and are redeemed by the state. And if any of these bonds, by any means, come into the possession of any department of the state, they are subject to such disposal as the General Assembly may order, as much so as any other property in the possession of that department. While, of course, the State Treasurer has no power to invest his surplus cash in other bonds and securities, there can be no reasonable objection to his investing it temporarily in the state's own obligations which have not matured for the purpose of saving interest and holding the same as cash assets to be reconverted into money or paid out as such, as the exigencies of the state require. At least such has been the custom, and in accordance with that custom the bonds covered by the act of 1909 are held in the treasury as so much cash.

The judgment is affirmed.

CLARK, C. J., took no part in the decision of this case.

BAKER v. SEABOARD AIR LINE RY.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. May 5, 1909.)

1. RAILROADS (§ 278*)—DEATH OF INFANT LICENSEE ON WORK TRAIN — CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

Where a boy of 14 was permitted to ride on the rear flat car of a work train, and, while it was running at 30 miles an hour, suddenly and voluntarily jumped off and was killed, he was guilty of contributory negligence barring recovery for his death if he can be held responsible in law for his conduct.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. §§ 898, 899; Dec. Dig. § 278.*]

2. RAILROADS (§ 278*) — DEATH IN JUMPING FROM TRAIN — RESPONSIBILITY OF INFANT LICENSEE.

The responsibility of a boy of 14 killed in jumping from a rapidly moving train on which he was allowed to ride is not to be judged by the length of his experience with railroads.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. § 899; Dec. Dig. § 278.*]

3. NEGLIGENCE (§ 122*)—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—PRESUMPTION AS TO INFANT'S CAPACITY.

An infant of 14 is presumed to have sufficient capacity to be sensible of danger and power to avoid it, and this presumption stands till rebutted by clear proof of absence of the discretion usual to that age.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Negligence, Cent. Dig. § 223; Dec. Dig. § 122.*]

4. NEGLIGENCE (§ 136*)—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—COMMENCEMENT OF INFANT'S RESPONSIBILITY—QUESTION OF LAW OR FACT.

At what age an infant is presumed to have sufficient capacity to be sensible of danger and power to avoid it is not a question of fact, but of law, and the inquiry as to at what age his responsibility for negligence must be presumed to commence cannot be referred to the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Negligence, Cent. Dig. § 348; Dec. Dig. § 136.*]

5. NEGLIGENCE (§ 85*)—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—CARE AND PRUDENCE REQUIRED OF INFANTS.

An infant is held to the care and prudence usual among children of the same age, and if directly injured by his own act, while negligence of another is only such as to expose him to possibility of injury, he cannot recover.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Negligence, Cent. Dig. § 123; Dec. Dig. § 85.*]

6. NEGLIGENCE (§ 136*)—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—DISCRETION OF INFANT—WEIGHT OF REBUTTAL EVIDENCE—QUESTION FOR JURY.

The weight of evidence to rebut the presumption of discreet judgment of an infant over 14 years of age is for the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Negligence, Cent. Dig. § 348; Dec. Dig. § 136.*]

7. RAILROADS (§ 278*)—DEATH OF INFANT LICENSEE—MOTIVE IN JUMPING FROM TRAIN—MATERIALITY.

In determining liability for the death of a boy who recklessly jumped from a rapidly moving train on which he was permitted to ride, his motive in so doing is immaterial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Dec. Dig. § 278.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Anson County; Long, Judge.

Action by C. A. Baker, administrator of Carl Baker, deceased, against the Seaboard Air Line Railway. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

John D. Shaw and Murray Allen, for appellant. Robinson & Caudle and L. Medlin, for appellee.

BROWN, J. The defendant in apt time entered motions to nonsuit upon the ground that upon plaintiff's own evidence he is not entitled to recover: (1) Because no negligence is shown; (2) because the intestate was guilty of contributory negligence. We are all of opinion that this last contention is so plainly with the defendant that it is unnecessary to consider the first.

These facts appear from plaintiff's evidence: His son, Carl, 15 years of age lacking one month, was killed by jumping from defendant's work train while running about 80 miles an hour. The train consisted of flat cars, equipped with machinery for ditching. Witnesses for plaintiff, who testify concerning the occurrence, say that on the afternoon of August 15, 1906, the boy Carl and his younger brother, Luther Baker, came up to the train from their home, about three-quarters of a mile away. When they arrived at the train, Herman Shannon, another boy, was standing on a flat car. Carl Baker asked the conductor if he could ride, and the conductor told him to get on the rear end of the train on a flat car out of the way. Carl then climbed up on the flat car and pulled his younger brother up with him. The train continued the work of ditching. The boys remained on the car an hour. It became necessary for the train to take a siding to let another train pass going towards Monroe. After this train passed, the ditching train pulled out for Waxhaw, two miles away. When the train had gotten up good speed and was running at rate of about 30 miles an hour, Carl Baker got up from where he was sitting on a scantling and sat down on the rear of the flat car and jumped off between the rails. Herman Shannon, who was on the car with plaintiff's intestate, testified that he remained on the train in the position occupied by himself and Carl Baker until it reached Waxhaw, without injury to himself. This witness was nearly a year younger than Carl Baker. According to the testimony of the plaintiff, his son Carl was an "intelligent, smart boy, and of average size for his age," and for two years had been residing within three-quarters of a mile from the railroad.

It is settled beyond controversy by the decisions of this and all other courts in this country that the act of the intestate in jumping off the rapidly moving train of defendant was one of such recklessness as will bar recovery, if the intestate is held in law responsible for his conduct. Owens v. Railroad, 147 N. C. 357, 61 S. E. 198; Morrow v. Railroad, 134 N. C. 92, 46 S. E. 12. The learned counsel for plaintiff, Mr. Caudle, in an able and elaborate argument, endeavored to show that the intestate, on account of his age, should not be held responsible for his act; but an examination of the authorities in this and other states discloses that they are overwhelmingly against him. The case is not to be judged by the length of experience of the boy Carl with railroads, although the evidence discloses that for two years he had resided near one, and that his 12 year old brother, Luther, is by no means a stranger to them. Carl wore long trousers, was well grown, bright, smart, and intelligent. He was not an infant of tender years, and, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, had the capacity of an adult to appreciate danger. He was three years beyond the age at which he could be employed in a factory, around dangerous machinery, without violating the child labor law, and was old enough to be held responsible for a violation of the criminal law of the land.

An infant of the age of 14 years is presumed to have sufficient capacity to be sensible of danger and to have power to avoid it, and this presumption will stand until rebutted by clear proof of the absence of such discretion as is usual with infants of that age. At what age this presumption arises is not a question of fact, but one of law. The inquiry at what age must an infant's responsibility for negligence be presumed to commence cannot be answered by referring it to a jury. That would furnish us with no rule whatever. It would simply produce a shifting standard, according to the sympathies or prejudices of those who composed each particular jury. One jury might fix the age at 14, and another at 18, and another at 20. The responsibilities of infants are clearly defined by text-writers and courts. At common law 14 was the age of discretion in males and 12 in females. At 14 an infant could choose a guardian and contract a valid marriage. After 7 an infant may commit a felony, although there is a presumption in his favor, which may, however, be rebutted; but after 14 an infant is held to the same responsibility for crime as an adult. Sharswood's Blackstone, vol. 1, pp. 20, 435, 404. Inasmuch as an infant, after 14, may select a guardian, contract marriage, is capable of harboring malice and of committing murder, it is no great imposition on him to hold him responsible for his own negligence. In the case of Tucker v. Railroad, 124 N. Y. 308, 26 N. E. 916, 21 Am. St. Rep. 670, the Court of Appeals of New York says: "The question at what age an infant's responsibility for negligence may be presumed to commence is not one of fact, but of law. In the absence of evidence tending to show that a boy 12 years of age was not qualified to understand the danger and appreciate the necessity for observing that degree of caution in crossing a railroad track an adult would, he must be deemed sui juris and chargeable with the same measure of caution as an adult." To same effect is Nagle v. Railroad, 88 Pa. 35, 32 Am. Rep. 413. That infants are to be held for the consequences of their own negligence in actions for injuries to them has long been settled by this and other courts and so declared by text-writers. Shearman & Red. Neg. § 49; Wharton on Neg. 314; Manly v. Railroad, 74 N. C. 635; Murray v. Railroad, 93 N. C. 94; Railroad v. Gladmon, 15 Wall. 401, 21 L. Ed. 114; Railroad v. Stout, 17 Wall. 657, 21 L. Ed. 745. From all these and other approved authorities the principle is deduced that an infant, so far as he is personally concerned, is held to such care and prudence as is usual among children of the same age, and if his own act directly brings the injury upon him, while the negligence of the defendant is only such as exposes the infant to the possibility of an injury, the latter cannot recover.

The Supreme Court of the United States has substantially held the same to be sound law in the cases above cited.

We find in the books many cases where children of various ages from seven years upwards have been denied a recovery because of their own negligence. Boland v. Railroad, 36 Mo. 484; Meeks v. Railroad, 52 Cal. 605; Cauley v. Railroad, 4 Am. &

Eng. R. R. Cas. 533; Mathis v. Mfg. Co., 140 N. C. 530, 53 S. E. 349; Murray v. Railroad, supra; Beck v. Railroad, 149 N. C. 163, 62 S. E. 883. In Meredith v. Railroad, 108 N. C. 616, 13 S. E. 137, the plaintiff, a bright boy about 13 years old, while passing along the highway, was struck and injured by an engine while attempting to avoid another coming from the opposite direction. The court held that his administrator was not entitled to recover for his death. Judge Avery says: "The witnesses concur in the statement that the boy who was injured was an intelligent youth about 13 years old. In the absence of knowledge or information to the contrary, the engineer was justified in supposing that he would look to his own safety, even when trains were moving on three parallel tracks, if there was manifestly an opportunity to escape by walking across the railway to a neighboring side track." Again, he says: "The boy injured was described by witnesses as being bright and 'smart'; but, if he was apparently capable of appreciating his peril or his situation, it is sufficient to relieve the servants of the company from the imputation of carelessness in assuming that he would step aside before the engine reached him."

This principle has been applied in other states regardless of whether the child was over the age of 14 years. In Dull v. Railroad, 21 Ind. App. 571, 52 N. E. 1013, it is held that a child 11 years old and of sufficient intelligence to know the difference between safety and danger is a person sui juris so as to be charged with contributory negligence resulting in his being struck by a train. "A boy of 11 years of age knows as well as an adult does what a railroad is and the use to which it is put and the consequence to a person who should be struck by a passing train, and knows that he should not stop to play and lounge amid a network of tracks. It is true that a boy of that age cannot be presumed to have the judgment of an adult, but it does not require much judgment to keep from walking in dangerous places, the dangers of which are fully understood." Masser v. Railroad, 68 Iowa, 602, 27 N. W. 776. Also, Powers v. Railroad, 57 Minn. 332, 59 N. W. 307. In Mendenhall v. Railroad, 66 Kan. 438, 71 Pac. 846, 61 L. R. A. 120, 97 Am. St. Rep. 380, a 15 year old boy paid a brakeman on a passenger train 25 cents to permit him to ride on the train. The brakeman told him to get on the platform of the baggage car and to get off at stopping places and keep out of sight. The plaintiff rode upon the platform to a nearby station and in getting off the train while in motion on the opposite side from the depot stumbled over a semaphore board, fell under the train, and received the injury complained of. The demurrer to the complaint was sustained. The court says: "That he was a trespasser not a passenger. The company owed him no duty in regard to the construction of its semaphore, or otherwise, except to avoid willful and wanton negligence. The plaintiff was injured not because he was riding on the platform, but because he got off the train while in motion and on the opposite side of the car from the depot. The allegation is insufficient to show the defendant to have been guilty of any willful or wanton negligence or to relieve the plaintiff from the responsibility of his own wanton recklessness." The Massachusetts court holds that: "A street railway corporation is not liable for an injury caused to a boy 10 years old who was when injured playing with other children upon a car left without guard for several days on a public street of a city." Gay v. Railway Co., 159 Mass. 238, 34 N. E. 186, 21 L. R. A. 448, 38 Am. St. Rep. 415. In Studer v. Railroad, 121 Cal. 400, 53 Pac. 942, 66 Am. St. Rep. 39, recovery was denied in an action for death of a child between 12 and 13 years of age who was killed in attempting to pass between the cars of a freight train. The court says: "The fact that deceased was only about 12 years of age did not require the court to submit to the jury whether his attempt to pass between the cars constituted negligence. The law imposes upon minors the duty of giving such attention to their surroundings and care to avoid danger as may reasonably be expected in persons of their age and capacity, and children as well as adults must use discretion which persons of their years ordinarily have, and cannot be permitted with impunity to indulge in conduct which they know or ought to know to be reckless." In Sheets v. Railway Co., 54 N. J. Law, 518, 24 Atl. 483, an intelligent child 13 years old was struck by a street car while crossing a public street. Recovery was denied. The court says: "The trial judge laid down the rule of law with respect to her responsibility with substantial accuracy. She was evidently sul juris, and the jury were told to consider the degree of care and discretion which would be expected from her. The jury found by their verdict that she was not guilty of contributory negligence; in other words, she was at the time of the occurrence in the exercise of that degree of care which would reasonably be expected from a child of that age and intelligence."

This presumption of discreet judgment which arises after 14 years of age must stand until it is overthrown by clear proof of the absence of such natural intelligence as is usual with infants of similar age. If such evidence is offered by the plaintiff to rebut such presumption, its weight and value are for the jury to estimate. In this case the plaintiff does not attempt to rebut such presumption, nor does he offer even a suggestion that the engineer, after he started his train, caused the injury, or could have prevented it.

The intestate was sitting on the rear end of the last flat car while it was moving at great speed and suddenly and voluntarily jumped off and was instantly killed. What his motive was in so doing is immaterial. The conclusion is irresistible that had the intestate imitated the wholesome example of his more youthful yet more prudent companion, who sat beside him, and had gone on the short distance to Waxhaw, he would have easily returned to his home in safety.

The motion to nonsuit is allowed. Hollingsworth v. Skelding, 142 N. C. 252, 55 S. E. 212.

BOOKER v. ELLER et al.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. May 5, 1909.)

JUDGMENT (§ 256*)—CONFORMITY TO VERDICT.

Where, in an action on a note against two defendants, the jury finds that the note was procured from one of the defendants by fraudulent representations of the plaintiff, but was not so procured from the other defendant, it is not error for the court to refuse to sign a judgment tendered by defendants to the effect that plaintiff was not entitled to recover as to the latter.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. §§ 446-454; Dec. Dig. § 256.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Wilkes County; Justice, Judge.

Action by C. J. S. Booker against H. C. Eller, Jr., and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Finley & Hendren, for appellants. W. W. Barber, for appellee.

WALKER, J. This action was brought to recover the amount of one of a series of notes executed by H. C. Eller, Jr., and his father, H. C. Eller, Sr., to the plaintiff. The defendants admitted the execution of the notes and alleged that they were procured by fraudulent representations made by the plaintiff. We need not inquire whether the fraud is sufficiently pleaded, as we are of the opinion that there was no error committed by the court in its refusal to sign the judgment tendered by the defendants in rendering the judgment which appears in the record.

The note in controversy is as follows: "$4.00. Wilkesboro, N. C., May 31, 1901. August 20, 1901, after date, I promise to pay to the order of C. J. S. Booker eighty-four dollars. Value received. H. C. Eller, Jr. H. C. Eller, Sr." The court submitted certain issues to the jury, which, with the answers thereto, are as follows: "(1) were the notes sued upon procured from H. C. Eller, Jr., by the false and fraudulent representations of the plaintiff?" Answer: "Yes." "(2) Were the notes sued upon procured from H. C. Eller, Sr., by the false and fraudulent representations of the plaintiff?" to which the jury, under instructions of the court, answered "No."

It will be seen that the jury found in favor of the defendant H. C. Eller, Jr., and against the defendant H. C. Eller, Sr. The defendant H. C. Eller, Sr., by his counsel, tendered a judgment to the effect that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover as to him upon the verdict. The judge refused to sign the judgment, but signed a judgment as above set forth. The defendant H. C. Eller, Sr., did not request the court to give any instructions to the jury so far as appears in the case, although he relied, in argument, upon the defense that he was a surety for his son, H. C. Eller, Jr., and if the note is void as to him, as principal, it is also void as to H. C. Eller, Sr., as surety. The evidence as to whether H. C. Eller, Sr., was merely a surety is vague and unsatisfactory. Upon the face of the note, he appears to be a principal, but we need not complicate a simple case by any consideration of this question. We are restricted to the assignments of error. The jury have found that H. C. Eller, Sr., was a principal, and, as to him, there was no fraud. There is not a particle of evidence that he was influenced by any fraudulent representation to sign the note, even if, in the state of the record, we are permitted to go behind the verdict. It all comes to this: That the jury have found that H. C. Eller, Sr., made a valid contract to pay the plaintiff the sum of money which he claims in this action, and we are unable to see why, upon the verdict, he is not entitled to judgment.

No error.

WILLIAMS v. UNITED STATES CASUALTY CO.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. May 5, 1909.)

INSURANCE (§ 539*)—SICK BENEFITS—TIME OF NOTICE.

There can be no recovery under a sick benefit policy providing that notice of sickness must be given within 10 days after the contraction of the disease insured against where no notice is given until 50 days thereafter.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. § 1333; Dec. Dig. § 539.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Wilkes County; Justice, Judge.

Action by A. B. Williams against the United States Casualty Company on a sick benefit policy. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. No error.

F. D. Hackett and Finley & Hendren, for appellant. W. W. Barber, for appellee.

CLARK, C. J. The plaintiff seeks to recover on a sick benefit policy. The policy promises a payment of $8 a week, not exceeding 26 consecutive weeks, for loss of time from illness, if caused exclusively and directly by any one of certain diseases specifically named. Then follows the following provision in the policy: "Provided such disease is contracted not earlier than 15 days after this policy takes effect and independently of any and all other causes, renders the insured wholly and continuously unable to transact each and every part of the duties pertaining to the occupation described herein and necessitates continuous confinement indoors and treatment by a regularly qualified physician, and provided written notice of such disease be given by the insured or his attending physician to the company at its office within 10 days after its contraction." It is admitted that the plaintiff did not give the notice in 10 days—in fact, he delayed for 50 days. This provision was doubtless intended to prevent imposition. But, at any rate, the plaintiff accepted the policy with that provision, and he is bound by his contract. He did not comply with the conditions which would entitle him to recover, and his honor properly held that he could not recover. Alexander v. Insurance Co. (at this term) 64 S. E. 432. If one should suddenly become unconscious as from apoplexy, for instance, so as to be unable to give the stipulated notice within 10 days, whether he would be excused and therefore entitled to recover notwithstanding the failure to give notice is a question which does not arise upon the evidence in this case.

No error.

RICHARDSON v. RICHARDSON et al.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. May 5, 1909.)

1. CURTESY (§ 7*)—REQUISITES—"CURTESY CONSUMMATE."

There are four requisites to make a tenancy by the "curtesy consummate": Marriage, seisin, issue, and death of the wife.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Curtesy, Cent. Dig. § 5; Dec. Dig. § 7.*]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 2, p. 1797.]

2. CURTESY (§ 5*)—WHEN VESTED INTEREST—"CURTESY INITIATE."

At common law, a husband did not have a vested interest as tenant by curtesy in lands of which his wife was seised, until the birth of issue, and he then became a tenant by the "curtesy initiate" to a separate estate for his life in his wife's lands, the usufruct of profits of which during that period was exclusively his own property.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Curtesy, Cent. Dig. §§ 11-15; Dec. Dig. § 5.*]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 2, p. 1798.]

3. CURTESY (§ 2*)—MODIFICATION BY CONSTITUTION—PROFITS OF LAND.

Where a wife, having separate property under Const. 1868, art. 10, § 6, providing that property of the wife before marriage shall be her separate property, with power to will it, died with issue born after the adoption of the Constitution, leaving a will disposing of the property to persons other than her husband, the husband had no rights in the property as tenant by curtesy, since his interest before the birth of issue, being contingent, and not vested, could be taken by legislation; and hence rents due under a lease given by both parties belonged to the representative of the wife, and not to the husband.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Curtesy, Cent. Dig. §§ 3, 4; Dec. Dig. § 2.*]

4. HUSBAND AND WIFE (§ 9*)—PROPERTY OF WIFE—INTEREST OF HUSBAND.

Neither did the husband acquire any rights to the rents by virtue of the common-law rule that a husband was seised in right of his wife of a freehold interest during their joint lives, since by Acts 1848, p. 89, c. 41 (Revisal 1905, § 2097), providing that no lands belonging to a wife at time of marriage shall be sold or leased without the consent of the wife, the rule was changed, so that the husband could not assert any interest as against the wife.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Husband and Wife, Cent. Dig. §§ 30-37; Dec. Dig. § 9.*]

5. ACKNOWLEDGMENT (§ 25*)—LEASE BY WIFE—PRIVY EXAMINATION—FAILURE TO TAKE—EFFECT.

Where a lease of lands of the wife is given by husband and wife without a privy examination of the wife, as required by Acts 1848, p. 89, c. 41 (Revisal 1905, § 2097), the lease is void as to the wife, and the husband can acquire by the lease no interest in the rents and profits of the lands.

Appeal from Superior Court, Anson County; Long, Judge.

Action by John S. Richardson against John S. Richardson, Jr., and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

J. A. Lockhart and F. J. Cox, for appellant. Robinson & Caudle, for appellees.

WALKER, J. This action was brought to recover the value of five bales of cotton, which have been sold, the parties agreeing that the proceeds shall be held to await the determination of this case. Judgment was entered for the defendants, and the plaintiff appealed.

The facts are that the plaintiff and Charlotte Leak were married in 1867, she being then seised of land in Anson county, known as the "Brown Creek tract," and containing 878 acres, which is described by its metes and bounds in the record. They had five children, the oldest of them having been born in November, 1868. In December, 1905, the said Charlotte Richardson and her husband leased the land, by a written agreement, for the term of five years to R. J. Beverly, who agreed to deliver, as rent, five bales of cotton on the first day of November of each year during the term. Charlotte Richardson died in October, 1907, leaving a will, by which she devised and bequeathed all of her property and estate to persons other than the plaintiff.

The lessee delivered to Charlotte Richardson, just before her death, 2,004 pounds of cotton, it being part of the rent for the year 1907, and after her death the lessee delivered the remainder of the cotton, in full payment of the rent for that year. The question presented for our consideration is whether the plaintiff, the husband of Charlotte Richardson, or the defendant, John S. Richardson, Jr., her executor, is entitled to receive the proceeds of the sale of the cotton. The plaintiff contends that, by virtue of the marriage and the ownership of the land by his wife, he acquired a vested interest, as tenant by the curtesy initiate, in all crops grown upon the same, without regard to the fact that the first child of the marriage was born after the adoption of the Constitution of 1868, and that he is therefore entitled to the rent due by the terms of the lease; while the defendants assert title to the rent upon the ground that by the Constitution of 1868 the land, with its rents and profits, became the separate property of the wife, the testatrix of the defendant Richardson, as the plaintiff's right or interest in the land, as tenant by the curtesy, was a contingent one until the birth of issue, which occurred after the adoption of the Constitution, and therefore there was no interference with any vested right of the plaintiff by the provision of that instrument that the property of the wife, acquired before marriage, shall belong to her as her separate estate, with the power to dispose of it by will, and also by deed, with the written consent of her husband, as if she were unmarried. Const. art. 10, § 6. We must therefore determine what is the husband's interest in his wife's property by the rules of the common law as modified by the Constitution, if, under the facts of this case, any change in those rights, as they existed at common law, has been wrought by that instrument.

Blackstone says: "There are four requisites necessary to make a tenancy by the curtesy: Marriage, seisin of the wife, issue, and death of the wife." He is referring here, of course, to a tenancy by the curtesy consummate. In regard to the time when the husband first becomes vested with an interest or estate in his wife's land, he says: "As soon, therefore, as any child is born, the father began to have a permanent interest in the lands. He became one of the pares curtis, did homage to the lord, and was called tenant by the curtesy initiate; and this estate, being once vested in him by the birth of the child, was not suffered to determine by the subsequent death or coming of age of the infant." 2 Blackstone, 127. This is in harmony with the former decisions of this court. As is said in Morris v. Morris, 94 N. C. 617: "The husband by the birth of issue became tenant by the curtesy initiate to a separate estate for his own life, in his wife's land, the usufruct or profit of which, during that period, was absolutely and exclusively his own property. This has not been questioned in this state since the decision in Williams v. Lanier, 44 N. C. 30, and others following that case. Halford v. Tetherow, 47 N. C. 393; Childers v. Bumgarner, 53 N. C. 297; McGlennery v. Miller, 90 N. C. 215; Osborne v. Mull, 91 N. C. 203." We see, therefore, that the husband's right to the usufruct or rents and profits of the land is contingent upon the birth of issue. It is a mere expectancy or possibility; and, when this is the case, the Legislature may deprive him of his expectant interest at any time before the event occurs upon the happening of which it would become vested. We said, in Anderson v. Wilkins, 142 N. C. 158, 55 S. E. 273, 9 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1145: "So long as the interest remains contingent only, the Legislature may act; for a bare expectancy, or any estate depending for its existence on the happening of an uncertain event, is within its control, not being a vested right which is protected by constitutional guaranties. If this be so, the nature of estates and their enjoyment must, to a certain extent, and indirectly, be subject to legislative control and modification in order to promote the public welfare. Smith on Statutory and Const. Constr. 412. In this country estates in tail have very generally been turned into estates in fee simple by statutes the validity of which is not disputed. De Mill v. Lockwood, 3 Blatchf. 56, Fed. Cas. No. 3,782; Lane v. Davis, 2 N. C. 277; Minge v. Gilmour, Id. 279." Judge Cooley in his treatise on Constitutional Limitations (7th Ed.) at page 513, puts the very case we now have under consideration, and thus states the law applicable to it: "At the common law the husband immediately on the marriage succeeded to certain rights in the real and personal estate which the wife then possessed. These rights became vested rights at once, and any subsequent alteration in the law could not take them away. But other interests were merely in expectancy. He could have a right as tenant by the curtesy initiate in the wife's estates of inheritance the moment a child was born of the marriage, who might by possibility become heir to such estates. This right would be property subject to conveyance and to be taken for debts, and must therefore be regarded as a vested right, no more subject to legislative interference than other expectant interests which have ceased to be mere contingencies and become fixed. But while this interest remains in expectancy merely—that is to say, until it becomes initiate—the Legislature must have full right to modify or even to abolish it. And the same rule will apply to the case of dower, though the difference in the requisites of the two estates are such that the inchoate right to dower does not become property, or anything more than a mere expectancy, at any time before it is consummated by the husband's death. In neither of these cases does the marriage alone give a vested right. It gives only a capacity to acquire a right. The same remark may be made regarding the husband's expectant interest in the after-acquired personality of the wife; it is subject to any changes in the law made before his right becomes vested by the acquisition." We are therefore of the opinion that the plaintiff acquired no right to the cotton, as rent for the land of his wife, by virtue of any estate in him as tenant by the curtesy initiate, because of the constitutional provision (article 10, § 6) by which it is declared that a married woman's real and personal property shall be and remain her sole and separate estate, and that she may devise and bequeath the same, thus depriving her husband of any interest therein. Walker v. Long, 109 N. C. 510, 14 S. E. 299; Tiddy v. Graves, 126 N. C. 620, 36 S. E. 127. As that article of the Constitution was a valid enactment under the facts and circumstances of this case, the plaintiff has no interest, either as tenant by the curtesy initiate or consummate in rent which was reserved in the lease his wife having bequeathed the same to other persons. Tiddy v. Graves, supra.

It is true that at common law the husband, upon the marriage, was seised in right of his wife of a freehold interest in her lands during their joint lives, and that, either as tenant by marital right, or as tenant by the curtesy initiate, he was entitled to the rents and profits, and might lease or convey his estate, and it might be sold under execution against him. But radical changes in this respect were effected by the act of 1848 (Acts 1848, p. 89, c. 41; Revisal 1905, § 2097). Construing this act in Jones v. Coffey, 109 N. C. 515, 14 S. E. 84, the court said: "Whatever may be the rights of the husband in the wife's land after she may die intestate, the authorities concur in the view that the husband holds no estate during the life of the wife, as tenant by the curtesy initiate, which is subject to execution, and which he can assert against the wife. He has the right of ingress and egress and marital occupancy, but can assume no dominion over her land except as her properly constituted agent." In Walker v. Long, 109 N. C. 510, 14 S. E. 299, we find the following reference to the act: "By virtue of the act of 1848, and the further modification made by the Constitution of 1868, the tenancy by the curtesy initiate is stripped of its common-law attributes, until there only remains the husband's bare right of occupancy with his wife, with the right of ingress and egress (Manning v. Manning, 79 N. C. 293, 300, 28 Am. Rep. 324), and the right to the curtesy consummate contingent upon his surviving her. * * * The husband is still seised in law of the realty of his wife, shorn of the right to take the rents, and of the power to lease her lands. * * * He has, by the curtesy initiate, a freehold interest, but not an estate, in the property." It would seem that the more recent decision in Taylor v. Taylor, 112 N. C. 124, 16 S. E. 1019, is a direct authority against the claim asserted by the plaintiff. In that case the court, speaking by Shepherd, C. J., says: "In all of these cases the actual decision (as distinguished from several expressions founded upon the common law) may, it is thought, be reconciled with the recent ruling of this court in Jones v. Coffey, supra, that under the act the husband has no right which he can assert against the wife in her real property. This appears to be in accord with the early declaration of the court that 'the sole object of the act was to provide for her a home, of which she could not be deprived either by the husband or by his creditors.' Conceding that the cases may not be altogether harmonious, we must adopt the later decisions, and according to these the plaintiff is entitled to recover; for, admitting that a divorce a mensa et thoro cannot, as it is claimed, affect the property rights of the parties (Taylor v. Taylor, 93 N. C. 418, 53 Am. Rep. 460), the defendant, as against the wife, had no property rights whatever, but simply a right of ingress and egress for the purpose of enjoying her society, and these he has forfeited during the coverture, or until a reconciliation, by his own misconduct. Taking the other view, however, and admitting that the husband had a right to the rents and possession of the land during coverture, we think that such rights must yield when they come in conflict with the paramount rights of the wife, as indicated by the act of 1848."

It appears in this case that there was a written lease, signed by the plaintiff and his wife, but there was no privy examination of the latter, as required by the act of 1848 (Acts 1848, p. 89, c. 41; Revisal 1906, § 2097), and also by Revisal 1906, § 2096. The lease was therefore void as to the wife, and passes no interest to the husband in the rents and profits of the land, if otherwise he would have acquired an interest.

Our conclusion is that there was no error in the judgment of the court.

Affirmed.

1. ACCORD AND SATISFACTION (§ 7*) — PART PAYMENT—SUFFICIENCY.

The payment of a sum smaller than a liquidated debt under an agreement not under seal to accept such sum in satisfaction cannot be satisfaction of the whole.

2. ACCORD AND SATISFACTION (§ 8*) — PART PAYMENT—CONSIDERATION.

Where judgments were rendered against a husband and wife, and the husband was afterwards discharged in bankruptcy, his payment of a part of the judgment debt on the creditor's agreement that the payment should be accepted in full satisfaction was a complete satisfaction of the debt.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Barnwell County; Robt. Aldrich, Judge.

Actions by the T. T. Haydock Carriage Company and another against Paul J. Zeigler and another. From an order enjoining plaintiffs from enforcing executions on their judgments until the case should be heard on the merits, plaintiff, the T. T. Haydock Carriage Company, appeals. Modified.

J. A. Willis and B. T. Rice, for appellant. L. L. Tobin, for respondents.

WOODS, J. On December 7, 1897, judgments were recovered against Paul J. Zeigler and Virginia S. Zeigler in favor of the T. T. Haydock Carriage Company for $1,470.75, and in favor of the Union Savings Bank & Trust Company as assignee of the T. T. Haydock Carriage Company for $761.19 and for $167.54. The T. T. Haydock Carriage Company, having acquired by assignment the two judgments in favor of the Union Savings Bank & Trust Company, caused execution on all the judgments to be issued against the defendants, and directed the sheriff to levy on and sell thereunder the property of Virginia S. Zeigler. The judgment debtors, Paul J. Zeigler and Virginia S. Zeigler, then filed an ex parte petition in the original causes in which the judgments were recovered, alleging the judgment to be satisfied, and praying for an injunction against the enforcement of the executions. On this petition and exhibits attached Judge Aldrich made a temporary restraining order, in which he required the judgment creditor to show cause why the enforcement of the execution should not be enjoined until the final determination of the questions involved. No summons was issued, and no separate action for injunction was instituted; but the judgment creditor filed an answer and return denying that the judgments had been satisfied, or that anything had been paid thereon, except the sum of $100. Upon hearing the return, Judge Aldrich enjoined the judgment creditor from enforcing the executions until the case should be heard on the merits. From this order the T. T. Haydock Carriage Company, the judgment creditor, appeals.

These facts bearing on the issue made as to the satisfaction of the judgment were alleged in the petition and admitted in the answer. After the judgments were entered, Paul J. Zeigler was adjudged a bankrupt, the judgments were included in his schedule of liabilities, and he was absolutely and finally discharged therefrom. On 24th November, 1903, the T. T. Haydock Carriage Company wrote to Paul J. Zeigler the following letter: "Replying to your favor of recent date offering us $100.00 in full payment of our claim against you, will say that we will accept same on receipt of post-office order for the above amount, and you may hold this letter as a receipt in full for all claims and demands against you and your wife; and just as soon as the post-office order is received, we will send you the proper kind of receipt. Kindly give this your attention and let us have remittance by return mail, and oblige." On December 3, 1903, the judgment creditor issued a receipt in these words: "Received of P. J. and Virginia S. Zeigler One hundred Dollars in full of all claims and demands to date."

The petition alleges that Paul J. Zeigler entered into negotiations for the settlement of the judgments at the request of his wife, Virginia Ziegler, and in order to relieve her from the judgments entered against her because of her suretyship for him. The answer admits the agreement to accept $100 in full of the judgments, and the receipt issued in pursuance of the agreement, but denies any other agreement. The payment of a sum smaller than a liquidated debt in pursuance of an agreement not under seal to accept such sum in satisfaction cannot be satisfaction of the whole. Such payment notwithstanding the agreement operates only as a payment pro tanto. This rule was derived from Pinnel's Case, Coke 117a, and is generally accepted where the common law prevails. Fookes v. Beer, 54 L. J. Q. B. 130, 1 Eng. Rul. Cas. 370; 1 Cyc. 319; 1 Am. & E. Enc. 413; 1 Smith's Leading Cases, 146. Though much dissatisfaction has been expressed with it, it is firmly established in this state. Corbett v. Lucas & Dotterer, 4 McCord, 323; Hope v. Johnston & Cavis, 11 Rich. Law, 135; Arnold v. Bailey, 24 S. C. 493; Riggs v. Association, 61 S. C. 456, 39 S. E. 614. Owing to this dissatisfaction with the rule itself, the courts have resorted to very technical distinctions to escape its application. It has been held that if the payment of the smaller sums be made with an agreement for satisfaction before maturity (Eve v. Moseley, 2 Strob. 203), or by a promissory note (Libree v. Tripp, 15 M. & W. 23), or by check (Godard v. O'Brien, 9 Q. B. D. 37), or in pursuance of an agreement with other creditors (Pierce v. Jones, 8 S. C. 273, 28 Am. Rep. 288), or by money received from a third person under no legal obligation to pay the debt (Bidder v. Bridges, 57 L. J. Ch. 300, 1 Eng. Rul. Cas. 393; Marshall v. Bullard, 114 Iowa, 462, 87 N. W. 427, 54 L. R. A. 862), the case falls without the rule in Pinnel's Case, and the debt is satisfied. Other cases might be cited on each of these distinctions. All of them are supposed to fall under the doctrine stated by Lord Coke as decided in Pinnel's Case, that, if anything is accepted by the creditor as payment in full which might by possibility be more beneficial to him than his debt, the court will not inquire into the adequacy of the consideration, but will hold the debt satisfied. In this case the debtor, Paul J. Zeigler, had been absolutely discharged from the debt, and if he paid the sum of $100, as seems to be alleged by the petition, by the request or with the consent of Virginia S. Zeigler, the debtor who remained bound, then the debt was satisfied for the reason that $100 paid to the creditor's hands by Paul J. Zeigler, a person under no legal obligation to pay the debt, might well be more beneficial than the obligation of Virginia S. Zeigler to pay a much larger sum.

There was no error in granting the order enjoining the enforcement of the execution. There was error, however, in not requiring the usual injunction undertaking.

The judgment of this court is that the order of the circuit court be modified so as to require of the petitioners a written undertaking with sureties to be approved by the clerk of the court of common pleas of Barnwell county to the effect that he will pay to the T. T. Haydock Carriage Company such damages not exceeding $500 as it may sustain by reason of the injunction, if the court shall finally decide that the petitioners were not entitled thereto.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Greenville County; D. E. Hydrick, Judge.

Action by W. M. Logan against the Atlanta & Charlotte Air Line Railroad Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

The following is the opinion of Judge Hydrick, referred to in the opinion:

"The grounds of the motion for a new trial herein are all based upon considerations of the testimony, except the fifth, sixth, and seventh. Notwithstanding the facts of the case have been resolved in favor of the plaintiff by two juries, I have carefully reviewed the testimony, and have decided not to disturb the verdict. At the time of his injury plaintiff was an employé of the Southern Railway Company, which, as lessee of the defendant, had the possession and operation of the defendant's property rights and franchises. In July, 1903, plaintiff brought an action in the court of common pleas for Spartanburg county against the Southern Railway Company for the same cause of action. That case was removed to the Circuit Court of the United States by the Southern Railway Company, where it was tried, resulting in a judgment for the plaintiff. An appeal was taken to the Circuit Court of Appeals, which reversed the judgment of the Circuit Court, and remanded the case for a new trial. The opinion and judgment of the Circuit Court of Appeals will be found in Southern R. Co. v. Logan, 138 Fed. 725, 71 C. C. A. 281. After the rendition of the judgment of the Circuit Court of Appeals, and, while the case was still pending in the Circuit Court, the plaintiff commenced this action. The defendant pleaded the pendency of the action in the federal court in abatement. The plea was overruled. The defendant then requested the court to charge the jury:

"(1) That the plaintiff in this action is concluded and bound by all questions of fact and law decided by the Circuit Court of Appeals in the judgment hereinbefore referred to which would have bound him in a second trial in the United States court.

"(2) The defendant company, as lessor of the Southern Railway Company, is not liable to a servant of the latter company for injuries received by him in consequence of the negligence of such company."

"These requests were refused. The fifth, sixth, and seventh grounds of the motion for a new trial allege error in overruling the plea in abatement and in refusing said requests.

"The defendant is liable for torts of the Southern Railway Company in the operation of its railroad on the ground that the Southern Railway Company is its agent in the operation of the road. Smalley v. Railway Co., 73 S. C. 574, 53 S. E. 1000. Therefore the law governing the relation of principal and agent is applicable. Upon the principles governing that relation the master is liable for the acts of his servant. It is well settled that the principal and agent are jointly and severally liable for the torts of the agent done within the scope of the agency. Schumpert v. Railway Co., 65 S. C. 332, 43 S. E. 813, 95 Am. St. Rep. 802, and cases cited by the court. Sometimes the principal and agent are spoken of as joint tort-feasors, though they may not, strictly speaking, be such. Nevertheless the nature of their liability makes applicable some of the principles governing the liability of joint tortfeasors. One of these is that they may be sued jointly or severally for the torts of the agent committed within the scope of the agency; and, if sued severally, neither action will abate the other.

"There is another reason why the plea could not be sustained. The actions are pending in jurisdictions which are foreign to each other—at least in the sense and to the extent that an action pending in one will not abate an action pending in the other between the same parties for the same cause. The authorities have agreed that the courts of the different states of the Union are foreign to each other. Hill v. Hill, 51 S. C. 134, 28 S. E. 309. There is some diversity of opinion as to whether the courts of a state and those of the United States sitting within the territorial limits of the same state are foreign to each other. One of the reasons why the courts of one state will not abate an action pending therein on the plea that another action between the same parties for the same cause is pending in another state is that the citizens of a state should not be sent into a foreign jurisdiction to get justice. So far as the greater expense and inconvenience attendant upon getting justice in a foreign jurisdiction may affect the question, it would apply with equal force to the decision of the relation of the state and federal courts to each other. To send a citizen of the state into the federal courts to get justice may work as great a hardship upon him in the matter of inconvenience and expense as to send him into a foreign state. In many, if not in most, cases the trial is had as far away from his home, and he has to attend it at as great expense and inconvenience to himself and his witnesses as if he were sent into a foreign state. Moreover, the jurors who are to pass upon the credibility of his witnesses are as complete strangers to them. The Supreme Court of the United States has held (Gordon v. Gilfoill, 99 U. S. 169, 25 L. Ed. 383, and other cases) that the state courts are foreign to the federal courts sitting within the same state, and a majority of the inferior federal courts have adopted the same view. See 1 Cyc. 38, and cases cited. 1 Ency. Pl. & Pr. 764. For the sake of uniformity, I think the state courts should adopt the same view with regard to the federal courts sitting within the state, so that we shall not have the federal courts holding the state courts to be foreign and the state courts holding the same federal courts to be domestic.

"The decision of the question of res judicata has been more difficult. The principles of the law of res judicata are few and simple, but the application of them to particular cases is not always easy. A general statement of one of the elementary principles of that law is that only parties and privies are bound by a judgment. 'Privies,' in the sense in which the word is here used, includes only those who have 'mutual or successive relationship to the same rights of property.' 24 A. & E. Ency. Law (2d Ed.) 764. 'The ground of privity is property, not personal relation.' Big. Estop. p. 142; Freem. Judg. § 162; Smith v. Moore, 7 S. C. 215, 24 Am. Rep. 479. 'Absolute identity of interest is essential to privity. The fact that two parties as litigants in two different suits happen to be interested in proving or disproving the same facts creates no privity between them.' 24 A. & E. Ency. L. (2d Ed.) p. 747. In some of the cases the word is used, somewhat inaccurately, to denote the relation and the consequences thereof between principal and agent, and, unless the sense in which the word is used is kept in mind, we are apt to be led into confusion and error. 'The application of the principle of res judicata to persons standing in the relation of principal and agent or master and servant has, by some authorities, been supported on the ground that privity exists between persons standing in these relations. But other authorities deny the existence of such privity, and hold that in such cases the technical rule is upon grounds of public policy expanded so as to embrace within the estoppel of a judgment persons who are not, strictly speaking, either parties or privies.' 24 A. & E. Ency. L. (2d Ed.) 752. Where an agent is sued, and, after trial on the merits, the issue is determined against the plaintiff, the principal, though not a party to the suit, can avail himself of the judgment as a bar when sued by the same plaintiff on the same cause of action. Swygert v. Wingard, 48 S. C. 324, 26 S. E. 653; Doremus v. Root, 23 Wash. 710, 63 Pac. 572, 54 L. R. A. 649.

"A final judgment on the merits in favor of the Southern Railway Company in the case in the federal court would unquestionably have been a bar to this action, because it would have been an adjudication by a court of competent authority that the Southern Railway Company is not liable to the plaintiff, and because the liability of the defendant herein is predicated solely upon that of its agent, the Southern Railway Company. This is true, even though the defendant was neither party nor privy to that suit. The authorities generally agree that, when the principal is sued for the act of his agent, he can vouch the agent to defend by giving him notice of the action and an opportunity to defend, and if the agent fails to defend, or if judgment goes against the principal, the agent will be concluded by the judgment; and all agree that the judgment would be conclusive as to the amount which the principal had to pay, and prima facie evidence of the liability of the agent to his principal therefor. But the conclusive effect of the judgment depends upon notice of the pendency of the action and an opportunity to defend it. Smith v. Moore, 7 S. C. 209, 24 Am. Rep. 479; Robinson v. Baskins, 53 Ark. 330, 14 S. W. 93, 22 Am. St. Rep. 202, and notes; Freeman on Judg. § 164; 24 A. & E. Ency. L. (2d Ed.) 741; Catterlin v. Frankfort, 79 Ind. 547, 41 Am. Rep. 627; Emma Silver Mining Co. v. Emma Silver Mining Co., etc. (C. C.) 7 Fed. 401; Gillingham v. Charleston Towboat, etc., Co. (D. C.) 40 Fed. 649; Bailey v. Sundberg, 49 Fed. 583, 1 C. C. A. 387.

"I have found no case which holds that the agent would be concluded by a judgment against his principal without notice and an opportunity to defend the action. A fortiori, the principal would not without notice and opportunity to defend be concluded by a judgment against his agent—especially in favor of a third person, the plaintiff in that judgment—because to so conclude him and make him responsible for the agent's 'bad pleading, or blunders in the trial of the cause * * * would be to deprive him of his property without due process of law. Yet, as regards the plaintiff who has before sued the agent, and been defeated, there is no reason why he should not be concluded upon that principle of public policy which gives every man one opportunity to prove his case, and limits every man to one such opportunity.' Emma Silver Mining Co. v. Emma Silver Mining Co., supra. Upon the authority of the cases above cited, as well as upon reason, I hold that the defendant in this action would not have been concluded by a final judgment in favor of the plaintiff against the Southern Railway Company in the federal court. This being so, the defendant cannot avail itself of any adjudication in that case in this action, unless, as before held, the judgment had been final against the right of the plaintiff to recover; for estoppels must be mutual. It must be such a judgment as would conclude the party invoking it as well as the other party. 24 A. & E. Ency. L. (2d Ed.) 730. While, as we have seen, a final judgment against the plaintiff in the federal court would have been a bar to this action, a final judgment against the Southern Railway Company without satisfaction would not have been a bar to this action, because the plaintiff has the right to pursue both companies to judgment, though he can have but one satisfaction. Suppose he had obtained judgment against the Southern Railway Company and found it insolvent, or for any reason had been unable to collect the judgment, unquestionably he could have sued the defendant to judgment also, and then it would have been his right to elect against which company he would demand satisfaction. Hawkins v. Hatton, 1 Nott & McC. 318, 9 Am. Dec. 700; Smith v. Singleton, 2 McMul. 184, 39 Am. Dec. 122; 1 Herman on Estoppel, § 177.

"This conclusion is not in conflict with the principle of res judicata decided in Jones v. Railway Co., 65 S. C. 410, 43 S. E. 884.

There is a distinction between res judicata, which is merely the law of that case, in the further progress of it, and the estoppel of a final judgment, especially when invoked by one who is neither party nor privy to the record. Suppose, for instance, Jones had obtained a judgment against the railway company and found that he could not collect it for any reason, and had brought suit against the servant of the company by whose negligence he was injured, I do not think that either would have been concluded by the decision of the Supreme Court in the first appeal in the case against the railway company, unless, of course, the servant had been so connected with that case by notice of the action and defending it as to be concluded by the judgment. To support the plea of res judicata the judgment must be final and on the merits. 24 A. & E. Ency. L. (2d Ed.) 792-794. I must not be understood as holding that the principle of law decided by the federal court in the case of Logan against Southern Railway Company is not sound. I was not requested to pass upon that principle or to change it. I was merely requested to hold and charge that Logan was bound in this case by all questions of law and fact decided in that case, as he would be upon a second trial of that case.

"The motion is overruled."

Cothran, Dean & Cothran, for appellant.
John Gary Evans and J. A. McCullough, for respondent

JONES, C. J. This action was instituted in Greenville county December 5, 1906, to recover of the lessor, Atlanta & Charlotte Air Line Railroad Company, damages for personal injuries sustained by plaintiff at Spartanburg, S. C., April 17, 1902, while acting as yardmaster of the lessee, Southern Railway Company, as the result of the alleged negligence of the employes of the Southern Railway Company. Plaintiff recovered judgment for $3,488.

Both in request to charge and on motion for a new trial defendant-appellant raised the question that defendant company as lessor is not liable to a servant of the lessee for injuries received by him through the negligence of the lessee. In the case of Reed v. Railway, 75 S. C. 168, 55 S. E. 218, this court has expressly decided the question against appellant's contention, and we are satisfied with the decision. It appears that in July, 1903, plaintiff brought an action in Spartanburg county against the Southern Railway Company to recover damages for the same injury, which cause was removed to the federal Circuit Court and was there tried, resulting in a verdict for the plaintiff, from which an appeal was taken to the Circuit Court of Appeals, whereupon that court reversed the judgment and remanded the case for a new trial de novo in accordance with the opinion of the court. Southern Ry. Co. v. Logan, 138 Fed.

725, 71 C. C. A. 281. The defendant requested the court to instruct the jury that plaintiff is concluded and bound by all questions of fact and law decided by the Circuit Court of Appeals in the judgment referred to which would have bound him in a second trial in the United States court. The refusal of the court to give this instruction is vindicated by the opinion of Judge Hydrick, herewith reported, refusing the motion for a new trial based upon that ground. The parties are not the same, and the judgment of the federal court granting a new trial is not final. The defendant's plea that the pendency of the said action in the 'federal' court is a bar to the present action was properly overruled under the authority of Mayfield v. Atlanta & Charlotte Air Line Ry. Co., 79 S. C. 558, 61 S. E. 106.

The exceptions that there was no testimony tending to show negligence of defendant, that the testimony shows conclusively that plaintiff assumed the risk of injury, and that the testimony shows conclusively that plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence cannot be sustained; there being some testimony sufficient to carry the case to the jury upon these issues.

The judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

UNITED STATES FIDELITY &
GUARANTY CO. †

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. May 8, 1909.)

APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1010*)—FINDINGS OF FACT—REVIEW.

The Supreme Court, in an action at law, has no jurisdiction to review the trial court's findings, if supported by any evidence.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Greenville County; D. E. Hydrick, Judge.

Action by the Greenville-Carolina Power Company against the United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

The following is the decree referred to in the opinion:

"This is an action to recover $25,000, the penalty of a bond given to Federal Construction Company and Saluda River Power Company by John F. Grandy & Son, as principals, and the defendant, as surety, for the faithful performance of a contract made by Grandy & Son with Federal Construction Company to furnish all the materials and do all the work necessary to build a dam and power house on Saluda river, near Greenville, S. C., according to plans and specifications prepared by Lockwood, Greene & Co., engineers. A jury trial was waived, and the case was heard by the court. The plaintiff is the successor of Saluda River Power Company, and has, by assignment, all the rights of Federal Construction Company in the contract and bond.

"The plans and profiles of the dam, upon which the bidders based their estimates, showed the approximate line of the ledge of solid rock in the bed of the river and the adjacent banks upon which the dam was to be built. This line was ascertained by soundings made in the river with a steel rod and by test pits dug on the banks along the proposed line of the dam. The invitation for bids contained the following statement: 'It is very desirable that all bidders should visit the site of the dam, to observe the character of the country and the exceptional advantages afforded for cheap construction by natural conditions. It is believed abundance of stone for use in the concrete can be secured from the steep hillsides along the river, and that plenty of sand can be secured from bars where it has been deposited along the river near the site; but no guarantee is made on these points. * * * It has been the endeavor to have the plans and specifications indicate clearly and definitely the intent of the work, and your proposals are accepted based on these plans and specifications, any variations therefrom to be taken account of and allowed for by the resident engineer as the work proceeds, on a suitable basis of unit prices which you will name with your proposal.' The contract provides that the dam shall be built on the solid ledge under the river bed, and provision is made for variations from the plans and specifications 'in order to meet the natural and unforeseen conditions of the site and still secure the prescribed limits of safety.'

"Before making their bid Grandy & Son examined the site. They sounded in the river with a steel rod and in the test pits made by the engineers, and became satisfied that the approximate ledge line and the other physical conditions were represented in the plans and profiles with conservative accuracy. Their bid was $98,460. The next lowest bid was $115,000. The highest bid was $185,000. Although their experience with that kind of work was limited, they were anxious to get the contract, and brought to bear all influences they could to get it. In the letter accepting their bid, which is dated June 3, 1905, they were informed that a surety bond for $25,000 would be required. As they had put in their estimate the premium on a bond for only $15,000, the company agreed to pay the additional premium for a $25,000 bond. They began work about the 7th or 8th of June, and abandoned it about the middle of December. It was completed by another contractor. The total cost was $213,499. If the Grandys had carried out the contract, they would have received about $121,871. So the dam and power house cost $91,628 more than the Grandys agreed to build it for. The great increase over the estimated cost is accounted for, in part, by unforeseen conditions, a great increase in the price of labor and materials, the change of contractors, which necessitated a change of the equipment, and perhaps, also, by the fact that the Grandys' bid was too low.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. & Am. Digs. 1907 to date, & Reporter Indexes

"After they had been at work some weeks, and before the formal contract was signed, they discovered that the stone which they had expected to use in the dam was unsuitable, and that they would have to excavate deeper than they expected to secure a solid foundation for the dam. On account of these developments, they became discouraged. They asked for and had a conference with the president of the company and the resident engineer at the site, where these unforeseen conditions and difficulties were discussed, especially the difficulty of getting suitable stone. They say that they decided to give up the contract unless they could get assurances from the company and engineers that they would receive such compensation, on account of the unforeseen difficulties, as would make them whole, and that such assurances were given them. This is denied by the president of the company and the resident engineer. However, they afterwards signed the contract, without having any provision inserted therein with regard to such compensation.

"These unforeseen conditions were not made known to the defendant by any of the parties interested. It does not appear whether the defendant was otherwise informed of them. None of the parties interested, except the Grandys, knew that the defendant had been applied to for the bond, until the bond, signed by the defendant, was tendered to the company. No inquiries were made of the company, the owners, or the engineers by the defendant. The Grandys and the local agent of the defendant urged the acceptance of the bond. The methods employed to ascertain the ledge line were such as are ordinarily employed by competent and skillful engineers, and they usually prove to be correct within reasonable limitations; but in this instance the variations on the banks of the river were very great. The contractors knew, however, what methods had been employed, and themselves employed the same methods in their own investigations, and were satisfied the results were truly represented in the drawings, as in fact they were.

"The defenses are: (1) A general denial. (2) Misrepresentation on the plans of the physical conditions, and fraudulent concealment of the facts in regard to them. (3) The failure to disclose the facts discovered after the contractors began work and the inducing them to sign the formal contract and procure the bond under agreement to make them whole and pay part of the premiums for the bond. (4) The loan of $8,000 to Grandy & Son by Colonial Securities Company, which is alleged to have been an advance payment on the contract. (5) Anticipated or advance payments in variation of the contract.

"The first and second defenses are disposed of by the statement of facts.

"The third defense depends upon the extent to which that good faith which must be exercised by the obligee in dealing with the surety requires the obligee to disclose to the surety facts known to him which might operate upon the mind of the surety in making the contract. On the one hand, it is certain that the obligee must not, directly or indirectly, misrepresent or conceal material facts which he ought to disclose, and he must answer truly all inquiries concerning them. On the other hand, it is equally certain that the relation does not require the voluntary disclosure in all cases of all matters known to the obligee which he may reasonably suppose would affect the mind of the surety. The surety cannot act supinely. He must exercise proper diligence to ascertain the liability which he incurs. The difficulty lies in determining just what facts the obligee must disclose, and under what circumstances the law makes it the duty of the obligee to disclose them.

"To render the allegation of concealment sufficient, it is necessary to show that the creditor either procured the surety's signature, or was present when the instrument was executed, and then misrepresentation of material facts which should have been disclosed. Magee v. Manhattan Life Ins. Co., 92 U. S. 99, 23 L. Ed. 699. 'The test,' says Chancellor Kent, 'is whether one of the parties knowingly suffered the other to deal under a delusion.' 2 Kent, Com. 643. For general statements by other authorities of the circumstances requiring disclosure, see Franklin Bank v. Cooper, 36 Me. 176, 196; Jungk v. Holbrook, 15 Utah, 198, 49 Pac. 305, 62 Am. St. Rep. 923; Fassnacht v. Emsing Gagen Co., 18 Ind. App. 80, 46 N. E. 45, 47 N. E. 480, 63 Am. St. Rep. 325, and notes; Brandt on Suretyship, §20. In W. C. & A. R. R. Co. v. Ling, 18 S. C. 120, our own Supreme Court says: 'There must be some positive act of concealment or misrepresentation on the part of the obligee, in cases like this before the court, as to some fact which it was his duty to discharge [disclose], before the sureties can be relieved. Silence merely, especially as to facts within the reach of proper inquiry by the sureties, will not be sufficient. The law stands between the parties perfectly impartial, ready to rebuke fraud, concealment, or misrepresentation on the part of either; but carelessness and want of proper vigilance are left to their own fruits. There must be an intent to deceive, not a mere passive omission to state everything within the knowledge of the creditor. The intent is the gist of the fraud, and this should be made to appear.'

"It was the duty of the contractors to inform their surety of the unforeseen conditions which had developed, and if they failed to do so the plaintiff is not responsible, unless the plaintiff knew that the contractors had not done so, and that the surety was relying upon the conditions as represented in the drawings. There is no testimony tending to show that the construction company, the plaintiff, or the engineers knew that the contractors had not fully informed the defendant of the then existing conditions, or that the defendant was ignorant of them. In fact, it is only an inference that the defendant acted upon the drawings, though I think the inference that it did reasonable. As no inquiries were made of any of the parties connected with the plaintiff, I think they had the right to assume that the Grandys had done their duty and informed the defendant of the conditions as they had then developed, and hence it was not incumbent upon them to volunteer any information in regard to them. Page v. Kreky, 137 N. Y. 307, 33 N. E. 311, 21 L. R. A. 409, 33 Am. St. Rep. 731, and notes. The defendant must have known that the Grandys had been at work for some time before the bond was executed, because it refers to the contract as dated June 3d and the bond is dated July 21st. At least that was sufficient to excite inquiry which would probably have disclosed the then existing conditions.

"The contractors say they knew at the time of the conference it would be impossible for them to complete the work at the contract price, and that they would not have signed the formal contract and procured the bond, but for the assurances made them by the plaintiff and engineers that they would be made whole. The fact that they did sign the contract and did not have that agreement inserted into it militates very much against that position. If the parties made that agreement, it should, by all means, have been put into the written contract, which is conclusively presumed to embody all prior negotiations. I conclude, from the testimony, and from their signing the contract and procuring the bond, after the conference at the dam, that, while the unforeseen conditions had then developed sufficiently to greatly discourage them, they had not developed as fully as they did afterwards; for it is not reasonable to suppose that they would have gone forward in the face of difficulties which they then knew would result inevitably in their financial ruin. It is often difficult to remember past occurrences, except as colored by the light of subsequent events.

"The fourth defense charges that Colonial Securities Company and Federal Construction Company were substantially the same corporation, and that after the contract was made the Colonial Securities Company advanced the contractors $8,000, which was an advance payment, in violation of the terms of the contract and to the prejudice of the surety, whereby it is discharged. Colonial Securities Company is a corporation engaged in a general banking business and in financing development enterprises. It signed the contract as surety or guarantor of the Federal Construction Company. At the time of the contract it held all the stock of the Federal Construction Company. Some of its stockholders were also stockholders and officers in Federal Construction Company and Saluda River Power Company, and, of course, to that extent they were interested in the performance by the contractors of their contract. But the testimony shows no other connection between these companies or interests in the affairs of each other. It also shows that the transaction in question was a loan, and not an advance payment for or on account of Federal Construction Company or Saluda River Power Company.

"The fifth defense also charges generally that the contract was violated by the making of advance or anticipated payments. The payment relied upon is that for structural steel, which was at the railroad side track some two or three miles from the dam, where the material shipped in by the railroad was delivered to the contractors. The estimate of September 2d contained this item: 'Structural steel delivered on ground at oil switch, 118,100 lbs., at .03, $3,543.' The amount of this estimate was certified to be due under the terms of the contract by the engineers, and paid by the company. Advance payments, or payments of amounts greater than is due under the terms of the contract, will ordinarily discharge the surety. Greenville v. Ormand, 51 S. C. 121, 23 S. E. 147.

"It is contended that the surety is a favorite of the law, and is entitled to stand upon the strict terms of his contract, and that any material variation or alteration thereof, without his consent, will operate to discharge him from liability. While that is true, the contract must receive a just and reasonable interpretation, with a view to ascertaining the intention of the parties, which, when discovered, must control; for the bond is, by its terms, subject to the contract, and the surety thereby becomes a party to the contract. The rule is applied with greater strictness in cases where there has been an alteration of a written agreement than in cases where there has been only a breach or a variation from the terms of the contract. In the latter, the inquiry is whether the surety's security has been lessened by what has been done by the creditor. Calvert v. Dock Company, 2 Keen, 644. Moreover, the rule of strictissimi juris does not apply to the case of a compensated surety. Walker v. Holtzclaw, 57 S. C. 466, 35 S. E. 754; Cowles v. U. S. Fid. & Guar. Co., 32 Wash. 120, 72 Pac. 1032, 98 Am. St. Rep. 840, and notes; Remington v. Fid. & Co., 27 Wash. 429, 67 Pac. 989.

"The compensated surety is regarded rather as an insurer, and his contract one of insurance. This class of sureties seek the business for the profit there is in it. The risk is carefully considered, usually by experts, and the compensation, which is proportioned to the risk, is usually, and especially in cases like this, included in the estimates of the bidders, and paid by the obligee. The only proper solution of the problem seems to be that adopted by so many courts of high authority, namely, to treat the compensated surety in all cases as an insurer, subject in all respects to the general principles of insurance law, modified to a limited extent by the quasi suretyship nature of the contract, arising from the dual relationship sustained by the insurer to the insured and the 'risk.'" Frost, Guar. Ins. § 4.

"In the light of the foregoing principles let us examine the provisions of this contract relative to the matter of payments. 'On the 1st day of each month during the progress of said work the company, through the engineers, shall estimate the value of the work completed and materials furnished and put in place during the previous month, and within five days thereafter eighty-five per cent. (85%) of the value thus determined * * * shall be paid to the contractor. * * * All payments shall be made only upon certificates of the engineers, and based upon their estimates of the amount of work done and materials furnished.' Taking the language of the first part of the section and the second part above quoted together, I think there can be no doubt that it expresses the intention that payment should be made for 'materials furnished.' This construction is strengthened by reading the whole contract, where reference is made to the matter of payments. In construing a contract, we must not be governed by fragmentary facts of it; but it must be considered as a whole, and every part must be given some meaning and effect, if practicable, and such meaning and effect as will make it a consistent whole. To say that payment for 'materials furnished' is not required would render those words, in the sentence last quoted, nugatory.

"But, if this were not so, the fact that it was estimated and certified by the engineers is, I think, conclusive of the question; for the contract provides that payments shall be made only upon the estimates and certificates of the engineers, and, further, that 'if any question or dispute shall arise during the progress of the work * * * as to the certifying or auditing of accounts, it is to be referred at once to the said engineers, whose decision thereof shall be binding and conclusive upon both parties.' Such a stipulation is valid, and the decision of the engineers, in the absence of fraud or collusion, or mistake so gross as to imply bad faith, or the failure to exercise an honest judgment, binding upon the parties to the contract. Sullivan v. Byrne, 10 S. C. 122; Kihlberg v. U. S., 97 U. S. 398, 24 L. Ed. 1106; Boettler v. Tendick, 73 Tex. 488, 11 S. W. 497, 5 L. R. A. 270; St. Paul & N. P. Ry. v. Bradbury, 42 Minn. 222, 44 N. W. 2; Elliott v. Missouri, etc., R. R. Co., 74 Fed. 707, 21 C. C. A. 5; Choctaw, etc., Co. v. Newton, 140 Fed. 225, 71 C. C. A. 655. In the case of Boettler v. Tendick, supra, it was contended that the decision of the architects was not final and binding, unless made after a controversy had actually arisen; but it was held otherwise.

"Even if the engineers erred in construing the contract, which I do not think they did, the surety should not be released on that account. To so hold would be to discharge the surety in nearly every case of a building contract; for they are rarely completed without some variations or departures from the strict terms of the contract, and engineers and architects are not, as a rule, learned in the law of the construction of contracts. The case of City of New Haven v. National Steam Economizer Co. (Conn.) 65 Atl. 959, was similar to this case in several respects. In that case the Supreme Court of Connecticut say: 'It is unnecessary to inquire whether, under the terms of the instrument, when such certificates were given, the plaintiff, in the absence of collusion and unfair dealing, was or was not under a present legal duty, enforceable at law, to pay to the contractor the amounts so certified. He was at least entitled to make the payments, and was under no duty to review or revise the work which the parties had committed to the architects'—citing McAvoy v. Long, 13 Ill. 147; Chapman v. Kansas City & R. R. Co., 114 Mo. 542, 549, 21 S. W. 858; Chapman v. Eneberg, 95 Mo. App. 127, 68 S. W. 974. See, also, Hand Mfg. Co. v. Harks, 36 Or. 235, 52 Pac. 512, 53 Pac. 1072, 59 Pac. 549; Grafton v. Homkly, 114 Tenn. 569, 86 S. W. 859. The estimate and certificate was made in good faith, and was paid in good faith, and the surety is not thereby discharged.

"It is therefore ordered and adjudged that the plaintiff, Greenville-Carolina Power Company, do recover of the defendant, the United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company, the sum of $25,000 and the cost of the action."

Jos. A. McCullough, for appellant. Haynsworth, Patterson & Blythe, for respondent.

JONES, J. The plaintiff sued defendant upon a $25,000 bond, guaranteeing the faithful performance of a contract by John F. Grandy & Son for the construction of a dam and power house for plaintiff on Saluda river, in Greenville county, S. C. The issues were by consent submitted to Judge Hydrick, without a jury, and judgment was rendered against defendant for $25,000.

This being a case at law, it is conceded that the Supreme Court has no jurisdiction to review the findings of fact by the circuit court, where there is any testimony whatever in support of the same. After careful consideration we conclude that the findings of fact by Judge Hydrick, whose decree is herewith reported, have support in the testimony, and that upon the facts so found he properly adjudged the defendant was liable upon the bond.

The judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

BROWN v. SOUTHERN RY., CAROLINA DIVISION, et al.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. May 8, 1909.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 286*)—ACTIONS—JURY QUESTION—NEGLIGENCE.

Where, in an action for a conductor's death while engaged in coupling cars, there was testimony that the coupling appliances were defective, a nonsuit on the ground that there was no evidence to show negligence was properly denied.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 1020; Dec. Dig. § 286.*]

2. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 289*)—ACTIONS—INJURIES—JURY QUESTION—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

In an action for a conductor's death while attempting to couple cars, whether intestate was guilty of contributory negligence held for the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 1089-1132; Dec. Dig. § 289.*]

3. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 243*)—INJURIES—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—EMERGENCIES—VIOLATION OF RULES.

Where the evidence tended to show that there was such an emergency as required the conductor to couple cars by going between them, that the company's rules forbid the coupling of cars in that manner would not preclude a recovery for such conductor's death while making the coupling.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of York County, R. C. Watts, Judge.

Action by L. P. Brown, as administratrix of L. P. Brown, deceased, against the Southern Railway, Carolina Division, and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Abney & Muller and J. E. McDonald, for appellants. Jos. A. McCullough, Thos. F. McDow, and J. Harry Foster, for respondent.

GARY, A. J. This is an action for damages. The allegations of the complaint, material to the questions presented by the exceptions, are as follows:

"That, heretofore, to wit, on the 9th day of March, 1907, while L. P. Brown was engaged, as conductor, in the discharge of his duties in the town of Lancaster, state of South Carolina, he met his death by reason of the joint and concurrent negligence, carelessness, recklessness, willfulness, and wantonness of the defendants, in the following particulars: At the said station it was the duty of plaintiff's intestate to pick up five freight cars, which were on the siding at the depot, and attach them to his train on the main line; that he cut his engine loose from the cars on the main line, and backed it upon the side track, and coupled to the cars next to his said engine, for the purpose of pushing the five cars, which he was to pick up, on the main line, and couple them to his train; and after pushing the said cars up the grade on the main line, and while the said L. P. Brown was upon said side track and in the discharge of his duties, he was killed, being caught between the cars, which he was to pick up as aforesaid, and the other cars which were coupled to the engine; the said cars, which he was to pick up, rolling down the said grade in the direction of the said L. P. Brown, who had his back to them, and the backing cars attached to the engine; which collision was due to the joint and concurrent carelessness, negligence, recklessness, willfulness, and wantonness of the defendants (a) in not furnishing plaintiff's intestate a safe place to do the work required of him, the said side track from the point of the switch on the main line in the direction of the depot being upon a dangerously steep grade; (b) in not furnishing plaintiff's intestate with a force of hands sufficiently adequate to handle the said train and cars with safety and to do the work required of him; (c) the brakes and appliances upon the five cars, which he was to pick up on the said siding, were insufficient and defective; (d) the brakemen furnished to handle the said cars were green, inefficient, and inexperienced; (e) in permitting the said five cars, which had been placed on the main line, to roll down the said grade, and not warning plaintiff's intestate of the danger; (f) in backing the train at the same time the other cars were rolling down the said grade, without signal to that effect by plaintiff's intestate, and without warning him of the danger; (g) in not furnishing him with appliances which would enable him to both couple and uncouple the cars, without necessitating his presence between them, the other couplers furnished being unsafe and defective in this particular; (h) this being the second trip of plaintiff's intestate over the said road, furnishing him with a green and inexperienced crew to assist in the management of the said train and the prosecution of his work."

The defendant Southern Railway Company denied the allegations of the complaint, except the corporate existence of the defendants, and set up the defense of contributory negligence, on the part of the plaintiff's intestate, in endeavoring to cross the track of defendants' railroad while the engine and cars were in motion—the danger being obvious—and in violating the rules of the defendants by going between the cars while the same were in motion.

At the close of the plaintiff's testimony, the defendants made a motion for a nonsuit on the ground that there was no testimony tending to show negligence on the part of the defendants, and, further, that the testimony showed the injury was caused by the negligence of a fellow servant, inasmuch as plaintiff's intestate was injured while discharging the duties of a brakeman. This motion was refused. At the close of all the testimony, the defendants made a motion to direct a verdict on the grounds just mentioned, and upon the further ground of contributory negligence on the part of plaintiff's intestate, which motion was also refused. The jury rendered a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for $8,000.

The first question that will be considered is whether there was error on the part of his honor, the presiding judge, in refusing the motion for a nonsuit, on the ground that there was no testimony tending to show negligence. It is only necessary to state that there was testimony to the effect that the appliances for coupling the cars were defective, to show that the exception presenting this question cannot be sustained.

We proceed to consider whether there was error in overruling the motion for nonsuit, on the ground that the injury was caused by the negligence of a fellow servant. George W. Harris, a witness for the plaintiff, testified as follows: "Q. Did you, or did you not, hear Mr. Gillespie tell him (plaintiff's intestate) to slack back, couple up, and 'Let's get through'? A. Yes, sir; he told him to hurry up and 'Let's get through'; he wanted to clear the freight train for the passenger train. Q. The passenger was to come soon? A. Yes, sir. Q. Who was Mr. Gillespie? A. He was a train dispatcher, I think—trainmaster." There was also testimony tending to show that the crew was insufficient in number; that the brakes were defective, and that it was necessary to go between the cars to effect the coupling; that previous to going between the cars the deceased made several unsuccessful efforts to couple them by means of an iron lever fastened on the side of the car. This case falls within the principle announced in the case of Hall v. Ry., 81 S. C. 522, 62 S. E. 848, the syllabus of which is as follows: "Nonsuit moved on grounds of assumption of risk and contributory negligence properly refused, as the court could not conclusively decide from the evidence that plaintiff, a freight train conductor, assumed the risk, or was guilty of contributory negligence, in coupling the cars by going between them when he could make the coupling in no other way, on account of a defective coupling appliance, in such an emergency as would justify a reasonably prudent man in going between the cars, nor could the court conclusively infer from the circumstances that it was contributory negligence for him to go a few inches too far after getting between the cars in making the coupling." See, also, Carson v. Ry., 68 S. C. 55, 46 S. E. 525. This ruling also disposes of the question of contributory negligence.

The next question that will be considered is whether the plaintiff was precluded from recovering damages by reason of the fact that her intestate violated the rules of the defendants forbidding employes to go between the cars for the purpose of coupling, or to attempt to couple while the train was in motion. The testimony tended to show that there was such an emergency as required the conductor to couple the cars in the manner hereinbefore set forth. The case, therefore, comes within the rule stated in Hall v. Ry., 81 S. C. 522, 62 S. E. 848.

The third exception, relating to punitive damages, cannot be considered, for the reason that the request therein mentioned is not set out in the record.

The foregoing conclusions practically dispose of all questions raised by the exceptions.

The judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

nied May 12, 1909.)

1. BROKERS (§ 49*)—RIGHT TO COMMISSIONS—CONTRACT.

Where a contract between the owner of land and a real estate agent provides, in substance, that, if a party or parties presented by the agent want to buy the land at a price satisfactory to the owner, the agent shall be paid 5 per centum commission, the agent must substantially comply with the contract by presenting or producing a party or parties able, willing, and ready to buy the land at a price satisfactory to the owner, before the agent will be entitled to commissions.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Brokers, Cent. Dig. §§ 70-72; Dec. Dig. § 49.*]

2. BROKERS (§ 56*)—COMMISSIONS—NEGOTIATIONS DIRECT WITH PRINCIPAL.

If the negotiation resulting in a sale of the land was not carried on by the agent but by the owner, the agent must show that he was the efficient cause of the negotiation resulting in the sale, before he will be entitled to commissions.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Brokers, Cent. Dig. §§ 85-89; Dec. Dig. § 56.*]

3. BROKERS (§ 86*)—COMMISSIONS—EVIDENCE.

When the owner voluntarily consummates a sale and conveys the land, this is conclusive evidence that the price is satisfactory, and that the purchaser is willing and ready to buy.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Brokers, Dec. Dig. § 86.*]

4. EVIDENCE (§ 77*)—PRESUMPTIONS—FAILURE TO CALL WITNESSES.

There is no presumption against a defendant for failure to call witnesses, or any particular witness, when the plaintiff, carrying the burden of proof, has not made a prima facie case.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 97; Dec. Dig. § 77.*]

5. EVIDENCE (§ 86*)—PRESUMPTIONS—FAILURE TO CALL WITNESS.

Such presumption cannot be used to relieve the plaintiff from the burden of proving his case.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Dec. Dig. § 86.*]

6. ACCOUNT STATED (§ 3*)—PREVIOUS INDEBTEDNESS.

There can be no account stated where there is no pre-existing debt or liability.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Account Stated, Cent. Dig. § 13; Dec. Dig. § 3.*]

7. ACCOUNT STATED (§ 7*)—EFFECT.

An account stated, in the absence of fraud, mistake, error, or omission, determines only the amount of the debt when a liability exists. Alone, it cannot create a liability where none previously existed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Account Stated, Cent. Dig. §§ 41-49; Dec. Dig. § 7.*]

8. ACCOUNT STATED (§ 6*)—IMPLIED ASSENT OF PARTY TO BE CHARGED.

Where there is no pre-existing debt or liability, the rendering of an account, to one who keeps it without objection, does not make an account stated.

On Rehearing.9. RIGHTS OF BROKERS.

The syllabus in this case, reported in 60 W. Va. 648, reconsidered and approved.

Miller, P., dissenting.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from Circuit Court of Upshur County.

Bill by John T. Cooper against E. M. Upton. Decree for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed, and bill dismissed.

Dent & Dent and Jake Fisher, for appellant. Linn, Byrne & Cato, for appellee.

COX, J. This suit in equity, with attachment, was brought by John T. Cooper, of Parkersburg, W. Va., against E. M. Upton, of Rochester, N. Y., in the circuit court of Webster county, to recover 5 per cent. commissions claimed by Cooper upon the sale price of a certain tract of land known as the "Porter" or "Upton" lands, said to contain 10,012 acres, lying in Webster, Randolph, and Pocahontas counties. The cause was removed to, and heard by, the circuit court of Upshur county, resulting in a decree in favor of Cooper for $7,718.25, and costs, with an order of sale of certain real estate levied on to satisfy the decree in favor of Cooper. From this decree, Upton appeals.

The record presents three questions, which will be considered in the following order:

(1) What was the contract, if any, between appellant and appellee in relation to commissions? The contract is disclosed by two letters between the parties—one by appellee to appellant dated November 22, 1900, and a reply thereto by appellant dated November 26, 1900. In the letter of appellee, after naming certain prospective purchasers of the land, he says: "These parties are presented, as are all others, on condition that you secure me in an absolute commission of (5 per cent.) five per cent. in case of sale to or through any of the parties." In the reply of appellant he says: "I have yours of the 22d, and note what you say about the syndicate of eastern and English parties. I will not write these parties at all, but if they want the property at a satisfactory price, we will pay 5 per cent. commissions, although this is an exorbitant price." There was other correspondence between the parties, and their evidence was taken at length, but there is nothing substantially changing the contract as shown by these two letters. The contract in substance was that, if a party or parties presented by appellee wanted to buy the land at a price satisfactory to the owner, the appellee should be paid 5 per centum commissions. Under this contract, before the appellee would be entitled to commission he must substantially perform the contract by presenting or producing a purchaser able, willing, and ready to buy the land at a price satisfactory to the owner. Nichols v. Whitacre (Mo. App.) 87 S. W. 594; Forrester v. Price, 6 Misc. Rep. 308, 26 N. Y. Supp. 799; 23 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 915, 916; 19 Cyc. 240-242; Greene v. Owings, 41 S. W. 264, 19 Ky. Law Rep. 580; Weibler v. Cook (Sup.) 78 N. Y. Supp. 1029; 5 Current Law, 449-451. If the final negotiation resulting in a sale was carried on by the owner and not by the agent, the latter must have been the efficient cause of the negotiation by the purchaser in order to entitle him to commissions. Halterman v. Leining (Sup.) 90 N. Y. Supp. 397.

(2) Did the appellee substantially comply with the contract and thereby become entitled to commissions? At the time of the contract, the records of the counties in which the land was situated showed that appellant was the owner of the land in his own name, and was taxed therewith, but in fact he seems to have held it for the Elk Land & Lumber Company, in which he and others were interested. The sale of the land, at the price upon which appellee claims commissions, was made on the 8th day of April, 1902, through J. K. Moore, of Washington

City, to Arthur Lee, trustee for Henry G. Davis. An agreement or memorandum was on that day entered into by Moore, as agent for the appellant and the other owners of the land, with Lee, trustee, for the sale of the land, at $13 per acre, and $5,000 was then paid by check of Henry G. Davis. On the 16th of May, 1902, those interested in the land or in the Elk Land & Lumber Company, including appellant, entered into a written agreement reciting the facts in relation to the sale, and ratifying and confirming the sale. This sale was carried out in part by deed made the 9th of July, 1903, by appellant and wife, and Lee, trustee, and wife, to Henry G. Davis, whereby the facts in relation to the sale were recited, and 7,528 acres of the land (being the part lying in Randolph and Pocahontas counties) were conveyed to Davis. The deed further provided that the title to the residue of the land (being the part lying in Webster county) should remain in appellant, subject to the contract of sale to Arthur Lee, trustee. It is argued that the said agreement of sale is void, and that its date cannot be taken as the date of the sale, because it was made without authority of the owner or owners of the land. The answer to this is that Moore professed to act for the owner or owners, and that the sale was afterwards ratified and confirmed by the owner or owners, and that conveyance of part of the land was made pursuant to the agreement of sale. Consequently, the 8th of April, 1902, must be taken as the date of the actual sale or contract of sale. Ruffner v. Hewitt, 7 W. Va. 585; Union Bank v. Belrne, 1 Grat. (Va.) 227; Devendorf v. Oil Co., 17 W. Va. 135. The question then is, did the appellee present or produce the purchaser at this sale? The fact that a sale was consummated, and a deed for the land made voluntarily, must be taken as conclusive evidence that the price was satisfactory, and that the purchaser was willing and ready to purchase. 5 Current Law, 450; Marcey v. Whallon, 115 Ill. App. 435; Marks v. Elliot (Sup.) 90 N. Y. Supp. 331; Norman v. Hopper (Wash.) 80 Pac. 551.

The theory of the appellee is that he was the efficient cause of the negotiation and purchase by Davis. He does not claim that he had any correspondence, negotiation, or connection previous to the sale with Davis or Lee directly. He does, however, claim that Henry G. Davis and S. B. Elkins were general business partners, and were partners, or jointly interested, in this purchase at the time it was made, and that his efforts and correspondence with Elkins and with others caused the negotiation and purchase by Davis, and that the purchase by Davis was in fact for Davis and Elkins. That Elkins was interested in the land at a date subsequent to the sale cannot be disputed, but was he interested at the time of the purchase by Davis? This constitutes one of the principal controversies in the case, bearing upon which much of the evidence was introduced. It is not our purpose to detail at length the evidence, but we shall notice some of the salient circumstances and features of the evidence relied upon by the appellee to show that Elkins was interested at the time of the sale, and that the correspondence and efforts of appellee with Elkins caused the negotiation and purchase by Davis.

(a) Appellee insists that, by failing to deny, the appellant has admitted to be true the allegations of the bill that "at and for a long time prior to the date of the execution of said contract (of sale) Henry G. Davis and S. B. Elkins were, and had been, partners in the purchase, development, and sale of large boundaries of coal and timber lands in that section of the state in which the 10,012 acres is situated," and "that it was their custom, where land purchases were made, to take the title thereto in the name of one or the other of said partners for the benefit of both." Turning to the answer, we find that it denies that Davis and Elkins "were jointly beneficiaries," and denies "that the said Davis and Elkins were business partners," and denies "the allegation in said amended bill that it was and is the custom of said Davis to take property in the name of said Elkins or of a trustee for himself and said Elkins for his benefit in any manner." These constitute a substantial denial of the partnership relations between Davis and Elkins alleged in the bill, and throw the burden of proof thereof upon appellee.

(b) It is shown that Henry G. Davis is the father-in-law of S. B. Elkins and Arthur Lee. Of course, standing alone, this is no proof of partnership or of joint interest.

(c) It is shown that both Davis and Elkins were interested in the purchase or ownership of other lands and business enterprises, and that each was interested in, and the owner individually and separately of, other lands. In no case is it shown that Davis and Elkins were partners. No agreement to share profits and losses is shown. The most that can be said of the evidence in this regard is that it shows that in some cases Davis and Elkins were interested in the same properties and business enterprises. Usually, others also were interested with them. In some cases, each was interested alone. This evidence is insufficient to establish that they were interested together in the purchase in question.

(d) With the evidence of appellee, he files his correspondence with Elkins, covering a period from October 30, 1901, to May 12, 1902, inclusive. This correspondence shows that appellee endeavored to interest Elkins in the purchase of this land and other lands, and that Elkins did become interested to the extent of writing a letter to appellee dated January 30, 1902, asking a price on this land or an interest in it, and also asking how long after April 1st appellee could give an option. On May 12, 1902, after inquiry by appellee as to a resale of the land, Elkins wrote to appellee: "We will not sell the Upton tract as we bought it to hold." This letter was a month and four days after the sale in question. It is argued that this letter shows that Elkins was interested in this land. If so, it does not show when and how he became interested, or that he was interested at the time of the purchase by Davis.

(e) The plaintiff testifies that on the 19th of April, 1902, in Washington City, he learned from Arthur Lee that he represented Davis and Elkins in the purchase of West Virginia lands, and that they had just bought the Upton lands; that Davis came into the room at the time, and stated: "We have just bought the Upton lands"—and that later in the same day at the residence of Elkins he stated that "he and Senator Davis had bought the Upton lands." These statements fall short of showing with certainty that Elkins was interested at the time the sale in question was made. They would be equally true if Elkins was not interested at the time of the purchase by Davis, but became interested afterward and before the statements were made. No objection to the Elkins letter and to these statements of Davis, Elkins and Lee was brought to the attention of and passed on by, the lower court. Hence they are before us without objection. We do not deem it necessary to decide that, so far as they are purely hearsay evidence, they have or have not any probative force, for the reason that, if given full credit, they fall, in our judgment, to establish with certainty the fact sought to be established.

(f) It is shown that appellant had learned from a third party, before the time of the transactions here involved, that Davis and Elkins were trying to buy land in that section of the state. On April 3, 1902, appellee wrote to appellant saying: "I would advise you to keep matters warm with Senator Elkins, as I believe that he and his associates are in a position to afford to pay a much higher price than any one else." No one is named in this letter except Elkins. Who else was intended by the writer by the phrase "he and his associates"? Certainly only some person or persons who would be interested with Elkins in the purchase of the land. Before the phrase can be taken as a presentation of Davis, it must be shown that he was interested with Elkins in the purchase of this land. It is unreasonable to say that the writer of this letter intended by that phrase to present a person not interested with, but who acted independently of, Elkins, and with whom the writer had no correspondence, negotiation, or connection.

(g) It is shown that appellee made a general effort, by correspondence and otherwise, to make a market for this and other lands. He claims that such general effort caused the negotiation and purchase by Davis. The connection between the general effort and this particular negotiation and sale is not shown. The conclusion is not warranted that any general effort of the appellee caused the negotiation and purchase by Davis. Halterman v. Leining, supra.

Considering all the circumstances and evidence relied upon by appellee, they fail to show that Elkins was interested at the time of the sale in question, or that appellee's efforts with Elkins or others caused the sale to Davis. Many of the circumstances are consistent with the hypothesis that Elkins was interested at the time of the sale, but they are not of that conclusive and convincing nature necessary to prove with certainty a fact. Generally they are consistent with the hypothesis that Elkins first acquired an interest after the sale in question.

It is insisted that there is a presumption against the appellant, who was the defendant below, because of his failure to call J. K. Moore as a witness. If we are correct in our view that the plaintiff did not make a prima facie case, then no presumption can arise against the defendant for failing to call Moore or any other person to testify. No duty or natural motive can be attributed to a defendant to call witnesses until there is a prima facie case against him. The basis of a presumption against a party for failure to produce evidence peculiarly within his power is the natural motive which he is supposed to possess to produce evidence in his favor. Hence the law raises the presumption that, if he does not follow such natural motive, it is because the evidence would, if produced, be against him. The force of the presumption depends upon, and corresponds in degree to, the force of the motive. If there can be no natural motive to produce, there can be no presumption against the party for failure to produce. Such presumption cannot take the place of proof on the part of the other party carrying the burden of proof. Stout v. Sands, 56 W. Va. 683, 49 S. E. 428; Whart. Ev. § 1267; 16 Cyc. 1064; Diel v. Mo. Pac. Ry., 37 Mo. App. 454. See, also, Union Trust Co. v. McClellan, 40 W. Va. 405, 21 S. E. 1025; Garber v. Blatchley, 51 W. Va. 147, 41 S. E. 222; Vandervort v. Fouse, 52 W. Va. 214, 43 S. E. 112; Wells-Stone Co. v. Truax, 44 W. Va. 531, 29 S. E. 1006; Heffebower v. Detrich, 27 W. Va. 18; Dewing v. Hutton, 43 W. Va. 576, 37 S. E. 670; Wheeling v. Hauley, 18 W. Va. 472; Robinson v. Woodford, 37 W. Va. 377, 16 S. E. 602. Other reasons, which many authorities hold sufficient to prevent the raising of a presumption, exist in this case. So far as the evidence discloses, the witness Moore was at Washington City and out of the jurisdiction of the court. Also his evidence, if favorable to appellant, could not have been superior to the evidence of Davis and Lee taken for him, but simply corroborative as to the main questions in issue. It is obvious that the presumption cannot be raised against appellant for failing to call Moore as a witness. 1 Wig. Ev. 285-288. In this case the appellant did not rest upon the failure of the appellee to make a prima facie case. If it might be said that appellee did make a prima facie case, then we have the evidence of Henry G. Davis and Arthur Lee, taken for appellant, positively to the effect that Elkins was not interested in the sale in question at the time it took place, but that Elkins became interested subsequently, and that appellee was not instrumental in causing the negotiation resulting in the sale to Davis. Davis and Lee say that Lee, trustee, acted in the original purchase for Davis alone, and that the purchase was for Davis alone. Unquestionably this evidence overcomes any tendency which might be attributed to the evidence and circumstances in the opposite direction. This court will reverse a decree of the circuit court, determining a question of fact on conflicting evidence, where it clearly appears that the decree is against the weight and preponderance of the evidence. Wallace v. Douglass, 58 W. Va. 102, 51 S. E. 869. It is clear to us that it does not appear that appellee substantially complied with his contract and thereby became entitled to commissions.

(3) Is the appellee entitled to recover upon an account stated? By consent, appellee amended his bill so as to set up an account stated, based upon a letter written by him to appellant dated April 19, 1902. The letter is as follows: "Mr. E. M. Upton, Rochester, N. Y.—Dear Sir: I learned to-day that Senator Elkins and associates have taken over the ten thousand and twelve acres. Thus you will see that (notwithstanding the statement made in one of your recent letters that you did not think the Senator meant business) I have succeeded in interesting him to the point of buying. You will remember that, according to our agreement, my commission of five per cent. was to become payable upon execution of the contract of sale. This, on a basis of fifteen dollars per acre, the price named by you verbally in Rochester last September, would amount to $7,500. Please bear this fact in mind, for I will hold you to your agreement strictly. Yours truly, John T. Cooper." This letter was not replied to by appellant, but he retained the letter without objection to its contents. If we are correct in holding that the appellee did not show himself entitled to commissions under the contract, then the question of account stated is solved. To make an account stated so as to evidence indebtedness, there must be two parties, a debtor and a creditor. 1 Cyc. 365. There must be a pre-existing indebtedness, or there is no account to state. Hopkins v. Logan, 5 M. & W. 241; Lubbock v. Tribe, 3 M. & W. 606; Tucker v. Barrow, 7 B. & A. 624; Lemere v. Elliott, 5 H. & N. 656; 2 Chitty on Cont. 961, 962; 2 Chitty, Pl. (16th Ed.) 32; Mellon v. Campbell, 11 Pa. 415; Zacarino v. Pallotti, 49 Conn. 38; Van

E. 537; 1 Am. & Eng. Enc. Pl. & Pr. 87; Powers v. Ins. Co. (Vt.) 35 Atl. 331. "Now to make an account stated the account must be stated with reference to a debt at the time due and owing." Baron Parke, in Gough v. Findon, 7 Exc. 48-50. An account stated, in the absence of fraud, mistake, error, or omission, determines only the amount of the debt where a liability exists. It cannot be made the instrument to create per se a liability where none previously existed. 1 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 440; Davis v. Bank, 19 Wash. 65, 52 Pac. 526. Where there is no pre-existing debt or liability, the rendering of an account, to one who keeps it without objection, does not make an account stated. 1 Cyc. 380; Davis v. Bank, supra. These principles apply where it is sought to establish an indebtedness by means of an account stated. It may be said that some cases indicate that, without fraud, mistake, error, or omission, the correctness of the items of the original debt must be taken as shown by the stated account. But this statement must not be taken to mean that the previous transactions cannot be investigated so far as to ascertain whether or not the relationship of debtor and creditor existed previous to the account stated. An examination of our cases will show that they are consistent with the principles above stated. Where the doctrine of account stated or account settled has been applied, it has been in those cases in which there was a previous indebtedness or liability. See Townes v. Birchett, 12 Leigh (Va.) 173; Lyne v. Gilliat, 3 Call (Va.) 5; Mertens v. Nottebohm, 4 Grat. (Va.) 163; McNeel v. Baker, 6 W. Va. 153; Ruffner v. Hewitt, 7 W. Va. 585; *Robertson v. For the reasons stated, the decree complained of is reversed, and the bill dismissed.

On Rehearing.

WILLIAMS, J. This case is reported in 60 W. Va. 648 (see page 523, ante), and will be found therein stated. Counsel for appellee, in their supplemental petition for rehearing, assign eight reasons why a rehearing should be had, and the former decree of this court reversed, and the decree of the lower court affirmed. These will be noted in their order.

First. This assignment refers only to the oral argument made in this court by counsel for appellant, which counsel for appellee says was done in violation of an understanding between them that the case was to be submitted on briefs alone. It does not go to the merits of the controversy.

Second. It is insisted that this court should not have held that the sale of the land was made by Moore to Lee, trustee for Davis, on the 8th day of April, 1902. If the sale was not made on this day, there is no evidence that it was made on any other particular day. A certified copy of the contract entered into by J. K. Moore, as agent for E. M. Upton, and Arthur Lee, trustee, bears date on April 8, 1902. It is signed by J. K. Moore, agent, and is acknowledged by him before, a notary public in the city of Washington on the 24th day of April, 1902, and was recorded in Webster county on May 8, 1902. The copy in the record is an attested copy by the clerk of the county court. It is presumed to have been executed on the day of its date, and the record furnishes no evidence to overcome this presumption. The day of its date, rather than the day of its acknowledgment, will be taken as the actual date of execution. Ferguson v. Bond, 39 W. Va. 561, 20 S. E. 591. According to appellee's contention it must have been executed before the 19th, because on that day he says he learned of the sale; and, if executed on any day before the acknowledgment, why not on the 8th. There is no evidence of any other date. Moore embodies the following language in the contract of sale: "My authority for signing this agreement of sale is letters and a telegram from E. M. Upton, dated Rochester, N. Y., April 7, 1902, addressed to me, and which reads as follows: 'Close deal at thirteen dollars net to us, if five thousand dollars is deposited in some bank as trustee.'"

It is insisted that the agreement of May 16, 1902, does not refer to the sale on the 8th of April. But we can hardly see how this omission to mention the date of the sale would be evidence of the date. It neither proves, nor disproves, that the sale was on April 8th. It does not bear on the point. The agreement of May 16, 1902, was entered into between E. M. Upton, who held the legal title to the lands, and five others, who were interested as owners with him, for the purpose of ratifying the sale which had been made by Upton to Lee, as trustee of Henry G. Davis. It recites that the sale had been made "with the concurrence and assent of all of the owners of the land, with the exception of John T. McGraw," and seems to have been made for the purpose of showing his assent to the sale which he had theretofore objected to; he being one of the owners. It does not refer to the sale to Lee by any date. This agreement simply ratifies a sale made by Upton to Lee, trustee, and there is no contention that Upton made more than one sale to him. The plaintiff says that he was in Washington, D. C., on the 19th of April, 1902, and learned from Arthur Lee that he represented Senator Davis and S. B. Elkins in the purchase of West Virginia lands, and that they had just bought the

"Upton lands." He also says: "A little later Henry G. Davis came into the room and stated: 'We have just bought the Upton lands.'" He further states that later on the same day he was at the residence of Senator Elkins, and that "he stated to me in so many words that he and Senator Davis had bought the Upton lands." Suppose this testimony were admissible, it certainly would not disprove the fact that the sale was made on April 8, 1902.

Third. It is claimed by counsel for appellee that the record makes out a partnership, or joint interest, between Davis and Elkins at the time of the purchase. This fact he says is not sufficiently denied in the answer, and is therefore virtually admitted. But we find the answer to contain the following denial: "But he denies that Stephen B. Elkins and Henry G. Davis were jointly beneficiaries, or that said Elkins was in any manner interested with the said Davis, or that any other person participated with him as a sole cestui que trust, or that said Davis and Elkins were business partners." And in another part of his answer he avers that Davis bought the land for himself, and that "prior to the purchase there was no understanding or agreement between the said Davis and Elkins respecting said lands." A denial of the allegation that Elkins was interested with Davis in the purchase could scarcely be framed in more explicit and unequivocal terms.

Upton states in his deposition that the land was sold through Moore, who was acting for him and his associates. Senator Davis, in his deposition, says that Lee negotiated the purchase for him, and that he bought the lands for him (Davis); that during the negotiation no one was interested with him. He further says that, while he had never been on the lands, he had known of them for some 15 years prior to that time, and that at the time of the purchase Senator Elkins had nothing to do with the sale or the purchase, but that he afterwards became interested in it. Mr. Lee testifies that his attention was called to these lands by a letter from Mr. Moore, received early in the year 1902, and that he then opened negotiations with Mr. Moore, which resulted in the purchase of the tract by Senator Davis at $13 an acre; that, if Senator Elkins had any interest in it, he did not know of it. Mr. John T. McGraw testifies that "Senator Davis knew these lands well," and had talked to him several times about them. The evidence proves that Davis and Elkins were jointly interested in large bodies of lands in West Virginia, and in large business enterprises, and from this we are asked to infer that they were jointly interested in the purchase of the Upton land. But the record shows that each of them is either the sole owner of, or is interested in, large bodies of land and enterprises in West Virginia, in which the other has no interest whatever. The declarations of Lee, Davis, and Elkins, made to plaintiff on the 19th day of April, 1902, even if admissible testimony, are not necessarily inconsistent with the fact that Davis bought the lands on his own account. The evidence does not show when Senator Elkins acquired an interest; but the positive statement of Senator Davis proves that it was after he had bought of Upton.

Before plaintiff can recover he must prove that his correspondence and conversations with Senator Elkins were instrumental in bringing about the sale. The burden is on him to prove all facts material to his case. This important fact cannot be established by vague and uncertain inferences. Any inference that Elkins was jointly interested in the purchase, which might arise from the fact that he is shown to have, subsequently, an interest in the land, and from the further fact that Elkins and Davis were jointly interested in other large bodies of land, is certainly rebutted and overcome by the direct, positive, and unequivocal testimony of Senator Davis to the contrary. Furthermore, Senator Elkins, if plaintiff's contention be true, was a very material witness in his behalf. Why did he not take his testimony? It would have relieved the case from all doubt as to whether or not the purchase from Upton was brought about as a result of the correspondence and conversations between plaintiff and Senator Elkins. But he has given no excuse for not having taken his testimony. The presumption of law, therefore, is that, if he had testified, his testimony would have been against, rather than in favor of, plaintiff. Vandervort v. Fouse, 52 W. Va. 214, 43 S. E. 112; Garber v. Blatchley, 51 W. Va. 147, 41 S. E. 222; Dewing v. Hutton, 48 W. Va. 576, 37 S. E. 670; Union Trust Co. v. McClellan, 40 W. Va. 405, 21 S. E. 1025; Wells-Stone Mercantile Co. v. Truax, 44 W. Va. 531, 29 S. E. 1006; and Despard v. Percy (decided at the present term) 63 S. E. 871.

Fourth. This assignment applies to the amount of plaintiff's commissions, and is not important, since his case fails for want of proof that he found a purchaser. However, we do not doubt but that the numerous letters which passed between plaintiff and defendant relating to the sale of the land established a contract between them as to the compensation in the event plaintiff had found a purchaser. But, in addition to proving the contract, it was necessary to prove services rendered under it, and herein we think lies the weakness of plaintiff's case.

Fifth. Plaintiff insists that Upton had constructive notice that Davis and Elkins were jointly interested in the purchase, and that a prima facie case for plaintiff was thus made, casting the burden of proof on defendant. The evidence shows that Upton had authorized Moore to sell the land at the price of $13 an acre net to him and his associates, and that he did not know to whom Moore had sold it until after the sale was made; nor do we see any reason why Upton would have been specially interested in knowing this, as long as he was satisfied the purchase price was properly secured and he would get his money.

Plaintiff did not have exclusive right to sell this land. He had no option on it, because Upton had refused to give him an option. The only contract between plaintiff and defendant was the one to be gathered from the numerous letters, and which is to the effect that, if plaintiff would find a purchaser who would buy the land at a price satisfactory to the owners, he would be paid a commission for doing so. Upton still had the right to employ other brokers at the same time to find a purchaser for the same land, and the law would hold him liable to pay only the one who first found him a purchaser able and willing to buy at a price satisfactory to him. In 19 Cyc. 260, the law is thus stated: "Where several brokers are employed to negotiate the same transaction, the one who first succeeds is entitled to the full commission. Where property is placed with several brokers for sale, the owner is bound to pay the broker who in fact effects the sale; and the commission belongs to the one who first procures a contract of sale, although the other first procures a conveyance. If several brokers are employed to effect the same transaction in behalf of their principal, the one who is the procuring cause of the transaction is entitled to the commission."

Upton appears to have employed two brokers to find a purchaser—the plaintiff, who lived in Parkersburg, and one J. K. Moore, who lived in Washington, D. C. But it does not appear that either knew of the other's employment. Lee says he was acting for Davis in the purchase, and that his attention was first called to the lands by a letter from said Moore early in 1902; that he replied to the letter, asking for description, which was furnished to him, and he thereupon called it to the attention of Senator Davis; and that negotiations finally resulted in a purchase of the lands by Davis at the price of $13 an acre. Now, upon this state of facts, how can it be said that the plaintiff was the moving cause of the sale, or that the correspondence which he had had previous to that time with Senator Elkins had any influence whatever in bringing about the sale. It cannot be said, except upon pure inference drawn from the relationship and business connection existing between Davis and Elkins; and, as before stated, this inference is overcome by direct and positive testimony.

In fact, the correspondence introduced by plaintiff does not show that Senator Elkins was ready to buy, or that he even wanted to buy, the land as late as March 27, 1902, because plaintiff on that date wrote to Upton, stating that Senator Elkins wanted, by the 1st of April, to know the price, and wanted sufficient time to make examination of the land and the title. On the next day Upton replied to plaintiff that he had not taken the matter up with Elkins, that he would not be able to do so for some days, stating that there were other parties who wanted to buy the property, and that it was hard to deal with three or four at the same time. In answer to this letter plaintiff again wrote Upton on April 3d, advising him "to keep matters warm with Senator Elkins." He also says in this letter that Senator Elkins preferred to get a price of the land through him (plaintiff). On the 5th of April Upton answered this letter, and, among other things, said: "I am negotiating with other parties just at present, and am not at liberty to do anything with you. Perhaps I will be able to take the matter up with you in about ten days' time." On the 15th of April, in answer to a letter of the 12th, he again wrote the plaintiff, advising him that he thought some disposition had been made of the land.

Does this evidence not show that defendant was dealing altogether with Moore in making the sale, and not with plaintiff? He advised him several days before the sale that he was dealing with other parties, and also advised him that he could not take the matter up with him on that account until he was through negotiating with the other parties. It was not incumbent on him to advise him who the other parties were. He may not have known himself, as the negotiations seem to have been carried on through his broker, Moore. But it is argued that Moore was only the agent of Davis, and not the agent of Upton. There is no proof of this, except the fact that Lee says Davis paid Moore his commission; but if Moore was acting as a broker, simply bringing the parties together, and was not vested with any discretion as to the price and terms of the sale to be made to purchaser, the fact that he received his commission from Davis would be perfectly consistent with his relation to Upton. He was authorized by Upton to close the deal at the price of $13 an acre, net to him and his associates, and if he got this price it was immaterial to Upton how much Moore made out of the transaction, or from whom he collected his pay. 19 Cyc. 234; 1 A. & E. E. L. 1074; Clark & Skyles on Agency, 823, 1689; Reynolds v. Tompkins, 23 W. Va. 229; Nolte v. Hulbert, 37 Ohio St. 445; Clark v. Allen, 125 Cal. 276, 57 Pac. 985; Rupp v. Sampson, 16 Gray (Mass.) 398, 77 Am. Dec. 416; Knauss v. Brewing Co., 142 N. Y. 70, 36 N. E. 867; Montross v. Eddy, 94 Mich. 100, 53 N. W. 916, 34 Am. St. Rep. 823; Cox v. Haun, 127 Ind. 325, 26 N. E. 822; Orton v. Scofield, 61 Wis. 382, 21 N. W. 261; Mullen v. Keetzle & Lampton, 7 Bush (Ky.) 253.

Sixth. It is claimed that Upton practiced a fraud upon Cooper by "so juggling existing conditions as to rob Cooper of the portion justly due him," after Upton had seen that Cooper's work was about to result in a sale. This point, we think, is fully answered by the opinion on the other points, because, if plaintiff has failed to make out a case entitling him to recovery in any event, there can be no fraud. There can be no fraud where there are no rights violated. If he is not entitled to recover upon his contract and services rendered, the question of fraud has no bearing on the case; and the same reasons which show that he is not entitled to recovery also show the absence of fraud.

It is insisted that plaintiff has made out a prima facie case by proving his contract with Upton, and by proving that he found for him a purchaser who was able, willing, and ready to buy the land at a satisfactory price. But in order to support this contention it is necessary to assume one of two things, namely, either that Elkins and Davis were jointly interested in the purchase made by Lee, trustee, in which case the price at which the land was actually sold proves that the price was satisfactory to the seller, or, if they were not jointly interested in the purchase, then that Elkins was able, ready, and willing to buy at a price satisfactory to the seller. We have already said that joint interest at the time of the purchase by Davis was not proven; and as to what Elkins was willing to pay for the land the record is absolutely silent. On the 11th of March, 1902, plaintiff wrote defendant that he believed "the senator would examine the property under a 60-day option at $15 per acre." But there is no evidence in the record that any price was ever stated to him, or that he expressed a willingness to buy it at any price. Neither does the record disclose what price he paid for the interest which he acquired from Senator Davis after the sale.

The eighth point relied on is that there is a legal presumption in favor of the correctness of the decree of the lower court, which operates in this instance in favor of appellee. This is a well-established rule in this state; but it is not superior to another rule, announced equally as often by this court, which is that, when the decree of the lower court is plainly wrong, it should be reversed. It is not so much a case of conflict of testimony as it is a case lacking in sufficient proof to establish plaintiff's claim, even admitting the truth of all his testimony, which we have done in reaching our conclusion.

We think it was error to decree a recovery in favor of plaintiff on the proof, and will reverse the decree appealed from, and will enter in this court such decree as the court below should have entered, which is that the plaintiff's attachment be quashed and his bill dismissed.

WEST VIRGINIA NAT. BANK v.
DUNKLE.(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Feb. 23, 1909. Rehearing Denied
May 12, 1909.)

1. TAXATION (§ 365*)—DISCRIMINATION—NATIONAL BANK STOCK — "OTHER MONEYPED CAPITAL"—DEDUCTION OF DEBTS—STATUTORY PROVISIONS.

Before a state statute denying right in taxation to deduct debts from stock in national banks assessed with taxes, but allowing such deduction from other investments, can be held as in violation of section 5219, Rev. St. U. S. (U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3502), prohibiting a state from taxing such stock at a greater rate than is assessed on other moneyed capital in the hands of individual citizens, it must appear that such other moneyed capital exists and in such amount as to operate as a discrimination against such banks, and that it is of such character as to come in competition with national banks.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Taxation, Cent. Dig. § 608; Dec. Dig. § 365.*]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 6, p. 5087.]

2. MANDAMUS (§ 16*)—WHEN GRANTED—INEFFICACY OF WRIT.

A peremptory mandamus will not go to compel an assessor to allow a deduction of debts from an assessment of stock in a national bank if at the hearing of the case the assessor had already delivered the personal property book to the sheriff.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mandamus, Cent. Dig. § 48; Dec. Dig. § 16.*]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Petition of the West Virginia National Bank for writ of mandamus to B. C. Dunkle, assessor. Mandamus refused.

Vinson & Thompson, Mollohan, McClintic & Mathews, and Holt & Duncan, for petitioner. W. G. Conley and T. C. Townsend, for respondent.

BRANNON, J. Certain stockholders of the West Virginia National Bank at Huntington, when giving in their personal property for taxation for 1908 to the assessor, petitioned him to allow them to deduct from their stock bona fide debts which they owed; but the assessor refused to do so on the ground that section 79, c. 80, p. 372, Acts 1907, provides that no deduction shall be allowed from the valuation of shares of stock in a bank company, trust company, or national banking association on account of debts. The said bank at the instance of said stockholders asks of this court a mandamus to compel the assessor to allow such deduction of debts.

The chief reliance of the bank for a mandamus is that the act denying such deduction violates a federal statute (section 5219, Rev. St. U. S. [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3502]), which allows the states to tax stock in national banks, provided "that the taxation shall not be at a greater rate than is assessed upon other moneyed capital in the hands of individual citizens of such state." We do not pass upon the question of the validity of section 79, tested by the said federal statute, because we do not think that the record presents a case calling upon us to pass upon that question. In the first place, it is not proven that there is any amount of moneyed capital in the assessment district to come in competition with national banks. The mandamus nisi awarded in this case does give certain amounts of such moneyed capital other than that invested in national banks; but the return of the assessor denies that such capital exists, and calls for proof thereof, and no proof of the existence of such capital or its amount is furnished. Again, there must be proof, even if there be such capital, that it comes in competition with the business of national banks; for all such capital does not do so. The object of the federal statute is to prevent injury to the national bank stock by discriminating against it in favor of money otherwise invested, since, if national bank stock is taxed and other moneyed capital is not taxed, people would not invest in the stock of national banks, and their efficiency would be injured. It must be made to appear that such moneyed capital does exist, and that from it debts may be deducted. As just stated, there is no proof even of that indispensable fact. Moreover, it is not enough to show that such untaxed moneyed capital exists, but it must be shown that it "is so large and substantial as to amount to an illegal discrimination against national bank shareholders, in violation of the provision of Rev. St. § 5219." First Nat. Bank v. Ayers, 160 U. S. 660, 16 Sup. Ct. 412, 40 L. Ed. 578. In that case the court said (page 667) that there was no proof that the moneyed capital of Kansas from which debts might be deducted as compared with moneyed capital in shares of national banks "was so large and substantial as to amount to an illegal discrimination against national bank shareholders." And the court said that it could not take judicial notice that such was the fact. Boyer v. Boyer, 113 U. S. 689, 5 Sup. Ct. 706, 28 L. Ed. 1069, says that untaxed capital must be "a very material part, relatively, of other moneyed capital in the hands of individual citizens." As I have said, there is no proof in this case that any such moneyed capital exists in Cabell county coming in competition with national banks or the amount thereof. Moreover, for a state assessment to be in violation of the said federal statute, it must be made to appear that such other moneyed capital comes in competition with that of national banks. It must be made to appear that it is composed of investments of that character which will enable us to see and say that it does compete with the capital of national banks; for it is well settled that if it be in railroad investments or insurance investments—in other words, in any investments that do not come in competition with national banks—the state law allowing deduction or debts therefrom does not violate said federal statutes. In Nat. Bank of Wellington v. Chapman, 173 U. S. 205, 19 Sup. Ct. 407, 43 L. Ed. 669, the court said that it could not for proof look to the state auditor's report, and further said: "However, if we were to look at this report, we should then see that the total credits do not show what portion of those credits consist of moneyed capital in the hands of individuals which in fact enters into competition for business with national banks. It is only that kind of moneyed capital which this court in its decisions above cited holds is moneyed capital within the meaning of the act of Congress." In Aberdeen Bank v. Chehalis County, 166 U. S. 440, 17 Sup. Ct. 629, 41 L. Ed. 1069, the court held that "money invested in corporations or in individual enterprises that carry on the business of railroads, of manufacturing enterprises, mining investments, and investments in mortgages does not come into competition with the business of national banks, and is therefore not within the meaning of the provision of Rev. St. § 5219, forbidding state taxation of its shares at a greater rate than is assessed upon other moneyed capital in the hands of citizens of the state." In Commercial Bank v. Chambers, 182 U. S. 556, 21 Sup. Ct. 863, 45 L. Ed. 1227, the court referred to the cases of First Nat. Bank v. Ayers and First Nat. Bank of Aberdeen v. Chehalis County, and said: "Those decisions held that the term 'moneyed capital,' as employed in section 5219 of the Revised Statutes, forbidding greater taxation of shareholders of national banks than is imposed on other moneyed capital, does not include capital which does not come into competition with the business of national banks, and that it must be satisfactorily made to appear by proof that the moneyed capital claimed to be given an unjust advantage is of the character just stated. First National Bank of Wellington v. Chapman, 173 U. S. 205, 219, 19 Sup. Ct. 407, 43 L. Ed. 669, and cases cited." In our case we are hardly able to say that the alternative writ alleges that the untaxed moneyed capital comes in competition with the plaintiff national bank. The allegation of that fact is not specific or clear; but, treating it as an allegation of such competition, it is denied by the return, and there is not proof of the fact that such moneyed capital does compete with said bank. Therefore, under those federal cases, the plaintiff's case fails for want of proof of the particular fact of competition. As I said above, there is, indeed, no proof that there is any such exempted moneyed capital, and, if there is no such capital, there can be no such competition; but in addition, even if we could say that there is any such capital, there is no proof that any of it, or any material part of it, comes in such competition. Therefore the plaintiff has not made a case giving it the benefit of the said national law. Gray in Limitations of Taxing Power, § 806, says that "other moneyed capital under the federal statute 'means' only capital which comes into business competition with national banking capital and does not mean every form of monetary investment," and cites many authorities.

Another reason exists for refusal of the mandamus. It is this: The mandamus nisi was served upon Assessor Dunkle on the 22d day of August, 1908, and was returnable the 2d day of September, 1908. We heard the case on the 26th day of January, 1909. Code 1899, c. 29, § 119 (Code 1906, § 806), requires the assessor to deliver to the sheriff for collection of the taxes the personal property books not later than the 1st of September, and to deliver to the auditor a copy of the books not later than the 1st day of October. If we go upon presumption, the tax book was delivered to the sheriff for collection of the taxes not later than the 1st of September. The return, if it be evidence, states that delivery of the tax book was made to the sheriff on the 20th day of September. So, when we heard this case, the assessor had parted with the possession of the tax book. He was powerless to do anything to make any changes in it. His function as to it had ceased. Code 1899, c. 29, § 128 (Code 1906, § 814) provides that, "after the copies of the land or personal property books shall have been verified and delivered, no alteration shall be made in them or either of them, affecting the taxes of that year." We held in State v. County Court, 47 W. Va. 672, 35 S. E. 959, that "mandamus will not go if it would prove fruitless or impossible of performance, or beyond the power or means of the party to whom it is directed to perform its command." So it is held in Hall v. Staunton, 55 W. Va. 684, 47 S. E. 265. Such appears to be the general rule. 9 Va. & W. Va. Encyclopedic Digest, 518; 26 Cyc. 147. "Mandamus will not go to a board of supervisors requiring them to make corrections in the assessment of taxes in their county after the assessments have been completed and warrants have been issued to the receiver of taxes, and the matter has passed beyond the control of the supervisors, since the writ would be nugatory if issued, and the rule is well established that mandamus will never issue when it would be nugatory from want of power in the respondents to perform the act required." High's Extra. L. Remedies, § 140; also Wise v. Bigger, 79 Va. 277. To the same effect Spelling on Injunctions and Extra. Rem. § 1521. In Gather v. Tax Collector, 40 La. Ann. 362, 4 South. 210, it is held that: "Mandamus will not go to the board of commissioners after the levy of the tax has been completed, the tax has been extended on the assessment roll, and the roll placed in the possession of the tax collector for collection, because it would be nugatory for want of power in such board to make the correction that is required; it being functus officio. * * * Once a tax is in esse, the tax roll placed in the hands of the tax collector, and the levying and assessing officer have become functus officio, the legality of such tax cannot be tested with the collector alone." I find in People v. Supervisor, 12 Barb. (N. Y.) 217, this: "It must also appear that the defendant yet has it in his power to perform the duty required of him; for the court will refuse the writ if it be manifest that it would be vain and fruitless." In State v. Perrine, 34 N. J. Law, 254, it is held that a writ of mandamus will not be allowed unless the act to be done is legally possible before the writ issued. In Stacy v. Hammon, 96 Ga. 125, 23 S. E. 77, it is held that, when at the time of the hearing of a mandamus the time had passed within which the official duty could be performed, no mandamus could issue, as it cannot be granted when it is manifest that for any cause the writ would be nugatory or fruitless. If this mandamus should issue, it would require the assessor to change the tax book, and violate the statute above cited. Mandamus will not go to enforce an officer to violate the law. Whether the assessor did right or wrong in delivering the book to the sheriff pending this writ, he did so, and thus became powerless to act. The mandamus nisi had no effect as an injunction or supersedeas to prevent the assessor from delivering the book without an order to stay him from so doing contained in the mandamus nisi, as was the case in Alderson v. Commissioner, 31 W. Va. 633, 8 S. E. 214. I would very much question whether any such staying order should be made operating to stay indefinitely the delivery of the tax books by the assessor, and thus it might be stop the wheels of state and county government. I doubt whether this remedy of mandamus lies in such a case as this, especially a few days before the time for the delivery of the books to the sheriff. It seems to me that the party must resort to some other remedy.

There is another reason for denying the mandamus, and that is under the well-known rule that it will not lie where there is other adequate remedy. Section 129, c. 29, Code 1899 (Code 1906, § 815), gives any person aggrieved by any entry on the tax books right to go before the county court and ask a correction of his assessment, and, in case of refusal, to go by appeal to the circuit court. If it be said that this is not an adequate remedy for want of an appeal from the circuit to the Supreme Court, I would reply that the action of the county and circuit courts in such matters, being of administrative or taxing jurisdiction, not judicial, would not be res judicata or preclude other appropriate remedy.

Under these rules, it is unnecessary to say whether the act of the Legislature forbidding the deduction of debts from national bank stock is in violation of the state Constitution, providing that taxation shall be equal and uniform, and all property shall be taxed in proportion to its value. The rule is that courts will not pass upon the constitutionality or validity of a legislative act when the case can be decided on other grounds.

For these reasons, we refuse the peremptory mandamus.

CROSS et al. v. GALL et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
March 9, 1909. Rehearing Denied
May 12, 1909.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 518*) — RECORD — PLEADING.

A demurrer to a bill contained in the body of an answer thereto, but not filed by any order in the cause, or in any other way called to the attention of the court, will be treated as a fugitive paper.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Dec. Dig. § 518.*]

2. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE (§ 93*)—PLEADING —SET-OFF.

Although section 2006, Code 1906, relating to actions before a justice, provides that "If the defendant, at the time the plaintiff's action is commenced, has any credit, or set-off, or counterclaim to allege in defense or reduction of plaintiff's demand, and be personally served with process in the suit, or appear and answer the action, he shall produce the same, with his evidence in support thereof, in the cause, or be forever precluded from maintaining any action for the recovery thereof," it has application only to such set-off as defendant has right in law, and is bound by the statute, to interpose as a defense to plaintiff's action.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Justices of the Peace, Cent. Dig. § 326; Dec. Dig. § 93.*]

3. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE (§ 93*)—PLEADING —SET-OFF.

The general rule is that such set-off must be due in the same right and between the same parties, and a defendant in an action before a justice cannot be compelled to set off against plaintiff's demand against him a joint note of plaintiff and a third person held by him, although it be proven on the trial that the plaintiff is principal and such third person surety only in said note.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Justices of the Peace, Cent. Dig. § 326; Dec. Dig. § 93.*]

4. PRINCIPAL AND SURETY (§ 144*)—DEFENSES BY SURETY—SET-OFF.

Section 3890, Code 1906, which provides that, "Although the claim of the plaintiff be jointly against several persons, and the set-off is of a debt, not to all, but only a part of them, this section shall extend to such set-off, if it appear that the persons against whom such claim is, stand in the relation of principal and surety and the person entitled to the set-off is principal," has no application to any case except to a joint suit against principal and sureties, particularly covered thereby.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Principal and Surety, Cent. Dig. §§ 393-396; Dec. Dig. § 144.*]

5. SET-OFF AND COUNTERCLAIM (§ 22*)—ACTION ON SECURED DEBT—RIGHT OF SET-OFF.

Although a debt be secured by a deed of trust and capable of being rendered certain, yet the debtor is not, as in case of a debt reduced to judgment, precluded from offsetting against such debt a demand against his creditor, if such demand be certain and fixed in amount.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Set-Off and Counterclaim, Cent. Dig. § 26; Dec. Dig. § 22.*]

6. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE (§ 125*)—JUDGMENT—ENTRY.

Where a judgment, in an action tried before a justice, is rendered and publicly announced by the justice on the day and at the close of the trial, or within 24 hours after trial, as required by statute, although the clerical work of entering the judgment upon his docket be not performed until a few days thereafter, the statute is substantially complied with. Affirming Packet Co. v. Bellville, 55 W. Va. 560; 47 S. E. 301, and Bank v. Wood, 60 W. Va. 617, 55 S. E. 753.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Justices of the Peace, Cent. Dig. § 395; Dec. Dig. 125.*]

7. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE (§§ 119, 128*)—JUDGMENT—VALIDITY—CORRECTION.

The judgment of a justice, though erroneous, is not void for offsetting against plaintiff's demand against defendant, and without his consent, and against his protest, a joint note of plaintiff and a third person held by defendant, and such erroneous judgment can be corrected only upon appeal, if an appellate court would have jurisdiction thereof, and a court of equity has no jurisdiction in a suit by or against such defendant to correct such erroneous judgment against him.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from Circuit Court, Barbour County.

Bill by Charles Cross and others against Isora Gall and others. Decree for plaintiffs, and defendant Gall appeals. Affirmed.

J. Hop Woods, for appellant. W. T. George, for appellees.

MILLER, P. The decree appealed from perpetually enjoins defendants, Isora V. Gall and Charles F. Teter, trustee, from enforcing and canceling and annulling a deed of trust executed April 29, 1889, by Nancy and Charles Cross, purporting to secure payment of their note of same date, at one year, to the order of George W. Gall, Sr., for $115, with interest, and by an indorsement thereon by him, March 12, 1899, assigned to his daughter, the defendant Isora V. Gall.

The principal grounds for relief alleged in plaintiffs' bill are: That in a prior civil action before a justice brought by plaintiff Charles Cross against defendant Isora V. Gall, upon an account, she had been charged with a cash payment on said note of $100 of April 4, 1902, and given credit for the residue thereof, with interest, and judgment given against her for the balance of $6, found by the justice in his favor, with interest and costs, whereby said note had been fully paid off and discharged, and the rights of the parties in relation thereto fully adjudicated, and which judgment remained in full force, unappealed from and unreversed, whereby said Isora V. Gall was estopped and concluded from enforcing said trust. The transcript from the docket of said justice exhibited with the bill shows that defendant appeared in person and by counsel, filed a plea in writing that she did not owe the plaintiff the account or any part thereof, and that, after hearing all the evidence and the arguments of counsel, the justice was of the opinion that plaintiff was entitled to recover from defendant, after allowing her credit for the balance due upon said note, it being shown that said Charles Cross was principal therein, the sum of $6, and for which sum judgment was given against her in favor of the plaintiff, with interest and costs, amounting to $34.15, and which soon afterwards was fully paid off and discharged by her.

Isora V. Gall and E. R. Dyer, administrator of George W. Gall, deceased, separately answered: The answer of the former contains a demurrer to the bill, but no order entered filing the same is found in the record, and it does not appear to have been called to the attention of the court, by any order in the cause, and it must therefore be treated as a fugitive paper. Pheasant v. Hanna, 63 W. Va. 613, 60 S. E. 618; McGraw v. Traders' National Bank (W. Va.) 63 S. E. 398. An order of December 11, 1906, says a demurrer in writing to the so-called affirmative matter in the answer of the said Isora V. Gall was interposed by plaintiff, and which was sustained, and said affirmative matter stricken out, and that plaintiff replied generally to the residue of the said answer. No such written demurrer, however, is found in the record, and we cannot say what part of the said answer was intended to be stricken out. Practically all the matter of the answer is responsive to the matter of the bill, or raises issues of law and fact necessarily involved and determined by the judgment of the justice. The prayer of said answer is that so much of the judgment of said justice as undertakes to extinguish the balance due upon said deed of trust may be set aside as void, the injunction dissolved, and that defendant Teter, trustee, be directed to proceed with the sale of the land, under the notice given by him, to pay and satisfy said debt. As we do not know what part of the answer was intended to be stricken out, and as it contains matter mainly responsive to the bill, we cannot say that any error was committed in sustaining the demurrer thereto and striking out such affirmative matter of the answer. The case was finally heard upon the pleadings thus made up and upon the facts agreed.

Isora V. Gall, in her answer, relies mainly on several legal propositions presented by the pleadings and facts as agreed:

First. That, as her plea in the action before the justice was a simple denial of indebtedness, no plea of set-off of the note was involved or in issue, she could not be required involuntarily to litigate with plaintiff in said action her rights as against him respecting said note, and that she is not estopped or concluded by said judgment. To the general proposition thus affirmed, the statute (section 2006, Code 1906) we think makes clear answer. It provides that: "If the defendant, at the time the plaintiff's action is commenced, has any credit, or set-off, or counterclaim to allege in defense or reduction of the plaintiff's demand, and be personally served with process in the suit, or appear and answer the action, he shall produce the same, with his evidence in support thereof, in the cause, or be forever precluded from maintaining any action for the recovery thereof." But the application of this statute depends on the question, to be next considered, whether said note was such an offset against plaintiff's demand as defendant could or was obliged by this statute to put in issue. If it was, of course, the judgment concludes her.

Second. That as a set-off must be due in the same right and between the same parties, and as said note was the joint note of plaintiff and his wife while plaintiff's demand was against appellant alone, it was improperly set off or credited to plaintiff's account by the judgment of the justice. This in general also contains a correct proposition of law. 12 Ency. Dig. Va. & W. Va. Rep. 257; 4 Minor, Institute, 788. But it is said, in answer to this, that section 3890, Code 1906, has so modified the general rule as to give right of set-off of the note, though said note be the joint note of plaintiff and his wife, and that, having that right, said section 2006 imposes the duty to plead it, and inflicts the penalty prescribed thereby for failure to do so. Said section 3890 is as follows: "Although the claim of the plaintiff be jointly against several persons, and the set-off is of a debt, not to all, but only to a part of them, this section shall extend to such set-off if it appear that the persons against whom such claim is, stand in the relation of principal and surety and the person entitled to the set-off is the principal." It is obvious that this provision has no literal application to the case at bar. The claim of the plaintiff is not a joint claim against several persons in which one entitled to a set-off is principal and the others sureties. In construing this statute, this court, in B. & O. R. R. Co. v. Bitner, 15 W. Va. 455-463, 36 Am. Rep. 820, speaking by Judge Green, said: "It seems to me obvious that the statute therefore cannot be construed to apply to any case, except to a joint suit against a principal and his surety or sureties." And Mr. Minor (4 Minor, Institutes, at the page already cited), referring to this statute, says: "In short, joint and separate demands cannot be set off one against another, save in the special case provided for by our statute." And he cites a number of Virginia decisions. But it is said that the last clause of said section 3890, providing that "in the issue, the jury, judge, or justice shall ascertain the true state of indebtedness between the parties, and judgment be rendered accordingly," authorized the justice to pronounce the judgment complained of in this case. This would be so if the set-off was one authorized by law. For these reasons we think the judgment respecting said note was erroneous. There is nothing in the record to show that the offset did not belong to the defendant at the time of the suit, nor that the same was then in suit before any other court or justice, and therefore there is nothing in these suggestions of counsel.

Third. It is claimed that because said note was the joint note of plaintiff and his wife, secured by deed of trust, and thereby rendered certain in amount, it ought to be treated like a judgment, which it is claimed, upon the authority of Faulconer v. Stinson, 44 W. Va. 546, 29 S. E. 10, 11, defendant could not be compelled to set off against the plaintiff's unliquidated demand. We do not think that case has any application to this. It is true, perhaps, that the balance due upon the note was capable of being rendered certain, but there had been partial payments upon it, and not the whole of the note was due. The reason given in Faulconer v. Stinson is that: "The owner of the judgment has had his demand judicially ascertained and ended, and shall the other party come with his offset and inaugurate another contest against the judgment, or shall he be compelled, by separate action, to establish his demand at law, and then set off his judgment? The law compels him to do the latter."

The controlling question we have for decision then is: Is the judgment of the justice for the error therein void in whole or in part, or is it conclusive of the rights of Isora V. Gall? Counsel for Miss Gall affirm that the judgment is void for two reasons, namely: First, because it was not entered up in the docket of the justice within 24 hours, as provided by section 2065, Code 1906; second, because it appears on the face of the transcript of his docket that the justice exceeded his jurisdiction in setting off against plaintiff's demand the amount due upon said note, and entering judgment for the balance. On the first proposition, counsel say that McClain v. Davis, 37 W. Va. 330, 18 S. E. 629, 18 L. R. A. 634, Richmond v. Henderson, 48 W. Va. 389, 37 S. E. 653, and Packet Co. v. Bellville, 55 W. Va. 560, 47 S. E. 301, leave this question open; but in addition to those cases we have McDowell County Bank v. Wood, 60 W. Va. 617, 55 S. E. 753, reaffirming the rule of Packet Co. v. Bellville, supra, and effectually overruling McClain v. Davis, holding that, "where a judgment in an action tried before a justice is rendered and publicly announced by the justice on the day and at the close of the trial, although the clerical work of entering the judgment upon his docket is not performed until a few days thereafter, the statute is substantially complied with." This case must therefore be regarded as announcing the settled rule upon the subject.

But is the judgment void on the second ground? Our conclusion is that this proposition must be denied. The judgment of the justice we think must be regarded as merely erroneous and not void, and therefore reviewable only upon appeal, if appeal would lie. But it is argued that, as this court has heretofore denied appellant a writ of prohibition against the enforcement of said judgment, she has no other remedy except in a court of equity. But a court of equity cannot be made to perform the functions of an appellate court, and to correct errors therein. There can be no question but that the justice had jurisdiction of the plaintiff's action, and although, as we have determined, his judgment was erroneous in so far as it undertook to offset against plaintiff's demand the joint note in question, yet it cannot be said that the justice was without jurisdiction so as to render his judgment void. Judgments are not void for mere error therein, and, unless there is total want of jurisdiction, a court of equity has no jurisdiction, for mere grounds of error, to interfere.

We must therefore affirm the decree below.

HOYLMAN v. KANAWHA & M. RY. CO.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
March 2, 1909. On Rehearing, May 12, 1909.)

1. CARRIERS (§ 333*)—INJURIES TO PASSENGERS—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

The general rule is that passengers getting off a moving railroad train are chargeable with contributory negligence and cannot recover for injury received therefrom.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. §§ 1391-1393; Dec. Dig. § 333.*]

2. CARRIERS (§ 344*)—INJURIES TO PASSENGER—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—BURDEN OF PROOF.

The act of getting on or off a moving train is evidence of contributory negligence, and imposes upon one who is injured in doing so the burden of proving that the peculiar circumstances of the case justified him in such course.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. § 1399; Dec. Dig. § 344.*]

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1178*)—DISPOSITION OF CASE—REVERSAL—NEW TRIAL.

When, in an action against a railroad company for personal injury to a passenger, the evidence is such that a verdict for the plaintiff should be set aside, the circuit court, if asked, should direct a verdict for the defendant, and, if it refuses, the appellate court will reverse judgment and verdict and remand the case for a new trial, unless this court can see clearly that the plaintiff cannot better his case upon another trial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Dec. Dig. § 1178.*]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error to Circuit Court, Kanawha County.

Action by James H. Hoylman, administrator, against the Kanawha & Michigan Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant brings error. Reversed.

Brown, Jackson & Knight, for plaintiff in error. A. M. Belcher and C. J. Van Fleet, for defendant in error.

BRANNON, J. John L. Porter took passage on a train of the Kanawha & Michigan Railroad at Charleston to go to Wicher, a flag station on that railroad, and in getting off the train was killed, and his administrator recovered in the circuit court of Kanawha county a verdict and judgment for $5,000 against the railroad company, and the company brings the case here.

There is no conflict of evidence in the case. Tested by the evidence adduced by the plaintiff, the facts are: That Porter sat in the third seat some 10 feet from the door of the car, and he was engaged in active conversation with a passenger, Garten, in the next seat behind him. A friend named Kirby, when the train stopped, went to Porter's seat and carried a bundle out for him and got off the train. Porter did not go with him. Three or four other passengers got off the train. Porter lingered in his seat, though the train had stopped, talking to Garten in the next seat behind. He lingered so that that passenger, Garten, who remained on the train, warned Porter that he had better get off the train while it stopped. Porter started for the door, and before he got to the door—indeed, before he left his seat—the train started; but Porter went on down the steps when the train was moving and stepped on the platform holding to the railing of the car with his right hand, and did not let go of it, but held to it while he took two or three steps in the direction the train was moving and increasing in speed, and he lost his balance and fell under the wheels. Before he got out of the door, the train was moving. The conductor swears that a stop of the usual length for that station was made. No evidence contradicts this. Other passengers, three or four, got off. This affords evidence that the length of stop was reasonable. Hurt v. Railroad, 94 Mo. 255, 7 S. W. 1, 4 Am. St. Rep. 374. There was no crowd. The conductor swears that he stood, as he usually did, at the other end of the car before the one in which Porter rode and looked through both cars to see that all the passengers were off and did not see Porter. There is no contradiction of the conductor in this. A witness of the defense, uncontradicted, says Porter was still talking to Garten at his seat when the train started. This would show that Porter had not yet come out of his seat into the aisle, but was tarrying in his seat talking to Garten. Garten's evidence confirms this. The evidence clearly shows that before Porter got to the door the train had started. The evidence shows that Porter was well acquainted with this station and had reason to know that the usual stop there was of short duration.

"All experience has demonstrated that to get off a moving car is highly dangerous. Therefore it is held that such an act is negligence per se, and the passenger, if thereby injured, except in very rare cases, is guilty of contributory negligence and cannot recover." O'Toole v. Railroad Co., 158 Pa. 106, 27 Atl. 738, 22 L. R. A. 606, 38 Am. St. Rep. 830. "An adult who knowingly and unnecessarily steps from a railroad train in motion is guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law." Walters v. Chicago & N. W. Ry. Co., 113 Wis. 367, 89 N. W. 140. Such is held to be the law in most of the courts. 2 Wood on Railroads, 1292, says that, in view of the danger necessarily attending such an act, it should be held, as a matter of law, that it is negligence to attempt to board or alight from a train while it is in motion, and the question should not be left to the jury unless there are exceptional circumstances tending to excuse or justify the act. "And the great weight of authority favors this view. The failure of the company to stop its train at a station as it ought to do, or to stop it for sufficiently long time, does not justify a passenger in leaving a moving train. His proper course is to be carried on until the train stops, and, if he sustains pecuniary or other loss from being carried beyond his station, his remedy lies in an action for damages." The same in Hutchinson on Carriers, § 1180.

Now, what fault is imputed to the company? Nobody claims that the conductor or other trainman saw Porter getting off. The claim is that the stop was not long enough in time; but, in the first place, the evidence is that the stop was for the usual time at that station, and this is proven by the fact that several other passengers got off safely. There is no proof clear that the stop was not reasonable; but, suppose that the stop was not of the proper length of time, the law just cited from Wood and Hutchinson says that, even if the company was negligent in this respect, the passenger must not run the risk of alighting. That is no reason for running a plain risk, especially by an aged person. McDonald v. Railroad Co., 87 Me. 466, 32 Atl. 1010, says that it is the duty of the company to stop a sufficient length of time to give passengers reasonable opportunity to alight with safety. "But the failure of the company to stop its train at a station as it ought to do, or to stop for sufficient length of time, does not justify a passenger in leaving a moving train." In that case we find that he gets off at his own risk. I find in Simmons v. Air Line, etc., Co., 120 Ga. 225, 47 S. E. 570, this: "If, with a clear chance to avoid the consequences of defendant's negligence or breach of duty, the plaintiff voluntarily assumes the risk occasioned thereby, such conduct on his part is not merely contributory negligence, lessening the amount of damages, but a failure to avoid danger, defeating the right to recover." "If all you know of it is that a passenger jumps from a train in motion and is injured, you would charge him with carelessness for the act." Shannon v. Railroad Co., 78 Me. 59, 2 Atl. 678. The case in 87 Me. 466, 32 Atl. 1010, says that: "The burden was on the plaintiff to prove that he jumped from the train under exceptional circumstances that would justify or excuse such an act of imprudence." So holds Browne v. Railroad Co., 108 N. C. 34, 12 S. E. 958. The North Carolina court, in Morrow v. Atlanta, etc., Co., 134 N. C. 92, 46 S. E. 12, held that a person who "alights from the train while traveling at the rate of three to four miles an hour, and with its speed steadily increasing, is guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law precluding recovery."

The train in this case was going faster than that, the engineer swears 8 or 10 miles an hour, when Porter alighted. The evidence clearly shows that Porter delayed leaving the train and had to be warned to do so by Garten. "Where a passenger delays for an unreasonable time, and it is not apparent to the agent of the carrier that he is either boarding the vehicle or carriage, the carrier will not be held responsible for a resulting injury." 5 Am. & Eng. Ency. L. 579. A passenger, seeing that a train had passed a station and was increasing in speed, jumped from it. It was held that he could not recover, "even though the railroad company was negligent in management of the train." Brown v. Chicago, etc., Co., 80 Wis. 162, 49 N. W. 807. McDonald v. Montgomery R. Co., 110 Ala. 163, 20 South. 817, holds: "When a person steps from a moving car without any necessity therefor and is injured, which injury would have been avoided if he had remained on the car, he is guilty of such contributory negligence as will preclude his recovery." That it is negligence to alight from a moving train has been held by the courts of New York, Pennsylvania, Massachusetts, Maine, Michigan, Wisconsin, Iowa, Alabama, Georgia, Tennessee, and North Carolina. Mearns v. Railroad Co., 183 N. Y. 108, 57 N. E. 292; Brown v. Railroad Co., 181 Mass. 365, 63 N. E. 941; Werbowsky v. Railroad Co., 86 Mich. 239, 48 N. E. 1097, 24 Am. St. Rep. 120; Newlon v. Railroad Co., 127 Iowa, 654, 103 N. W. 999; Whelan v. Railroad Co., 84 Ga. 506, 10 S. E. 1091, and cases above cited. Porter was a man of 73 years. This called on him to be careful and prudent. The case of Cumberland V. R. Co. v. Maugans, 61 Md. 62, 48 Am. Rep. 83, says in the opinion that: "Every one would pronounce it an act of reckless imprudence for a person to jump from a train of cars when in rapid motion, or at night and in the dark, when dangers or obstructions that could not be seen were in the way, or for a person of impaired health and in a weak physical condition, or of an advanced age, to make the attempt when the train was in slow motion." 1 Am. & Eng. Ann. Cas. 779, has the following: "Even where the train is moving slowly, the act of alighting therefrom may constitute contributory negligence as a matter of law if the person so alighting is in a weak physical condition or of advanced age." "Even in jurisdictions where the mere act of alighting from a moving railroad train or street car is not considered negligence per se, it is well recognized that cases sometimes arise in which the facts are so clearly established, and the inference as to the course dictated by ordinary prudence is so certain and invariable, that it becomes the duty of the court to take the question from the jury. Thus it has been held that where the act is obviously dangerous and without reasonable necessity, real or apparent, it constitutes contributory negligence as a matter of law, and defeats a recovery by the person injured." 1 Am. & Eng. Ann. Cas. 778, citing many cases. A conductor agreed to let a passenger off at a station, and the conductor rang the bell for a stop. The train did not stop. Held: "When the train fails to stop at the station of destination of a passenger, and he is not directed or induced at the time by act or word of the company's agent to get off, and he does get off, he does so at his own risk." East Tenn., Va. & Ga. Co. v. Massengill, 83 Tenn. 328. "The general rule is that passengers injured while getting on or off moving trains cannot recover for injuries. The act of getting on or off a moving train is evidence of contributory negligence, and imposes upon one who is injured in doing so the burden of proving that the peculiar circumstances of the case justified him in such course." Browne v. Railroad Co., 108 N. C. 84, 12 S. E. 958.

I find the following syllabus from the United States Circuit Court of Appeals in Illinois Central v. Davidson, 64 Fed. 301, 12 C. C. A. 113: "A passenger who unnecessarily and negligently exposes himself to danger while alighting from a train is guilty of contributory negligence, even though he does not know of the danger to which he is exposed." The Texas case (International, etc., Co. v. Rhoades [Tex. Civ. App.] 51 S. W. 517) holds: "Where a passenger was injured in alighting from a moving train, he cannot recover, even if he was not guilty of negligence, unless the agent or defendant in charge of the train invited him to so alight, and in so doing he acted with ordinary prudence." "The conductor is required, after having at the proper time announced the station, to stop the train and hold it such reasonable time as will permit passengers to alight in safety. He is not required—to do, what in many cases would be impossible to ascertain—to know that all passengers intending to stop at the station have alighted in safety." Raben v. Central Iowa Railroad Co., 73 Iowa, 581, 35 N. W. 646, 5 Am. St. Rep. 708. "This instruction was erroneous in the particular that it asserts that 'such railroad company is bound to exercise the strictest vigilance in carrying passengers to their destination, and in setting them down safely thereat.' This in its latter portion states the law too strongly in favor of the plaintiff. All the duty the law imposes upon a conductor, acting as the agent of a corporation, in order to comply with the obligations of the carrier to a passenger, is to carry him safely to his point of destination, announce the arrival of the train at the station, and give him a reasonable opportunity to leave the cars. When this is done, the duty of the conductor ceases. Sevier v. Railroad, 18 Am. & Eng. R. R. Cas. 245; Straus v. Railroad, 75 Mo. 185. And when the servants of a corporation, engaged in the business of a common carrier, afford passengers a reasonable time to leave the cars after arrival at the end of their journey, they have the right, at the expiration of such reasonable period, to presume that all the passengers, whose place of destination is then reached, have done what is customary for passengers in like circumstances to do, to wit, have left the cars." Hurt v. St. L., I. M. & S. Ry. Co., 94 Mo. 262, 7 S. W. 1, 4 Am. St. Rep. 374.

But the negligence of Porter did not consist alone in getting off the train while in motion. He held to the railing of the car for three steps and was thrown under the train. All the witnesses say this. It is beyond question. This was gross negligence. Porter was in full possession of his faculties. A moving train, increasing speed every inch, is a dangerous carriage from which to alight. Even if going slowly, its momentum makes it dangerous to alight from it. In the case of Diddle v. Continental Co. (this term) 63 S. E. 962, we said: That reckless or deliberate encountering of known danger, or danger so obvious that a reasonably prudent man would have avoided it, if the circumstances do not necessitate encountering it, is a voluntary exposure to danger; that unconsciousness of danger does not change the case; that if the danger is obvious, and nothing to preclude deliberation or freedom of action, such as sudden peril, and he encounters danger, the exposure is voluntary. See Ashtabula Rapid Transit Co. v. Holmes, 67 Ohio St. 153, 65 N. E. 877.

The defendant asked, but was refused, an instruction that the evidence was not sufficient to authorize a verdict for the plaintiff, and that the jury should find for the defendant. Now the evidence plainly shows that Porter was under no necessity to get off the train while moving and increasing its speed. It was simply a rash act of his own for mere convenience, when he could have gone a mile or so further on the train and come back in a few hours. Law above shows that he was chargeable with negligence per se under the evidence, negligence in law. That would inevitably call for a verdict for the defendant, even if we could say, as we cannot, that the company was in fault. We have often said that, where the evidence is such in cases of negligence as that the court would be compelled to set aside a verdict for the plaintiff there, the court ought, if asked, direct a verdict for the defendant. Ketterman v. Railroad Co., 48 W. Va. 606, 37 S. E. 683; Cobb v. Glenn Boon Co., 57 W. Va. 49, 49 S. E. 1005, 110 Am. St. Rep. 734. In White v. Brewing Co., 51 W. Va. 259, 41 S. E. 180, the same test is made; that is, that the court should instruct a jury for a party in whose favor the evidence "plainly and decidedly preponderates." Judge Dent said that, when the evidence was such that two reasonable minds could not differ, the court should not hesitate to direct a verdict, "for thereby justice is promoted, a useless controversy brought to an end, and time, cost, and fruitless labor saved to the litigants, the court, and the public." The same principle is in Diddle v. Continental Co. (decided this term) 63 S. E. 962. The Supreme Court of the United States said that it was settled law in that court, "when the evidence given at the trial, with all inferences the jury could justifiably draw from it, is insufficient to support a verdict for the plaintiff, so that such verdict, if returned, must be set aside, the court is not bound to submit the case to the jury, but may direct a verdict for the defendant." Louisville, etc., Co. v. Woodson, 134 U. S. 614, 10 Sup. Ct. 628, 33 L. Ed. 1032. A vast array of authorities for this proposition will be found in Blashfield on Instructions, § 5. The court should have given the instruction to find for the defendant. The defendant is entitled to have that matter of error passed on in this court.

This court is of the opinion that the circuit court should have directed a verdict for the defendant. We are clear about this, but the great question then comes up: Shall this court render final judgment for the defendant, or set aside the verdict, reverse the judgment, and remand the case to the circuit court? My own opinion is, long has been, that this court should do what the circuit court should have done, which would be, after verdict for the defendant, to render final judgment for the defendant as if on demurrer to evidence. The plaintiff made his case, and if his case was bad he ought to lose it by final judgment. The suit ought thus to end. This court has so decided in two cases. Maupin v. Insurance Co., 53 W. Va. 557, 45 S. E. 1003, and Ruffner Bros. v. Insurance Co., 59 W. Va. 432, 53 S. E. 943, 115 Am. St. Rep. 924. I later add Anderson v. Tug River Co., 59 W. Va. 301, 53 S. E. 713, and McMillan v. Coal Co., 61 W. Va. 535, 57 S. E. 129, 11 L. R. A. (N. S.) 840. It was decided otherwise this term in Diddle v. Continental Co. See full note 8 Am. & Eng. Ann. Cas. 873. I shall not discuss this point further. A majority of the court think that final judgment should not be rendered here, especially as the practice has been generally otherwise, as in Kuykendall v. Fisher, 61 W. Va. 87, 56 S. E. 48, 8 L. R. A. (N. S.) 94. I suppose it true that in the past the practice, I say practice, has been to remand. I would reverse that practice, it being a mere matter of practice. All say that, if it clearly appears that the plaintiff cannot better his case, this court may render final judgment.

Instruction No. 8 says that if the train did not stop long enough to enable Porter to leave it while stationary, and that he stepped off while the train was in motion, it was a question for the jury to say whether he was guilty of negligence and barred from recovery. The law is that: If a man leaves a moving train, he does so at his own risk; it is negligence per se, negligence in law, for which the court may withdraw the case from the jury.

Instruction No. 4 told the jury that it was the duty "of the defendant to use the greatest possible care and diligence to safely carry and deliver Porter to his destination, and to stop long enough to afford him reasonable opportunity, by the use of ordinary diligence on his part, to alight, and not to start until he had alighted. If, by the exercise of great diligence, said defendant could have known that Porter was in the act of alighting," the verdict must be for the plaintiff. This instruction might be readily construed as requiring the trainmen to see that every person wanting to get off had gotten off. It demands that a railroad company must exercise great diligence to know that a passenger is alighting. It is the duty of the passenger to get off the train, and the conductor does not have to hunt each and every one up. Of course, where the conductor knows one is alighting, he cannot start; but he need not examine every car in a train to see who wants to get off, or that every one has gotten off. But why discuss these instructions? They all declare that, if the company was negligent in not stopping long enough or not seeing to it that Porter was off, then it was liable. They ignore the fact that, under the evidence in the case, the plaintiff's evidence, Porter delayed leaving the car and went from it while moving and held on to it while moving, and was guilty of contributory negligence. If we are right in saying that the court should have directed a verdict, then the plaintiff was not entitled to these instructions; they being unsuited to the case and misleading the jury.

Porter's contributory negligence barred recovery.

Again, the court gave for the defendant an instruction that if the train had started while John L. Porter was leaving the car, and was in motion before he went out of said car to the platform, then it was negligence in him to attempt to alight from the car while in motion, and the verdict should be for the defendant. Another instruction was that if the train stopped long enough to allow passengers to alight, and Porter could have left it without injury, had he used diligence, then the jury must find for the defendant. Now, under the evidence, there is no question but that the hypotheses of these two instructions were fully sustained, and therefore this verdict under the evidence is contrary to those instructions given by the court. It is a verdict, as shown by the evidence, against the law of contributory negligence. "A new trial will be granted: (1) Where the verdict is against law. This occurs when the issue involves both fact and law, and the verdict is against the law of the case on the facts proved. (2) Where the verdict is contrary to the evidence. This occurs when the issue involves matter of fact only, and the facts proved require a different verdict from that found by the jury." Grayson's Case, 6 Grat. (Va.) 712.

Therefore we reverse the judgment, set aside the verdict, and remand the case for a new trial if the plaintiff shall be so advised.

On Rehearing.

A petition for rehearing attacks the above opinion for saying that the evidence is not conflicting. It is not appreciably so. The plaintiff proved the true status of the case. He proved by Garten, who was face to face with Porter in the car, that Porter stood talking with him, and that either before he left his seat, some 10 feet from the door, or before he reached the door, the train started. Young, a witness for defense, definitely corroborates Garten. He was in the car, saw Porter lingering in conversation with Garten, and, when asked if the train started before Porter left the platform, answered: "Yes, sir; before he went out of the car, before he left Garten, about the time he left Garten." He said further: "At the time the train started, he was shaking hands with Garten. About the time the train started, I seen them shaking hands." The plaintiff and defendant both so prove. Keeny, a witness for plaintiff, says: "When I first saw Porter, he was coming down the steps. The train was moving out as he came down." This renders likely the evidence of Garten and Young, for it shows that Porter did not reach the platform or steps until already the train had started. It was "moving out," how fast Keeny could not say; but it was moving out, and Porter had no right to risk its speed, as any one may be deceived as to speed or momentum of a starting train, and any one knows it may increase momentum rapidly, even suddenly. Dempsey, another witness for plaintiff, says: "The train was moving out when I looked around, and he was on the steps." Again, I say he corroborates Garten and Young. He, too, proves that the train had started when yet Porter was on the steps. That the train was moving with considerable, with dangerous, speed when Porter alighted, is beyond question from the fact told by several witnesses for the plaintiff, not contradicted, not open to question; that is, that Porter, holding to the railing, was "jerked" and thrown by the car. If it was merely moving at a snail's gait, why did the train "jerk" him and throw him? Here is an undisputed fact proving a physical fact from our knowledge of the law of momentum or force, that the train had already attained a dangerous speed when Porter alighted. Further, Dempsey, a witness for plaintiff, says that Kirby, who had taken Porter's bundle out, was standing there on the back side of the platform as the train pulled out, and "I heard him say to Mr. Carson (brakeman) that old man Porter is on there to get off, and Mr. Carson threw out his hand to shut the engineer off, on the fireman's side, and the fireman, I suppose, was putting in fire. Mr. Carson didn't get any signal from the engine, and he jumped up on the coach as quick as he could and pulled the bell cord, to get hold of the bell cord." This proves that the train had started while Porter was still on the train.

Against all this evidence, counsel appeal to Houchins and Carson, saying that Houchins said, "The first I saw of him I was standing in the baggage car door, and he had one foot on the platform and one on the step, and his right hand holding to the handhold." Asked how far it had moved when he first saw Porter, answered, "Well, it was just starting to move." This does not prove that Porter had alighted before the train started. This does not contradict all the explicit evidence that the train had already started when Porter got off it. In fact, the fair inference from it is that Porter got off while the train was moving, and this is enough to exempt the company, because under the law no one can alight from a moving train except at his own risk, except under peculiar circumstances. This case is not such. Looking at his evidence further, I see that he was asked, "When you first saw him, was the train moving?" He answered, "Yes, sir." Counsel in their petition for rehearing admit that the above opinion lays down the law correctly, but maybe counsel mean that the train was moving slowly. Houchins says, "Well, it was just starting to move." This is indefinite. Are we on this frail, indefinite sentence to contradict and overthrow all the evidence referred to in the original and this opinion? It does not conflict with it really; no substantial conflict. Afterwards Houchins qualifies this statement by the statement that when he saw Porter the train was moving. Counsel cite us to a statement in the evidence of Carson that just as he gave the signal to start he got on the train, looked back, and saw Porter fall; but the plaintiff by Dempsey proved, as above stated, that, when Kirby told Carson Porter was yet on the train, Carson signaled the train to stop and ran for the bell cord. This denies that when Carson stepped on the train Porter was just alighting. Counsel do not say from this that Porter had alighted when Carson saw him, but was in the act of alighting. He could not safely do so. But go further with Carson's evidence. The question was put to him, "Did you see Porter step to the ground?" Answer: "No, sir; I didn't see him. I don't know whether he was on the coach or the platform, could not tell." Question: "Do you know how far the train had moved before you saw Porter falling back?" Answer: "No, sir; I could not tell." Having stated that he gave signal to start, and got on, and saw Porter just as the train moved, it was stated to him that then Porter must have been on the step when he (Carson) saw him, he answered, "I could not tell where he was." Can we say from Carson where Porter was when Carson signaled to start and got on the train? Can we say the train was not going, or going slowly, when Porter got off it? No tribunal, whether judge or jury, having to deal impartially, from reading all the evidence, indeed from reading only the plaintiff's evidence, can help finding, as facts: First, that Porter was yet in the car when its wheels began to move; and, second, that when Porter got off the car its movement was dangerous, as shown by the fact that it jerked Porter and threw him. To say otherwise would be a travesty upon weighing and dealing with human evidence. If the train was moving, though apparently slowly, he could not get off except at his own risk, except under peculiar circumstances. This case is not such. The evidence does not really conflict. Suppose it did. Counsel would have us say therefore that a court is powerless to overthrow a verdict. That is not law. Though evidence be conflicting, if the verdict is without sufficient evidence, plainly against the decided, clear preponderance, it may be set aside. Yeager v. Bluefield, 40 W. Va. 484, 21 S. E. 752.

We would not have further detailed evidence beyond the reference to it in the original opinion, but for the assertion in the petition for rehearing that we had heard the case, on only "some of the evidence adduced by the plaintiff," and tried a case not presented to the jury. We dislike to express opinions on evidence, or detail it, as we do not feel that on mere questions of fact an appellate court is called upon to detail evidence, or go further than find the result and announce it; but, as the petition calls on us to do so, we make this review of the evidence. But for that, we should not have done so.

We reach the judgment on the evidence, taken as a whole, on the plaintiff's evidence. It is not sufficient to sustain the verdict.

LOUISVILLE & N. R. CO. v. NEWMAN.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. April 21, 1909.)

1. REMOVAL OF CAUSES (§ 89*)—POWER TO DEFEAT REMOVAL—DISMISSAL.

Where proper application is made by a non-resident defendant for the removal of a case from the state court to the United States court, which application is refused by the state court, whose judgment is reversed on writ of error to the Supreme Court of the state, the plaintiff cannot dismiss the case, so as to defeat the removal of the case to the United States court, by an entry of dismissal made by his attorney on the original papers, before the remittitur from the Supreme Court has been formally made the judgment of the court from which the case was taken by writ of error.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Removal of Causes, Dec. Dig. § 89.*]

2. ABATEMENT AND REVIVAL (§ 12*)—ANOTHER ACTION PENDING—ACTION IN UNITED STATES COURT.

The pendency of an action in a court of the United States, which has been removed from the state court, will abate a subsequent suit in the state court between the same parties and for the same cause of action, although in such subsequent suit the damages claimed may be reduced below $2,000.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Abatement and Revival, Cent. Dig. §§ 87-91, 94, 95, 98; Dec. Dig. § 12.*]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Gordon County; A. W. Fite, Judge.

Action by L. H. Newman against the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

See, also, 128 Ga. 283, 57 S. E. 515.

O. N. Starr and D. W. Blair, for plaintiff in error. J. McCamy and T. W. Skelly, for defendant in error.

EVANS, P. J. The bill of exceptions is to review a judgment of the trial court, which refused to abate the plaintiff's action. This is a second suit by the plaintiff, L. H. Newman, against the defendant, the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company, for the same cause of action. In the first suit the Atlanta, Knoxville & Northern Railway Company, a Georgia corporation, was jointly sued with the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company; and the latter company filed its petition at the appearance term of the court for the removal of the case to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Georgia, on the ground of diverse citizenship. The court refused the petition, and on exception taken to the Supreme Court this judgment was reversed. 128 Ga. 283, 57 S. E. 515. The remittitur from the Supreme Court was filed in the office of the clerk of the superior court of Gordon county on May 12, 1907, and on August 30, 1907, the judgment of the Supreme Court was made the judgment of the superior court, and it was further adjudged that "the removal of said case is granted as prayed," and that the railroad company recover the costs of suit of the plaintiff. The costs of taking the case to the Supreme Court were $35.55, which had been paid by the railroad company. On June 10, 1907, the plaintiff paid to the clerk of the superior court the sum of $13.50, which the clerk said was all that was due for the costs in the original case, and on June 15, 1907, the clerk turned over this sum to his predecessor in office, who was clerk at the time the case was filed, heard, and carried to the Supreme Court. On June 26, 1907, plaintiff's counsel entered on the original papers of the former suit that the plaintiff dismissed the case without prejudice to bringing another suit, and signed the entry. Thereafter, on July 17, 1907, the plaintiff filed with the clerk her second suit against the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company for the same cause of action, and the defendant pleaded in abatement the pendency of the first suit, which it averred was pending in the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Georgia, and also pleaded in abatement that the second suit was begun without paying all the costs of the first suit, or filing an affidavit of the plaintiff's inability to pay. The issues made by the pleas in abatement were submitted to the judge without the intervention of a jury, and he rendered judgment overruling the pleas. The exception is to this judgment.

1. The two matters urged in abatement are antagonistic. The first suit is still pending, or it has been dismissed. Our first inquiry will be directed to determining whether, under the foregoing facts, the plaintiff's first suit still pends. It has been adjudicated by this court that the petition to remove the case from the state court to the Circuit Court of the United States was in compliance with the act of Congress, and that the judge of the superior court erred in refusing to grant the order of removal. 128 Ga. 283, 57 S. E. 515. The act of Congress provides that, upon filing the petition and bond for removal of the case, "it shall then be the duty of the state court to accept said petition and bond, and proceed no further in said suit." 4 Fed. St. Ann. 349. The requirement is that the state court shall accept the petition and bond, which may be done by entering its approval thereon; but the usual and better practice is to pass an order to remove the case, or deny such order, in explicit language. Jackson v. United States Life Ins. Co., 60 Ga. 427. The Supreme Court of the United States has held: "The mere filing of a petition for the removal of a suit which is not removable does not work a transfer. To accomplish this the suit must be one that may be removed, and the petition must show the right of the petitioner to demand a removal. This being made to appear in the record, and the necessary security having been given, the power of the state court in the case ends, and that of the United States begins. All issues of fact made upon the petition must be tried in the Circuit Court; but the state court is at liberty to determine of itself whether on the face of the record a removal has been effected." Stone v. South Carolina, 117 U. S. 431, 6 Sup. Ct. 799, 29 L. Ed. 962, quoted in Steiner v. Mathewson, 77 Ga. 659. The general rule as to the removal of cases from a state court to a federal court has been thus stated by this court: "When a petition is filed showing proper cause for removal, and a bond given according to the act of Congress, the case is ipso facto removed. Where the right of removal does not clearly appear, the rule seems to be that the state court may take into consideration the whole record, including the petition for removal, and may decide whether or not the cause of removal exists. If any issue of fact is raised, the state court has no jurisdiction to pass upon it, but must allow the removal and let that issue be tried by the judge of the federal court." Southern Ry. Co. v. Hudgins, 108 Ga. 524, 33 S. E. 1011. It has been held in Texas that when a motion for removal, accompanied by petition and bond, has been denied by a state court, and the transcript of the record has not been filed in the Circuit Court, the right to remove may, under certain circumstances, be considered as abandoned, where the defendant makes no complaint of the action of the court in the state Supreme Court on an appeal from the judgment. Texas & Pac. R. Co. v. Davis, 93 Tex. 378, 54 S. W. 381, 55 S. W. 562. But when exception is duly taken to the order of the state court refusing to remove the case into a federal court, and the order of refusal is reversed, the case is to be considered as out of the jurisdiction of the state court since the filing of a sufficient petition and bond. See, in this connection, Steamship Co. v. Tugman, 106 U. S. 118, 1 Sup. Ct. 58, 27 L. Ed. 87. The plaintiff cannot defeat a removal on the ground of separable controversy by striking out of his appeal a prayer for the relief which creates the separable controversy. "The plaintiff cannot reduce his claim by amendment, after petition filed, to prevent removal. Kanouse v. Martin, 15 How. 198, 14 L. Ed. 660. If the right of removal has once become perfect, it cannot be taken away by any subsequent amendment in state court or federal court, or by a release of part of the debt or damages claimed, or otherwise. Dill. Rem. Caus. § 75, p. 93; Kanouse v. Martin, 15 How. 198, 14 L. Ed. 660; The Baltic, 1 Blatchf. 149, Fed. Cas. No. 826; Muns v. De Nemours, 2 Wash. C. C. 463, Fed. Cas. No. 9,931; Gordon v. Longest, 16 Pet. 97, 10 L. Ed. 900." Jones v. Foreman, 66 Ga. 381. See, also, Cumberland B. & L. Ass'n v. Wells, 99 Ga. 223, 25 S. E. 246. The conclusion is inevitable that the effort of the plaintiff to dismiss her case was ineffectual, and that the original case is still pending in the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Georgia, to which jurisdiction the plaintiff should have applied, if she desired to dismiss her action.

2. Does the pendency of the first case in the Circuit Court of the United States abate the present suit in the state court? In the new suit the amount laid in the ad damnum clause was reduced below $2,000; but as it is the office of such a clause to state the amount of damages which the plaintiff claims on account of the injury, this circumstance does not alter the essential character of the suit. It is well settled that, if two courts of two distinct sovereignties have jurisdiction of the same matter, the filing of suit in one will not furnish a good plea in abatement to the filing of a suit in the other. Generally speaking, the federal courts and the state courts which have concurrent jurisdiction over civil actions may be considered as courts of separate jurisdictional sovereignties; and where an action in personam is brought in the state court, and a suit for the same cause of action is subsequently brought in the United States court, the pendency of the suit in the state court is no bar to the suit in the United States court. Stanton v. Embry, 93 U. S. 548, 23 L. Ed. 983; 1 Cyc. 39. The reverse of this is equally true as a general proposition, and the pendency of a prior suit in a Circuit Court of the United States is not a bar to a suit in a state court by the same plaintiff against the same defendant for the same cause of action. This is the general rule, but it is not without exception. The several states form a part of the United States. The federal government has power to enact laws on certain subjects, conferred by the Constitution of the United States, and to administer those laws in the federal courts in cases properly confided to their jurisdiction. For reasons which were satisfactory to the legislative discretion, Congress determined that certain cases, when brought in the state courts, might be removed therefrom to the Circuit Court of the United States. The purpose was to allow a transfer of such cases to be made from the state courts, where they might be brought, and where without such a transfer they would be tried, to the United States court, and to confer upon that court jurisdiction to try them. When a plaintiff institutes a suit in a state court, which is removable to the federal court under the act of Congress, it is the right of the defendant to have a trial of the case in the United States court, upon compliance with the provisions of the act of Congress in regard thereto. It is evident that as to such cases the theory of distinct suits brought in the jurisdiction of separate and independent sovereignties is not applicable. It was never heard of that one sovereign could by law remove to its jurisdiction cases pending in the jurisdiction of an independent foreign sovereign. The government of the United States is complex in character. In many respects each state is a distinct and separate sovereignty with regard to another state and the federal government. But certain matters have been committed by the Constitution of the United States to the general government; and where Congress enacts laws within its constitutional powers, affecting the transfer of a case from the state court to the federal, such enactment and transfer made in pursuance of it is very different from merely commencing two suits in different jurisdictions.

When Congress declared that certain cases might be removed to the federal court and there tried, and that the state court should "proceed no further in such suit," but the cause should then proceed in the Circuit Court of the United States in the same manner as if it had been brought there originally, did it mean to confer exclusive jurisdiction upon the Circuit Court of the United States so long as the suit should be pending there, or did it contemplate that, as soon as the removal should be effected, the same plaintiff could immediately sue again for the same cause of action in the same court whence the removal had been made? Was it the design of Congress that, as fast as a defendant might exercise his right to remove the case to the Circuit Court of the United States for trial, the plaintiff might bring a fresh suit in the state court for the same cause of action? If so, the removal act would practically have no effect. It seems to be clear that the system of removal of cases to the Circuit Court of the United States contemplated that the Circuit Court of the United States should have exclusive jurisdiction of the cause so long as the case should there be pending. See opinion of Swayne, J., in French v. Hay, 22 Wall. 253, 22 L. Ed. 857. If the case be remanded by the federal court to the state court, the jurisdiction of the latter court reattaches, or, more properly speaking, the jurisdiction of the state court, which was suspended after the removal, is resumed, and the case becomes triable in the state court. The provision in the act of Congress for the remand of a case emphasizes the difference between two wholly distinct suits in separate jurisdiction and causes falling within the provisions of the removal act. Suppose we should sustain the judgment of the trial court in this case, holding that the second suit could proceed without reference to the first, and that subsequently the removed case should be remanded from the federal court to the same state court where the second suit was pending, what would be the situation? There would be two suits, then, in the same court; but the time for pleading in abatement would have passed, and it would have been formally adjudicated that the suit first brought furnished no ground for interference with the second.

When a suit is removed from a state court to the United States court, and is there dismissed without a decision on its merits, the plaintiff may bring a new suit in any court having jurisdiction ab origine. McIver v. Fla. Cen. R. Co., 110 Ga. 230, 36 S. E. 775, 65 L. R. A. 437; Webb v. Son. Cotton Oil Co., 131 Ga. 682, 63 S. E. 135; Young v. So. Bell Tel. Co., 75 S. C. 326, 55 S. E. 765, 9 Am. & Eng. Ann. Cas. 940, 7 L. R. A. (N. S.) 501, and citations. When the cause has thus terminated in the Circuit Court of the United States without prejudice to sue again, it is no longer in that court. There is, however, no permanent fastening of jurisdiction for all time in the federal court in respect to the matter involved in the suit. But while the case is there pending that court has exclusive jurisdiction in regard to it and that which is involved in the trial of it. If exclusive jurisdiction was in the federal court when the new suit was filed in the state court, then the latter court was without jurisdiction so long as the case was pending in the United States court. The acts of Congress passed in pursuance of the Constitution of the United States are laws in force in this state; and, if what has been said correctly interprets the removal act, it follows that this plea in abatement should have been sustained.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur, except BECK, J., absent.

LEWMAN v. OWENS.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. April 19, 1909.)

1. DEEDS (§ 97*)—CONSTRUCTION—INCONSISTENT CLAUSES.

The intention of the parties to a deed, from the whole instrument, should, if possible, be ascertained and carried into effect; but, if two clauses in the deed be utterly inconsistent, the former must prevail.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Deeds, Cent. Dig. § 269; Dec. Dig. § 97.*]

2. DEEDS (§ 97*)—CONSTRUCTION—ESTATES AND INTERESTS CONVEYED.

F. executed to H. a quitclaim deed conveying a one-fourth interest in a certain lot of land. H. concurrently executed to F. a deed purporting to convey an undivided one-half interest in an adjoining lot. In each of the deeds was inserted a clause, after the clause of conveyance, and near the close of the paper, which recited that each of the parties acquired an undivided one-half interest in the property by inheritance from their mother, they being her sole heirs at law; that the estate of their mother was never administered, there being no necessity for administration, and no debts against it; that they inherited the property free from incumbrance, and, being of full age, had agreed between themselves upon a division of it; and that each of such deeds was the consideration for the other. In the deed from F. to H. it was also recited that F. "retains an undivided one-fourth interest in the lot in which she this day conveys an undivided one-fourth interest to said H." It was admitted that the recitals as to the manner in which F. had acquired title to the property conveyed by her, that she and H. were the sole heirs of their mother, and that the estate of the latter had never been administered, were untrue. In fact the mother left a will devising her real estate to H. and another daughter, who died testate, devising her estate to F. and H., so that the actual interest which F. owned was an undivided one-fourth interest in the lot described in her conveyance. Held, that by her deed she conveyed to H. the undivided one-fourth interest which she owned, and the subsequent clause, reciting that she also retained a fourth interest, reserved no title in her.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Deeds, Cent. Dig. §§ 267-273, 434-447; Dec. Dig. § 97.*]

3. ESTOPPEL (§ 25*)—EQUITABLE ESTOPPEL—PERSONS ESTOPPED.

Under the facts above stated, when a judgment creditor of the administrator of F., after her death, caused the execution issued thereon to be levied on an undivided one-fourth interest in the lot as belonging to F. under the subsequent clause of recital in the deed, no estoppel arose in favor of such creditor against one who acquired title under H.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Estoppel, Cent. Dig. §§ 61, 62; Dec. Dig. § 25.*]

4. DEEDS (§ 109*)—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

Evidence was offered to show that, a number of years before F. executed her deed to H., the mother of F., together with her two daughters other than F., signed a deed to the husband of F., covering a four-fifths interest in the lot adjoining that now involved, on which they lived afterwards, but which former deed was not shown to have been known to F., or to have been delivered or recorded until several years after the deeds between F. and H. Held, that the evidence was properly rejected.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Deeds, Cent. Dig. §§ 239, 280; Dec. Dig. § 109.*]

5. DEEDS (§ 109*)—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

An inventory made by the administrator of F., after her death, was not admissible for the purpose of throwing light on her intention when she executed the deed to H.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Deeds, Cent. Dig. §§ 239, 280; Dec. Dig. § 109.*]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; W. D. Ellis, Judge.

An execution in favor of H. L. Lewman having been levied upon a one-fourth interest in a lot, John S. Owens appeared and interposed a claim. Judgment for claimant, and Lewman brings error. Affirmed.

Mrs. Mariah L. Harris owned certain land in the city of Atlanta. She died testate, leaving three living daughters. By her will she left the proceeds of a policy of life insurance to be divided among her three daughters and the children of a deceased son. The rest of her property she bequeathed to her two unmarried daughters, Josephine and Matilda. This will was probated in 1885. Subsequently one of the unmarried daughters, Matilda, died, leaving a will which was probated in August, 1897. By one item of it she devised to her two sisters, Josephine E. Harris and Frances F. Farrar, share and share alike, "my one-half interest in the house and lot on Courtland street, * * * willed to me by my mother." On April 2, 1898, Mrs. Farrar executed to Josephine Harris a quitclaim deed, which was recorded in 1899. It recited a consideration of "the sum of $5 (and the consideration hereinafter mentioned) cash in hand paid, the receipt of which is hereby acknowledged," and conveyed "an undivided one-fourth interest in a tract of land lying and being in the city of Atlanta, county of Fulton," describing the lot on Courtland street. After the conveying clause the deed contained the following: "The parties to this deed each acquired an undivided half interest in the property described herein by inheritance from their mother, Mariah L. Harris; they being the sole heirs at law of said Mariah L. Harris. The estate of said Mariah L. Harris was never administered, for the reason that no administration was necessary, and it owed and owes no debts. The parties to this deed inherited said property in said respective interests free from incumbrance; and they as sole heirs at law of said deceased, being of legal age and in their own right, have agreed among themselves upon a division of the property embraced in this deed and another deed, of same date made by Josephine E. Harris to Fannie F. Farrar, by which said Harris conveyed to said Farrar a one-half interest in another lot of the same size as this. Each of said deeds is the consideration for the other. With all the rights, members, and appurtenances to the said bargained premises in any wise appertaining or belonging. Said Mrs. Farrar retains an undivided one-fourth interest in the lot in which she this day conveys an undivided one-fourth interest to said Miss Harris. To have and to hold the said bargained premises unto the said Josephine E. Harris, heirs and assigns, so that neither the said Fannie F. Farrar, nor her heirs, nor any other person or persons claiming under her, shall at any time have, claim, or demand any right, title, or interest to the aforesaid bargained premises or its appurtenances." On the same day Miss Josephine Harris made to Mrs. Farrar a quitclaim deed which recited the consideration of $5 "and the consideration hereinafter named," and purported to convey an undivided one-half interest in the lot adjoining that described in the deed made by Mrs. Farrar. This deed contained the same recitals in regard to the source of the title as those in the deed from Mrs. Farrar to Miss Harris, and also contained the following statement in connection therewith: "Said Mrs. Farrar retains an undivided one-fourth interest in the lot which she this day conveys to said Josephine E. Harris, so that she only conveys an undivided one-fourth interest therein."

It was admitted by the parties that the recitals as to the manner in which Mrs. Farrar acquired title to the property, and that she and Josephine Harris were the sole heirs of Mariah L. Harris, and that the estate of Mrs. Harris was never administered, were untrue. On December 11, 1900, Josephine Harris conveyed an undivided one-fourth interest in the same land to John S. Owens. In 1899 she had made a conveyance to a three-fourths interest to one Matthews, who conveyed to the Equitable Loan & Security Company in 1900, and that company conveyed to Owens in 1906. On June 27, 1902, Lewman recovered a judgment against the administrator of Mrs. Farrar, who had died. The execution issued thereon was levied on a one-fourth interest in the lot of land described in the deed from Mrs. Farrar to Josephine Harris, on February 9, 1906. Owens interposed a claim. On the trial the facts stated above were shown, without conflict in the evidence. There were some other testimony not material to be set out. The presiding judge directed a verdict in favor of the claimant. The plaintiff moved for a new trial, which was refused, and he excepted.

McDaniel, Alston & Black, for plaintiff in error. E. M. & G. F. Mitchell, for defendant in error.

LUMPKIN, J. (after stating the facts as above). 1, 2 Mrs. Farrar and her sister, Josephine E. Harris, owned undivided interests in certain land. Two adjoining lots had originally belonged to their mother, who devised them to Josephine and another sister, Matilda, who later died, leaving a will by which she devised her interest in the property to her two sisters. Thus Mrs. Farrar owned a one-fourth interest, and Josephine a three-fourths, in the lot now in controversy. Certain litigation in regard to the lot adjoining that now involved will be found reported in Equitable Loan & Security Co. v. Lewman, 124 Ga. 190, 52 S. E. 599, 3 L. R. A. (N. S.) 879. Mrs. Farrar and her sister made cross deeds to each other for the purpose of making a division of the property, as they declared therein. Josephine conveyed to Mrs. Farrar an interest in the adjoining land (referred to as a one-half interest). Mrs. Farrar undertook to convey something in return to Josephine. She owned a one-fourth interest in the lot now involved in litigation and no more. In the conveying clause of her deed she stated that she "has bargained, sold, and does by these presents bargain, sell, remise, release, and forever quitclaim, to the said Josephine

E. Harris, her heirs and assigns, all the right, title, interest, claim, or demand which the said Fannie F. Farrar has or may have had in and to an undivided one-fourth interest" in the lot described in it. In a later clause inserted in the deed it was recited that she conveyed a one-fourth interest to her sister and had a one-fourth interest left. It is admitted that the recitals that she obtained a one-half interest by inheritance were erroneous. In fact, she had no more than a fourth interest.

It is evident that in the division she intended to convey something to her sister in consideration of the conveyance which the sister made to her concurrently with her deed. As she had only a fourth interest, it must follow, either that she conveyed the one-fourth interest to her sister, and had nothing left, or else that she conveyed nothing to her sister, and had a fourth interest left. Under one construction of the deed, she made a division with her sister, receiving a conveyance from the latter as to other property, and conveying to the sister her interest in this property. Under the other construction, in making deeds to effectuate a division of property with her sister, she received a deed and conveyed nothing in return. It is hardly conceivable that such was the intention of the parties, and that they meant that the conveyance of Mrs. Farrar should in effect say that she conveyed her one-fourth interest in the lot to her sister Josephine, but at the same time retained it in herself. The deed, so construed, would be a somewhat elaborate method of conveying nothing. Having but the interest in the lot above stated, Mrs. Farrar could not both convey it and keep it. If the two clauses of her deed were construed so as to have that meaning, they would be utterly inconsistent, and the former would prevail. Civ. Code 1895, § 3607. If by error of the scrivener, or otherwise, it was supposed that she had another one-fourth interest in the lot besides that which she conveyed, such a recital would not destroy the conveyance of the interest which she really had, and thus render the deed wholly ineffective. One can no more convey all of the estate which he owns in a lot, and yet retain some of it, than he can perform that other proverbially impossible feat of eating his cake and still having it left.

3. It was urged that Owens claimed under Josephine Harris, and in his chain of title was the deed from Mrs. Farrar, which recited that she retained an undivided one-fourth interest in the property, and that he was thereby estopped. It was admitted on the trial that the recitals in the deeds made by Mrs. Farrar to her sister, and by the latter to her, purporting to set out how they acquired title, were not true. Those recitals furnished the only indication that Mrs. Farrar ever had more than a one-fourth interest in the lot. Lewman, who is making the contention, is a judgment creditor of Mrs. Farrar, not a party in estate with her. See Equitable Loan & Security Co. v. Lewman, 124 Ga. 198, 52 S. E. 599, 3 L. R. A. (N. S.) 879. The deed from Mrs. Farrar to her sister conveyed the one-fourth interest in the lot which the maker owned, and there was no error on the part of the trial judge in so holding, and directing a verdict.

4, 5. Counsel for the plaintiff offered evidence to show that a deed dated June 27, 1888, and recorded in 1902, was made by Mariah L., Josephine, and Matilda Harris as grantors, and Robert M. Farrar as grantee, purporting to convey the interest of the grantors in the property adjoining that in controversy, recited to be a four-fifths undivided interest therein. Testimony of Farrar was also offered, indicating that he knew nothing of the deed made to him until 1900, when he went to Texas, and his sister-in-law delivered a lot of papers to him, among which he found it; that he did not know where she obtained it or anything about it; and that he and his wife lived on the lot, and Mrs. Harris lived with them for several years, as did also his sister-in-law. On objection this evidence was excluded. There was also offered a copy of an inventory made by the administrator of Mrs. Farrar in 1903, in which was returned by him a one-fourth interest in this property. This was also excluded on objection. These rulings were correct. The evidence in regard to the deed made to Farrar in 1888, and which he swore without contradiction he discovered in 1900, after the making of the deeds between his wife and her sister, would not serve to throw light on the intention of Mrs. Farrar as to what interest in the other lot she conveyed. An inventory made by Mrs. Farrar's administrator, long after the execution of the deeds now under discussion, and after she had died, could not have any force in construing the deed made by her to her sister.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

GODLEY et al. v. BARNES.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. April 19, 1909.)

1. ADVERSE POSSESSION (§ 116*) — INSTRUCTIONS.

Where both parties to an action of ejectment claimed to have title by prescription, the plaintiffs asserting a possession under color of title for 7 years, and defendants setting up adverse possession for 20 years, it was error prejudicial to the plaintiffs to charge that, if they were in possession for 7 years or more, that would give them a good prescriptive title, "unless prior to that time there was another good title outstanding against them." This was calculated to lead the jury to believe that adverse possession for 7 years under color of title would not avail against the holder of a prior outstanding title.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. & Am. Digs. 1907 to date, & Reporter Indexes

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Adverse Possession, Dec. Dig. § 116.*]

2. EVIDENCE (§ 273*) — ADVERSE POSSESSION (§ 85*)—JUDGMENT (§§ 707, 708*)—DECLARATIONS CHARACTERIZING POSSESSION AS ADVERSE.

Where a defendant in ejectment claimed to have prescriptive title by virtue of 20 years' adverse possession of the land in dispute by himself and those under whom he held, if he showed possession of the land in one under whom he claimed, it was competent to show acts or declarations on the part of such person characterizing his possession as adverse; and for that purpose it was admissible to prove that, while in possession, he brought suit in assumption against a person who had boxed for turpentine pine trees on the land, though a stranger to the title of the plaintiff in ejectment. But the record of such a suit would not be admissible as showing a conclusive adjudication of title, or as proving the truth of the facts alleged by the plaintiff therein, nor would the mere fact of the rendition of a judgment in such a case be relevant, nor would it be a part of the assertion or claim of title made by the plaintiff in such suit.

3. EVIDENCE (§ 460*)—PAROL EVIDENCE AFFECTING WRITINGS—PLEADINGS.

If the declaration in the former suit was otherwise admissible, as being in the nature of an assertion or act characterizing the possession of the plaintiff therein as adverse, and if the description of the land in such declaration was general in character, but might have been applicable to the land in controversy in the ejectment case, it was competent to show by parol that the trees claimed to have been boxed were located on the land involved in the ejectment suit, in the nature of applying a declaration or assertion to its subject-matter by showing the circumstances in connection with which it was made.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Dec. Dig. § 460.*]

4. OTHER QUESTIONS OF EVIDENCE NOT CONSIDERED.

As the evidence on the next trial may not be the same, other questions dependent upon the evidence will not be dealt with.

5. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 343*)—RECORD—SUPPORTING OMISSIONS.

As the judge who presided on the hearing of the motion for new trial, in the opinion filed by him in connection with overruling the motion, referred to the general charge, and it did not appear in the record, an order was passed by this court directing the clerk of the superior court to transmit the entire charge of the court. In accordance with this order a transcript of the charge has been forwarded by the clerk of the trial court; but it appears from the certificate thereto attached that it was written out by the official stenographer after the order was passed by this court, and was then agreed upon by counsel as being correct, and the clerk certified that the original charge of the court was either lost, mislaid, or had never been filed. Held, that such charge thus transmitted cannot be considered by this court. Only a record or portion thereof already existing when the case is brought to this court can be required to be thus transmitted. An addition cannot afterwards be made to the record and then sent to this court. Lyndon v. Ga. Ry. & Elec. Co., 129 Ga. 353, 362, 58 S. E. 1047.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Dec. Dig. § 543.*]

6. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 928*)—OPINION OF LOWER COURT—CONSTRUCTION.

The erroneous charge dealt with in the first headnote was positively certified to have been given. There was no qualification by the judge who presided at the trial and approved the grounds of the motion, and it does not affirmatively appear that the erroneous charge was subsequently qualified, so as to obviate or cure the error therein. The statement of the judge who presided on the hearing of the motion for new trial, in the opinion filed by him, that "the exceptions to the charge disappear before a reading of the charge in its entirety," was merely an expression of opinion, and not a certificate of any qualification or modification of the charge to which exception was taken. Bryson v. Chisholm, 56 Ga. 596.

GLAUSIER, WATSON & CO. v. BOSTON NAVAL STORES CO.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. May 12, 1909.)

PARTNERSHIP (§ 216*)—PLEADING AND PROOF—VARIANCE.

Where a partnership is sued for an alleged breach of contract of sale to it, and the plaintiff's proof develops that, if any sale was made, it was jointly to the partnership and to an individual not a member thereof, the variance between the allegata and probata is fatal.

Error from Superior Court, Thomas County; R. G. Mitchell, Judge.

Action by Glausier, Watson & Co. against the Boston Naval Stores Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs bring error. Affirmed.

R. J. Bacon and J. H. Merrill, for plaintiffs in error. Bennet & Conyers and W. C. Snodgrass, for defendant in error.

EVANS, P. J. T. J. Glausier and C. I. Clifford, alleging themselves to be partners doing business under the firm name of Glausier, Watson & Co., brought suit against the Boston Naval Stores Company, a partnership alleged to consist of E. R. Whaley,

M. R. Mallette, and H. M. Myrick, and against the partners individually, to recover damages for a breach of contract of sale of a turpentine business. The plaintiffs were nonsuited, and they excepted.

It appeared from the plaintiffs' evidence that they operated a naval stores business at Inwood, Jackson county, Fla., and on November 9, 1905, executed to the parties therein named the following paper: "Jackson County, Florida. In consideration of the sum of seventeen thousand dollars ($17,000.00), we, Glausier, Watson & Co., hereby lease, sell, and convey all our turpentine interest and holdings, including real estate, turpentine and timber leases, still and fixtures, live stock, wagons, harness, and everything now in use in conducting our business in said state and county; also commissary stock and store fixtures. We hereby acknowledge receipt of one hundred dollars ($100) in cash in hand paid, and accept same as partial payment on above-mentioned property, from Boston Naval Stores Company, consisting of M. R. Mallette, E. R. Whaley, and H. M. Myrick, and L. F. Driver, to whom we have this day sold above-mentioned property. We, Glausier, Watson & Co., to give immediate possession. We agree to cancel all obligations against the business of Glausier, Watson & Co., and turn same over to Boston Naval Stores Company and L. F. Driver, free and unincumbered in any way, upon the payment of balance due on purchase price. We consider this a cash transaction, settlement to be made as soon as convenient to all parties mentioned. [Signed] Glausier, Watson & Co." Glausier signed the paper for the plaintiffs' firm and delivered it to Whaley, who gave Glausier a check for $100, signed "Boston Naval Stores Co." Payment of the check was stopped by the drawers. On November 15th the vendee refused to proceed further with the sale, and the plaintiffs took charge of the property.

We will not attempt a summary of the plaintiffs' evidence, introduced for the purpose of identifying the subject-matter of the sale, showing acceptance of the property by the purchasers, and establishing the various elements of damages alleged to have been sustained. This becomes unnecessary, for the reason that, if we allow the fullest scope and effect to this evidence as contended by the plaintiffs, still, under the pleadings and evidence, a nonsuit was inevitable. The terms of the sale and the names of the purchasers are alleged to be contained in the written memorandum attached to the petition by amendment. According to this paper the plaintiffs contracted to sell their turpentine business to the "Boston Naval Stores Company, consisting of M. R. Mallette, E. R. Whaley, and H. M. Myrick, and L. F. Driver." In the plaintiffs' covenant to deliver the property to the purchasers free of incumbrance it is made clear that the purchasers were the Boston Naval Stores Company and L. F. Driver. The memorandum of sale was in the possession of the defendants when the suit was filed, and was produced under notice, and introduced in evidence by the plaintiffs. When it was discovered, from the memorandum of sale signed by the plaintiffs, that the purchasers were the Boston Naval Stores Company and L. F. Driver, and there was a variance between the allegation of the petition, that the sale was to the Boston Naval Stores Company and the proof in this particular, the plaintiffs amended their petition. The amendment in substance was that the written contract is not in form as agreed upon; that L. F. Driver was no party to the purchase, but the same was made to the Boston Naval Stores Company, and that by the mutual mistake of the parties, and by the mistake of the scrivener, the name of L. F. Driver was inadvertently inserted; and the prayer was that Driver (who was declared to be a resident of the county where the suit was pending) be made a party and served with a copy of the petition and amendment, and that the contract be reformed by striking therefrom the name of Driver. The amendment was allowed, but no service was had upon Driver.

In the assignment of error upon the grant of the nonsuit, it is alleged that, when the motion for a nonsuit was made by the defendants, the plaintiffs objected thereto on the grounds (a) that the case was proved as laid, and (b) that the plaintiffs, after amendment to reform the contract of sale was allowed, were entitled to an opportunity to serve L. F. Driver, and that the court overruled the objections and granted the nonsuit. If plaintiffs desired to serve L. F. Driver, application should have been made to continue or postpone the case for that purpose. It is not to be expected that a court will of its own motion continue a case because of an amendment which a plaintiff makes to his own pleading. On the motion for nonsuit the question was whether the cause of action as formulated in the petition was supported by the evidence. The plaintiffs in their petition averred the sale was made to the Boston Naval Stores Company, and the paper relied on in part to establish the contract of sale set forth a sale to the Boston Naval Stores Company and L. F. Driver. The plaintiffs realized their dilemma, and by amendment asked to reform the writing by striking therefrom the name of Driver. There was no proof offered to sustain the amendment, and the case stood as made in the petition before the amendment, wherein the plaintiffs alleged that they sold their turpentine plant to a partnership. Their proof shows that, if any sale was made, it was to a partnership and an individual. An allegation of a sale to A. is not proved by evidence of a sale to A. and B. Howell v. Shands, 35 Ga. 66; Thompson v. Fenn, 100 Ga. 234, 28 S. E. 39. This variance between the allegata and probata justified the grant of the nonsuit.

Complaint is made in the bill of exceptions that the court erred in excluding certain evidence tending to show what property was covered by the written contract of sale which the plaintiffs gave to the defendants. If this evidence had been allowed, the aspect of the case would not have been changed, so far as concerned the variance between the petition and the proof to which we have just referred. Complaint is also made to the allowance of an amendment to the answer. As the plaintiffs were nonsuited because they failed to prove their case as laid, it is immaterial whether the amendment to the plea should have been allowed or rejected.

H. W. Dent and W. R. Hammond, for plaintiff in error. Dorsey, Brewster, Howell & Heyman, for defendant in error.

BECK, J. In the petition as originally filed it is alleged, in substance, that the plaintiff boarded the Birmingham train at night with a ticket authorizing him to travel from Atlanta to Birmingham; that he took his seat in a passenger coach of the train, and after it had proceeded a short distance from the terminal station the conductor of the train came to petitioner, and without asking him for his fare or his ticket, or giving him an opportunity to produce his ticket, caught him roughly by the arm and told him that he had to get off the train; and, summoning the porter to assist him, he violently and forcibly dragged petitioner to the door of the car, then out on the platform, and shoved and kicked him off of the train, without any provocation whatever on the part of petitioner. Plaintiff averred that he was behaving himself properly, and that there was no reason why he should have been treated in the manner described. In the declaration it is averred that plaintiff was mortified and humiliated, and other elements of damage were alleged. The case proceeded to trial, and on the trial the plaintiff testified that he went into the car and went to sleep, and the next thing he knew they were putting him off the train. Petitioner asked them what they meant by it, and before he could realize what they were doing he struck the ground. He does not remember what the conductor said to him until after he had been put off the train. He testified that the conductor did not ask him for his ticket, or for anything. In the amendment, which was disallowed, the plaintiff averred that the defendant failed in his duty to him as a passenger, in that he was in a weak physical condition by reason of loss of sleep, and was exhausted; that he was sound asleep when the conductor came along to take up his ticket; that he was also under the influence of drugs and medicine taken because of his sickness; that the conductor aroused him suddenly, or attempted to do so, and, before petitioner was fully aroused, and before he was at himself, or knew what he was doing, "hustled" him off the train without giving him an opportunity, after he became con-

E. Harris, her heirs and assigns, all the right, title, interest, claim, or demand which the said Fannie F. Farrar has or may have had in and to an undivided one-fourth interest in the lot described in it. In a later clause inserted in the deed it was recited that she conveyed a one-fourth interest to her sister and had a one-fourth interest left. It is admitted that the recitals that she obtained a one-half interest by inheritance were erroneous. In fact, she had no more than a fourth interest.

It is evident that in the division she intended to convey something to her sister in consideration of the conveyance which the sister made to her concurrently with her deed. As she had only a fourth interest, it must follow, either that she conveyed the one-fourth interest to her sister, and had nothing left, or else that she conveyed nothing to her sister, and had a fourth interest left. Under one construction of the deed, she made a division with her sister, receiving a conveyance from the latter as to other property, and conveying to the sister her interest in this property. Under the other construction, in making deeds to effectuate a division of property with her sister, she received a deed and conveyed nothing in return. It is hardly conceivable that such was the intention of the parties, and that they meant that the conveyance of Mrs. Farrar should in effect say that she conveyed her one-fourth interest in the lot to her sister Josephine, but at the same time retained it in herself. The deed, so construed, would be a somewhat elaborate method of conveying nothing. Having but the interest in the lot above stated, Mrs. Farrar could not both convey it and keep it. If the two clauses of her deed were construed so as to have that meaning, they would be utterly inconsistent, and the former would prevail. Civ. Code 1895, § 3607. If by error of the scrivener, or otherwise, it was supposed that she had another one-fourth interest in the lot besides that which she conveyed, such a recital would not destroy the conveyance of the interest which she really had, and thus render the deed wholly ineffective. One can no more convey all of the estate which he owns in a lot, and yet retain some of it, than he can perform that other proverbially impossible feat of eating his cake and still having it left.

3. It was urged that Owens claimed under Josephine Harris, and in his chain of title was the deed from Mrs. Farrar, which recited that she retained an undivided one-fourth interest in the property, and that he was thereby estopped. It was admitted on the trial that the recitals in the deeds made by Mrs. Farrar to her sister, and by the latter to her, purporting to set out how they acquired title, were not true. Those recitals furnished the only indication that Mrs. Farrar ever had more than a one-fourth interest in the lot. Lewman, who is making the contention, is a judgment creditor of Mrs. Farrar, not a party in estate with her. See Equitable Loan & Security Co. v. Lewman, 124 Ga. 198, 52 S. E. 599, 3 L. R. A. (N. S.) 879. The deed from Mrs. Farrar to her sister conveyed the one-fourth interest in the lot which the maker owned, and there was no error on the part of the trial judge in so holding, and directing a verdict.

4, 5. Counsel for the plaintiff offered evidence to show that a deed dated June 27, 1888, and recorded in 1902, was made by Mariah L., Josephine, and Matilda Harris as grantors, and Robert M. Farrar as grantee, purporting to convey the interest of the grantors in the property adjoining that in controversy, recited to be a four-fifths undivided interest therein. Testimony of Farrar was also offered, indicating that he knew nothing of the deed made to him until 1900, when he went to Texas, and his sister-in-law delivered a lot of papers to him, among which he found it; that he did not know where she obtained it or anything about it; and that he and his wife lived on the lot, and Mrs. Harris lived with them for several years, as did also his sister-in-law. On objection this evidence was excluded. There was also offered a copy of an inventory made by the administrator of Mrs. Farrar in 1903, in which was returned by him a one-fourth interest in this property. This was also excluded on objection. These rulings were correct. The evidence in regard to the deed made to Farrar in 1888, and which he swore without contradiction he discovered in 1900, after the making of the deeds between his wife and her sister, would not serve to throw light on the intention of Mrs. Farrar as to what interest in the other lot she conveyed. An inventory made by Mrs. Farrar's administrator, long after the execution of the deeds now under discussion, and after she had died, could not have any force in construing the deed made by her to her sister.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

GODLEY et al. v. BARNES.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. April 19, 1909.)

1. ADVERSE POSSESSION (§ 116*) — INSTRUCTIONS.

Where both parties to an action of ejectment claimed to have title by prescription, the plaintiffs asserting a possession under color of title for 7 years, and defendants setting up adverse possession for 20 years, it was error prejudicial to the plaintiffs to charge that, if they were in possession for 7 years or more, that would give them a good prescriptive title, "unless prior to that time there was another good title outstanding against them." This was calculated to lead the jury to believe that adverse possession for 7 years under color of title would not avail against the holder of a prior outstanding title.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Adverse Possession, Dec. Dig. § 116.*]

2. EVIDENCE (§ 273*) — ADVERSE POSSESSION (§ 85*)—JUDGMENT (§§ 707, 708*)—DECLARATIONS CHARACTERIZING POSSESSION AS ADVERSE.

Where a defendant in ejectment claimed to have prescriptive title by virtue of 20 years' adverse possession of the land in dispute by himself and those under whom he held, if he showed possession of the land in one under whom he claimed, it was competent to show acts or declarations on the part of such person characterizing his possession as adverse; and for that purpose it was admissible to prove that, while in possession, he brought suit in assumption against a person who had boxed for turpentine pine trees on the land, though a stranger to the title of the plaintiff in ejectment. But the record of such a suit would not be admissible as showing a conclusive adjudication of title, or as proving the truth of the facts alleged by the plaintiff therein, nor would the mere fact of the rendition of a judgment in such a case be relevant, nor would it be a part of the assertion or claim of title made by the plaintiff in such suit.

3. EVIDENCE (§ 460*)—PAROL EVIDENCE AFFECTING WRITINGS—PLEADINGS.

If the declaration in the former suit was otherwise admissible as being in the nature of an assertion or act characterizing the possession of the plaintiff therein as adverse, and if the description of the land in such declaration was general in character, but might have been applicable to the land in controversy in the ejectment case, it was competent to show by parol that the trees claimed to have been boxed were located on the land involved in the ejectment suit, in the nature of applying a declaration or assertion to its subject-matter by showing the circumstances in connection with which it was made.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Dec. Dig. § 460.*]

4. OTHER QUESTIONS OF EVIDENCE NOT CONSIDERED.

As the evidence on the next trial may not be the same, other questions dependent upon the evidence will not be dealt with.

5. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 543*)—RECORD—SUPPLYING OMISSIONS.

As the judge who presided on the hearing of the motion for new trial, in the opinion filed by him in connection with overruling the motion, referred to the general charge, and it did not appear in the record, an order was passed by this court directing the clerk of the superior court to transmit the entire charge of the court. In accordance with this order a transcript of the charge has been forwarded by the clerk of the trial court; but it appears from the certificate thereto attached that it was written out by the official stenographer after the order was passed by this court, and was then agreed upon by counsel as being correct, and the clerk certified that the original charge of the court was either lost, mislaid, or had never been filed. Held, that such charge thus transmitted cannot be considered by this court. Only a record or portion thereof already existing when the case is brought to this court can be required to be thus transmitted. An addition cannot afterwards be made to the record and then sent to this court. Lyndon v. Ga. Ry. & Elec. Co., 129 Ga. 353, 362, 58 S. E. 1047.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Dec. Dig. § 543.*]

6. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 928*)—OPINION OF LOWER COURT—CONSTRUCTION.

The erroneous charge dealt with in the first headnote was positively certified to have been given. There was no qualification by the judge who presided at the trial and approved the grounds of the motion, and it does not affirmatively appear that the erroneous charge was subsequently qualified, so as to obviate or cure the error therein. The statement of the judge who presided on the hearing of the motion for new trial, in the opinion filed by him, that "the exceptions to the charge disappear before a reading of the charge in its entirety," was merely an expression of opinion, and not a certificate of any qualification or modification of the charge to which exception was taken. Bryson v. Chisholm, 56 Ga. 596.

GLAUSIER, WATSON & CO. v. BOSTON NAVAL STORES CO.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. May 12, 1909.)

PARTNERSHIP (§ 216*)—PLEADING AND PROOF—VARIANCE.

Where a partnership is sued for an alleged breach of contract of sale to it, and the plaintiff's proof develops that, if any sale was made, it was jointly to the partnership and to an individual not a member thereof, the variance between the allegata and probata is fatal.

Error from Superior Court, Thomas County; R. G. Mitchell, Judge.

Action by Glausier, Watson & Co. against the Boston Naval Stores Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs bring error. Affirmed.

R. J. Bacon and J. H. Merrill, for plaintiffs in error. Bennet & Conyers and W. C. Snodgrass, for defendant in error.

EVANS, P. J. T. J. Glausier and C. I. Clifford, alleging themselves to be partners doing business under the firm name of Glausier, Watson & Co., brought suit against the Boston Naval Stores Company, a partnership alleged to consist of E. R. Whaley,

M. R. Mallette, and H. M. Myrick, and against the partners individually, to recover damages for a breach of contract of sale of a turpentine business. The plaintiffs were nonsuited, and they excepted.

It appeared from the plaintiffs' evidence that they operated a naval stores business at Inwood, Jackson county, Fla., and on November 9, 1905, executed to the parties therein named the following paper: "Jackson County, Florida. In consideration of the sum of seventeen thousand dollars ($17,000.00), we, Glausier, Watson & Co., hereby lease, sell, and convey all our turpentine interest and holdings, including real estate, turpentine and timber leases, still and fixtures, live stock, wagons, harness, and everything now in use in conducting our business in said state and county; also commissary stock and store fixtures. We hereby acknowledge receipt of one hundred dollars ($100) in cash in hand paid, and accept same as partial payment on above-mentioned property, from Boston Naval Stores Company, consisting of M. R. Mallette, E. R. Whaley, and H. M. Myrick, and L. F. Driver, to whom we have this day sold above-mentioned property. We, Glausier, Watson & Co., to give immediate possession. We agree to cancel all obligations against the business of Glausier, Watson & Co., and turn same over to Boston Naval Stores Company and L. F. Driver, free and unincumbered in any way, upon the payment of balance due on purchase price. We consider this a cash transaction, settlement to be made as soon as convenient to all parties mentioned. [Signed] Glausier, Watson & Co." Glausier signed the paper for the plaintiffs' firm and delivered it to Whaley, who gave Glausier a check for $100, signed "Boston Naval Stores Co." Payment of the check was stopped by the drawers. On November 15th the vendee refused to proceed further with the sale, and the plaintiffs took charge of the property.

We will not attempt a summary of the plaintiffs' evidence, introduced for the purpose of identifying the subject-matter of the sale, showing acceptance of the property by the purchasers, and establishing the various elements of damages alleged to have been sustained. This becomes unnecessary, for the reason that, if we allow the fullest scope and effect to this evidence as contended by the plaintiffs, still, under the pleadings and evidence, a nonsuit was inevitable. The terms of the sale and the names of the purchasers are alleged to be contained in the written memorandum attached to the petition by amendment. According to this paper the plaintiffs contracted to sell their turpentine business to the "Boston Naval Stores Company, consisting of M. R. Mallette, E. R. Whaley, and H. M. Myrick, and L. F. Driver." In the plaintiffs' covenant to deliver the property to the purchasers free of incumbrance it is made clear that the purchasers were the Boston Naval Stores Company and L. F. Driver. The memorandum of sale was in the possession of the defendants when the suit was filed, and was produced under notice, and introduced in evidence by the plaintiffs. When it was discovered, from the memorandum of sale signed by the plaintiffs, that the purchasers were the Boston Naval Stores Company and L. F. Driver, and there was a variance between the allegation of the petition, that the sale was to the Boston Naval Stores Company and the proof in this particular, the plaintiffs amended their petition. The amendment in substance was that the written contract is not in form as agreed upon; that L. F. Driver was no party to the purchase, but the same was made to the Boston Naval Stores Company, and that by the mutual mistake of the parties, and by the mistake of the scrivener, the name of L. F. Driver was inadvertently inserted; and the prayer was that Driver (who was declared to be a resident of the county where the suit was pending) be made a party and served with a copy of the petition and amendment, and that the contract be reformed by striking therefrom the name of Driver. The amendment was allowed, but no service was had upon Driver.

In the assignment of error upon the grant of the nonsuit, it is alleged that, when the motion for a nonsuit was made by the defendants, the plaintiffs objected thereto on the grounds (a) that the case was proved as laid, and (b) that the plaintiffs, after amendment to reform the contract of sale was allowed, were entitled to an opportunity to serve L. F. Driver, and that the court overruled the objections and granted the nonsuit. If plaintiffs desired to serve L. F. Driver, application should have been made to continue or postpone the case for that purpose. It is not to be expected that a court will of its own motion continue a case because of an amendment which a plaintiff makes to his own pleading. On the motion for nonsuit the question was whether the cause of action as formulated in the petition was supported by the evidence. The plaintiffs in their petition averred the sale was made to the Boston Naval Stores Company, and the paper relied on in part to establish the contract of sale set forth a sale to the Boston Naval Stores Company and L. F. Driver. The plaintiffs realized their dilemma, and by amendment asked to reform the writing by striking therefrom the name of Driver. There was no proof offered to sustain the amendment, and the case stood as made in the petition before the amendment, wherein the plaintiffs alleged that they sold their turpentine plant to a partnership. Their proof shows that, if any sale was made, it was to a partnership and an individual. An allegation of a sale to A. is not proved by evidence of a sale to A. and B. Howell v. Shands, 35 Ga. 66; Thompson v. Fenn, 100 Ga. 234, 28 S. E. 39. This variance between the allegata and probata justified the grant of the nonsuit.

Complaint is made in the bill of exceptions that the court erred in excluding certain evidence tending to show what property was covered by the written contract of sale which the plaintiffs gave to the defendants. If this evidence had been allowed, the aspect of the case would not have been changed, so far as concerned the variance between the petition and the proof to which we have just referred. Complaint is also made to the allowance of an amendment to the answer. As the plaintiffs were nonsuited because they failed to prove their case as laid, it is immaterial whether the amendment to the plea should have been allowed or rejected.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

2. REVIEW ON APPEAL.

The judgment of the court below refusing a new trial being affirmed upon the ground that the evidence demanded a verdict in favor of the defendant, it is unnecessary to consider the other assignments of error.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; J. T. Pendleton, Judge.

Action by E. W. Watson against the Southern Railway Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

The plaintiff alleged that, being a passenger holding a ticket entitling him to transportation, he was wrongfully and tortiously ejected from a passenger train of the defendant company by the conductor. After the evidence was closed for both sides, and before the court began the charge to the jury, the plaintiff offered an amendment to his petition, which the court refused to allow. The jury returned a verdict for the defendant. The plaintiff's motion for a new trial was overruled. He excepted to each of the rulings just stated. For the other facts, see the opinion of the court.

H. W. Dent and W. R. Hammond, for plaintiff in error. Dorsey, Brewster, Howell & Heyman, for defendant in error.

BECK, J. In the petition as originally filed it is alleged, in substance, that the plaintiff boarded the Birmingham train at night with a ticket authorizing him to travel from Atlanta to Birmingham; that he took his seat in a passenger coach of the train, and after it had proceeded a short distance from the terminal station the conductor of the train came to petitioner, and without asking him for his fare or his ticket, or giving him an opportunity to produce his ticket, caught him roughly by the arm and told him that he had to get off the train; and, summoning the porter to assist him, he violently and forcibly dragged petitioner to the door of the car, then out on the platform, and shoved and kicked him off of the train, without any provocation whatever on the part of petitioner. Plaintiff averred that he was behaving himself properly, and that there was no reason why he should have been treated in the manner described. In the declaration it is averred that plaintiff was mortified and humiliated, and other elements of damage were alleged. The case proceeded to trial, and on the trial the plaintiff testified that he went into the car and went to sleep, and the next thing he knew they were putting him off the train. Petitioner asked them what they meant by it, and before he could realize what they were doing he struck the ground. He does not remember what the conductor said to him until after he had been put off the train. He testified that the conductor did not ask him for his ticket, or for anything. In the amendment, which was disallowed, the plaintiff averred that the defendant failed in his duty to him as a passenger, in that he was in a weak physical condition by reason of loss of sleep, and was exhausted; that he was sound asleep when the conductor came along to take up his ticket; that he was also under the influence of drugs and medicine taken because of his sickness; that the conductor aroused him suddenly, or attempted to do so, and, before petitioner was fully aroused, and before he was at himself, or knew what he was doing, "hustled" him off the train without giving him an opportunity, after he became conscious of what was going on, to pay his fare or deliver his ticket; and that petitioner, in his weak and excited condition, was wholly unable to understand the situation and appreciate what was going on, and for this reason failed to tender his ticket, but "was hustled off" before he had time to do so. And in the second division of the amendment to the petition it is averred that the conductor, by the exercise of proper care, could and ought to have ascertained petitioner's condition, and ought to have waited on petitioner until he was fully aroused, and fully at himself, and was fully conscious of his surroundings, and that the conductor failed to exercise toward petitioner the degree of care required by law, and that if he had done so it would have been unnecessary to eject plaintiff from the train.

Conceding that the amendment was germane to the cause of action as originally stated in the petition, we do not think that its rejection is cause for a new trial, as, under the evidence in the case, a verdict for the defendant was demanded. It is to be remembered that this amendment was tendered after the evidence for both sides had been concluded. Its rejection did not deprive plaintiff of the right to introduce evidence in his favor. He had already introduced, under the allegations of the original petition, all of the evidence bearing upon the allegations in the amendment which he desired or was able to furnish. That the plaintiff was ejected from the train is undisputed, but his ejection was the result of provocation given by him and conduct upon his part that imperatively required the conductor, in the discharge of the duty which he owed to the railroad company and to other passengers in the car, to remove the plaintiff from the train. The evidence establishing the fact of the provocation given by the plaintiff, and of such gross misconduct on his part as necessitated his ejection, is not controverted in the testimony of the plaintiff himself. He testified that he was not in a condition to know what occurred between himself and the employees of the defendant company in charge of the train before he was carried to the door and platform of the coach in which he was riding. But the undisputed testimony of the conductor and five passengers shows that the conductor, before undertaking to eject the passenger, had courteously demanded his ticket, and that he patiently waited even longer than could have been expected of him under the circumstances as developed in the evidence which we find in the record.

The conductor testified: "I went to him and asked him for his ticket, and he told me he didn't have any ticket. I asked him where he was going, and he said he wasn't going anywhere. He was going to stay here. I said: 'Well, you must have a ticket somewhere. Feel in your pockets, and see if you haven't got a ticket.' He said: 'No; I haven't got a ticket.' I said: 'Well, you will have to pay your fare then.' He said: 'No, I won't; pass me on by.' I said: 'No; I can't do that. You will have to give me a ticket or your fare, one.' He said: 'Well, I won't give you nothing.' I talked with him I reckon five minutes, begging him to give me his ticket, or tell me where he was going, or pay his fare, or something, and he cursed me for everything nearly. He said: 'God damn you, I am not going to give you nothing,' or something like. 'To hell with you. What in the hell is the matter with you?' There were some ladies on the seat behind him, and some more across the aisle, and I said: 'You will have to get off, if you won't give me your ticket or pay your fare. If you curse me in the presence of these ladies, I will have to put you off.' That's when he jumped up and said: 'What in the hell is the matter with you.' I pulled the bell cord first and stopped the train, and pulled him out in the aisle, and carried him out, and put him off. That was in the first-class coach. He was on the left-hand side, about the second or third seat. I saw a bottle. He tried to hit me with it. He got it out of his pocket. It looked like whisky. It looked red. I just pushed him along in front of me—caught him by the arm, and got him out in the aisle, and pushed him along. I did not strike him with feet or my hands, or use any abusive language to him. I treated him as nice as a man could. The train was stopped, and was standing still. I had the porter to get off on the ground, and handed his grip and overcoat to the porter, and I also had the porter to hold him to keep him from getting back on the train. * * * He did not seem unnatural, only in the way he talked. He did not appear as if anything was the matter with him. I can't say he was under the influence of liquor. I don't remember whether I smelled whisky on him or not. He didn't look like a sick man to me. He looked all right. I know I couldn't hardly do much with him, and I am pretty stout. He gave me all I wanted to get him off. He did not act like a drunk man. He wasn't feeble at all. He was a stout man. He tried to hit me all the way, from the time we started until we got him off. There was no occasion whatever for him to treat me that way. I did not say a thing out of the way to him, or to irritate him. I said to him: 'You will have to give me your ticket or pay your fare.' Every time I asked him for a ticket, he said he didn't have a ticket, and refused to pay his fare."

The testimony of the conductor is corroborated by that of several witnesses, who were passengers in the coach where the plaintiff was and from which he was ejected. One of these passengers, Mrs. Ulmer, testified: "When I went on the train, I told the conductor to wake me up when we got to Austell. When we got a little way out of town, I thought I was near Austall. I heard a commotion in the train, and a gentleman using some pretty bad language, and the conductor was carrying him out. * * * I don't remember seeing him go out of the train. When I heard the commotion, I woke up. I just heard a few words pass as the conductor and the man was coming out. The other man was resisting against the conductor. The passenger was doing the cursing. * * * I don't know whether the man was drunk or not. I didn't see him take a drink. I was asleep when the conductor went to him, and didn't see him. I was not certain who was doing the cursing, but imagine the passenger was doing it."

Mrs. Roberts, who was a passenger, testified; "I remember the plaintiff on that train. He was asleep, and the conductor came, and woke him up, and asked him for a ticket, and he said he didn't have any, and refused to give it up. He [the conductor] told him: 'You must hunt your ticket up by the time I come through again.' He went on, took up the rest of the tickets, came back, and asked him for his ticket again; and he got mad, and said he wasn't going to give him any ticket, he didn't have any; and he drew a bottle out of his pocket. I thought it was a gun. He cursed, and the conductor stopped the train and put him off. Mr. Watson never gave him his ticket or paid his fare. He did the cursing. The conductor did not curse any, nor did he strike Mr. Watson in the coach. Nobody in there cursed, except Mr. Watson. * * * I don't remember what Mr. Watson said, if anything, to my husband. He did not say anything to him directly. He was just kinder throwing his arms, fighting like. * * * Mr. Watson impressed me as being drunk. He acted very unreasonably and foolishly. The conductor did not do or say anything to irritate him. He only asked him for his ticket. Mr. Watson just cursed and refused to pay his fare. I don't remember his words. I was right across the aisle from him."

R. E. McEver testified: "I had been losing right smart sleep up to that time, and I went to sleep when I went in that car. I left the ticket where the conductor could get it. * * * What woke me up was that argument about a ticket. The conductor asked a man, I suppose Mr. Watson, though I couldn't swear who it was, for a ticket; and he told him he didn't have a ticket. He asked him where he was going, and he said he wasn't going anywhere. * * * He told him he would put him off the train. He told him he would do no such thing. I don't remember the argument exactly, but words to that effect, and then he proceeded to put him off. There was some cursing done there by the passenger. * * * The man drew a bottle from his pocket, which looked like a pint bottle. * * * He made a motion like he was going to hit him [the conductor]. But I don't think he tried very hard to hit him. The man was drunk. * * * The conductor made the remark: 'I will put you off.' He said: 'You won't do no such a God damn thing.'"

G. D. Roberts, sworn by the defendant, gave testimony corroborating the conductor and the other witnesses who had testified for the defendant, showing that the conductor was patient, courteous, and reasonable, and that he only ejected the plaintiff from the train when it became his imperative duty to do so. There is other testimony in the case, corroborative of the witnesses for the defendant whom we have named above; but it is unnecessary to set out more of the evidence. No circumstance is testified to, either by the plaintiff himself or any of the witnesses, which would have authorized the jury to have found that it was the duty of the conductor to have waited longer before ejecting the plaintiff, after the grossly improper conduct of which he had been guilty.

All the evidence indicates that the passenger was drunk and boisterous; and if it be true, as he now insists, that he was afflicted with some malady which, together with the medicines and drugs which he had taken, caused him to be in the condition in which he was on the night in question, then his malady and the drugs which he had taken produced in him a condition which, tested by all the objective symptoms, was so exactly similar to the condition, mentally and physically, of an intoxicated man, that the conductor of the train could not possibly distinguish between the passenger's conduct and that of a man who had been drinking intoxicants to excess. The conductor's duty, under circumstances like these which we have detailed above, is thus defined in the opinion written by Mr. Justice Lumpkin, in the case of Hillman v. Railroad Company, 126 Ga. 814, 56 S. E. 68: "A railroad company is bound to use extraordinary care and diligence to protect its passengers, while in transit, from violence, injury, or outrage and humiliation by third persons. This protection must be afforded by the conductor to the extent of all the power with which he is clothed by the company or by the law, and his failure to afford it, when he has knowledge that there is occasion for his interference, will subject the company to liability in damages." In 2 Hutchinson on Carriers, p. 1122, it is said: "The passenger, from the time he enters his vehicle, has the right to claim the protection of the carrier from the insults and violence of others, whether entering it as a passenger or not; and the law exacts from him the prompt employment of all means at his command to protect the passengers against such outrages, either by quelling the disturbance or by the expulsion of those engaged in it, if necessary. In such an emergency, the duty of the carrier is said to be the same as that which he is under in other respects, to do all that can be done to insure the safety of the passengers." In the case of Vinton v. Railroad Company, 11 Allen (Mass.) 304, 87 Am. Dec. 714, it was said: "The right and power of the defendants and their servants to prevent the occurrence of improper and disorderly conduct in a public vehicle is quite as essential and important as the authority to stop a disturbance, or repress acts of violence or breaches of decorum, after they have been committed, and the mischief of annoyance and disturbance have been done. Indeed, if the rule laid down at the trial be correct, then it would follow that passengers in public vehicles must be subjected to a certain amount or degree of discomfort or insult from evil-disposed persons before the right to expel them would accrue to a carrier or his servant. There would be no authority to restrain or prevent profaneness, indecency, or other breaches of decorum in speech or behavior, until it had continued long enough to become manifest to the eyes or ears of other passengers. It is obvious that any such restriction on the operation of the rule of law would greatly diminish its practical value." See, also, the case of Korn v. Railway Company, 125 Fed. 897, 62 C. C. A. 417, 63 L. R. A. 872; and 4 Elliott on Railroads, § 1837, and cases cited.

While, under the circumstances and facts shown by the evidence in the record, the conductor had the right and was under the duty to eject the plaintiff from the train, it was also his duty to observe due care and diligence to avoid inflicting upon him any personal injury, and not to use violence or unnecessary force in removing him from the train, as well as to see that the ejected passenger was not placed and left in an unsafe or dangerous locality; and we assume, inasmuch as there is no complaint as to the charge of the court upon this branch of the case, that the law relative thereto was properly stated to the jury by the court in his instructions to them.

Having held that the evidence in the case demanded a verdict in favor of the defendant, it is unnecessary to deal with the specific assignments of error upon the refusal of the court to give in charge certain instructions contained in written requests. Kelly & Jones Co. v. Moore, 128 Ga. 683, 58 S. E. 181.

YOUNG v. GERMANIA SAVINGS BANK.
(Supreme Court of Georgia. April 19, 1909.)

1. EXECUTION (§ 80*)—DIRECTION TO PROPER OFFICERS—STATUTORY PROVISIONS.

The act of 1871 (Acts 1871-72, pp. 57, 59) provided that all executions issued from the city court of Atlanta shall be directed "to the sheriff, or his deputy, of the city court of Atlanta, and all and singular the sheriffs, or their deputies, of the state of Georgia, and may be levied on all the property of the defendants throughout the state; but the sheriff, or his deputy, of said city court may levy all such executions on property within any part of the county of Fulton." It also provided that "the clerk and sheriff, and their deputies, of the superior court of Fulton county shall be ex officio clerk, sheriff, and deputies of the city court of Atlanta." Where an execution was issued from that court "to all and singular the sheriffs of the state and their lawful deputies," and was levied on certain land in Fulton county by the deputy sheriff of that county, there was no error in refusing to dismiss the levy for want of proper direction. Buchanan v. Sterling, 63 Ga. 227; Cheney v. Beall, 69 Ga. 533; Byars v. Curry, 75 Ga. 515.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Execution, Cent. Dig. § 176; Dec. Dig. § 80.*]

2. EXECUTION (§ 93*)—SIGNING.

Where such an execution, issued from the city court of Atlanta, was signed "Arnold Broyles, Clerk," the court properly refused to dismiss a levy of such execution, on motion of a claimant of the property, on the ground that it did not appear to be officially signed by the clerk of the superior court and ex officio clerk of the city court. The word "clerk," construed in connection with the recitals in the execution to the effect that it issued upon a judgment rendered in the city court of Atlanta, for which this court will take judicial cognizance that the law provides a clerk, imports that the paper was signed officially, and not by Arnold Broyles in a private capacity.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Execution, Cent. Dig. § 188; Dec. Dig. § 93.*]

3. EXECUTION (§ 144*)—LEVY—SETTING ASIDE—GROUNDS.

That two entries of levy on the same piece of real estate appeared on the execution furnished no reason for dismissing the second levy, on motion of the claimant of the property, on the ground that the first levy was not accounted for.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Execution, Cent. Dig. § 371; Dec. Dig. § 144.*]

4. EXECUTION (§ 144*)—LEVY—SETTING ASIDE—GROUNDS.

Where an execution issued from the city court of Atlanta commanded a levy and sale to be made of the goods and chattels, lands, and tenements generally of the defendant, and especially of a certain described lot of land, to realize the amount of the judgment, this furnished no reason for dismissing a levy on such land, on the motion of a person who had interposed a claim thereto, on the ground that there was no authority of law for the city court to issue a fi. fa. as a special lien on particular property.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Execution, Cent. Dig. § 371; Dec. Dig. § 144.*]

5. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 708*)—REVIEW—SCOPE—QUESTIONS ARISING AFTER JUDGMENT.

A ground of a motion to dismiss a levy, "because the alleged fi. fa. does not follow the judgment on which it is predicated, and does not follow the petition," cannot be considered by this court, where no specification is made as to the variance claimed to exist, and neither the judgment nor the petition is before this court, and it is not shown that they were placed before the trial court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 2948; Dec. Dig. § 708.*]

6. EXECUTION (§ 144*)—LEVY—SETTING ASIDE—GROUNDS.

Where an execution issued from the city court of Atlanta, and directed as recited in the first headnote, was levied on land in Fulton county, which was described in the execution, the fact that the entry of levy was signed "J. M. Goldsmith, Deputy Sheriff," was not a sufficient reason for dismissing the levy on the ground that the signature did not indicate of what court or county the levying officer was deputy sheriff. Prima facie he would be presumed to be deputy sheriff in the jurisdiction in which he acted. Connolly v. Atlantic Contracting Co., 120 Ga. 213, 47 S. E. 575; Rucker v. Tabor, 126 Ga. 132, 54 S. E. 959.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Execution, Cent. Dig. § 371; Dec. Dig. § 144.*]

7. EXECUTION (§ 144*)—LEVY—SETTING ASIDE—GROUNDS.

The levy on the land not being open to any other ground of attack urged against it, the statement in the entry, "a deed having been filed and recorded for purpose of levy and sale as required by law," would not furnish ground for dismissing the entire levy, on motion of a claimant of the land.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Execution, Cent. Dig. § 371; Dec. Dig. § 144.*]

8. EXECUTION (§ 140*)—ENTRY OF LEVY—DESCRIPTION OF PREMISES—SUFFICIENCY.

An entry of levy on land contained the following description of the property: "Land lot 81 of the 14th district of Fulton county, Georgia, and known as lot B, in block 4, in the Wallace & Seago subdivision of the Means property, said lot B fronting forty-five (45) feet, more or less, on the east side of State street, and extending back east, same width as front, one hundred (100) feet, more or less, bounded south by an alley, by lot C, north by lot A, and west by State street, and being about two hundred (200) feet north of Macedonia Baptist Church place." Held, that such levy was not subject to be dismissed on the ground that the description of the property was not sufficient to identify or locate any particular property, and was too uncertain, vague, and indefinite. Broach v. O'Neal, 94 Ga. 474, 20 S. E. 113.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Execution, Cent. Dig. §§ 334-337; Dec. Dig. § 140.*]

9. EXECUTION (§ 144*)—LEVY—SETTING ASIDE—GROUNDS.

Where an entry of levy on real estate recited that the "defendant in fi. fa. is in possession," it was proper to overrule a ground of a motion to dismiss the levy "because claimant denies the statement, to wit, 'defendant in fi. fa. is in possession,' and claimant says that she was in possession before the date of the alleged judgment, before the date of the alleged fi. fa., and before the date of the alleged levies, and is in possession of that property now, and she has been so in possession of that property for more than 20 years, and she also says that she has had a deed to it for many years, and it is her property."

AUGUSTA FACTORY v. MENTE & CO.
(Supreme Court of Georgia. April 19, 1909.)

1. SALES (§ 58*)—CONTRACT—WHAT CONSTITUTES—STATEMENTS APPEARING ON LETTER HEADS.

Where a written contract between a factory company and a purchaser of cloth provided in express terms that the former should deliver to the latter at a distant city 200,000 yards of cloth of a kind described and at prices stated, and that 50,000 yards should be delivered weekly, commencing on a specified date, such contract as to the time of delivery was not modified or changed by the fact that on letter heads used in the correspondence between the parties through which the contract was made was certain printed matter, including, among other things, a statement that "all agreements are contingent upon strikes, accidents, and other delays beyond our control."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sales, Dec. Dig. § 58.*]

2. CONTRACTS (§ 211*)—SALES (§ 81*)—TIME OF THE ESSENCE—CONTRACT TO DELIVER COTTON GOODS.

While time is not generally of the essence of a contract, it may become so by express stipulation or by reasonable construction. In this case the presiding judge did not err in holding that time was of the essence of the contract.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contracts, Cent. Dig. §§ 938-943; Dec. Dig. § 211; * Sales, Dec. Dig. § 81.*]

3. SALES (§ 81*)—CONTRACT—TIME FOR PERFORMANCE—REASONABLE TIME.

Where a written contract of the character indicated in the first headnote was made, and the vendor failed to deliver the goods within the time specified therein, if time were not originally of the essence of the contract, the vendee could, by notice to the vendor, fix a reasonable time for delivery, and call upon the vendor to perform within such time. The time thus set, if reasonable, would become essential; and, upon failure to make delivery within it, the vendee could treat such failure as a breach, and hold the vendor for damages accruing therefrom.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Richmond County; W. F. Eve, Judge.

Action by Mente & Co. against the Augusta Factory. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Mente & Co. brought suit against the Augusta Factory to recover damages for a breach of contract, alleging that the defendant had contracted to sell them certain cotton goods of two described characters, to be delivered at the rate of 25,000 yards of each, weekly, commencing February 1, 1906, at certain stipulated prices; that it had failed to comply with its contract; and that at the time of the breach the market price at the point of delivery was higher than the price specified in the contract, making a difference of $512.50, for which amount the suit was brought. The defendant denied liability. By consent the case was submitted to the presiding judge, to pass upon both the law and the facts, without a jury. The evidence was, in brief, as follows:

It was admitted by the defendant that the goods which it undertook to manufacture and deliver to the plaintiffs at New Orleans, to wit, 200,000 yards, commencing February 1, 1906, and to be delivered at the rate of 50,000 yards per week, were not delivered in that time, and that no part of them had been delivered up to March 9, 1906, the day that the plaintiffs went into the market and purchased other goods to take the place of those which the defendant had failed to deliver. It was also admitted that the difference between the contract price of the goods which defendant was to deliver and the market price of the same kind of goods in New Orleans at the time when plaintiffs claimed the goods should have been delivered was $512. The following correspondence between the parties was introduced in evidence:

Letter from defendant's president to its agent in New Orleans, dated November 5, 1905, containing the following: "Replying to yours of the 2d, would say, we enter up order Mente & Co., No. 152, for 100,000 yards 36" 6.50 40x40 at 3 $\frac{1}{4}$ c., and 100,000 yards 36" 40x40 6.00 at 4c., 25,000 yards weekly of each, commencing Feb. 1st, delivered in New Orleans, less 5% 30 days. We do not discount our bills any further than we sell. We had just as soon wait the 30 days for the money as not. You can give this letter to Mente & Co., and say to them to write us an acknowledgment of same. That will be all the contract we require." (It was alleged in the petition and admitted in the answer that the plaintiffs duly acknowledged this letter, thus completing the contract for the goods at the prices named.)

Letter from plaintiffs to defendant, dated February 28, 1906, containing the following: "Referring to our contract placed with you through Mr. Kaiser for 200,000 yards 36" sheeting, we beg to advise that Mr. Kaiser has this day shown us your letter of the 23d. We appreciate your condition, but at the same time you must appreciate ours. These goods were not bought from you to be sold in cloth, as dry goods people do, but were sold manufactured into bags for the sugar refinery. They have not bothered us so far for deliveries, hence have not pressed you for same; but, as you readily understand, they run night and day, and are compelled to have the goods, and we must positively insist upon you getting the goods forward without any further delay. We have given you one month latitude in regard to these goods, and cannot wait for them any longer. They must be shipped without delay."

The reply to this letter was as follows: "Augusta, Ga., Feb. 28, 1906. Mente & Co., New Orleans, La.—Dear Sirs: Replying to yours of 26th, we are going to start to work on your goods either the latter part of this or the first of next week, and will do the very best we can to make deliveries as rapidly as possible. Rest assured that we are just as anxious to make deliveries as you are to get them, and we are going to do everything in the world we can to get the goods to you. We hope soon to get the labor trouble (with which we have been so much annoyed) settled, and also that the health of our operatives will improve by that time. If you see Kaiser, tell him that we have written you, as he has written us a very urgent letter in your behalf."

Letter from plaintiffs to defendant, dated March 2, 1906, containing the following: "We have your letter of Feb. 28th, and beg to state that contents of same are somewhat indefinite. The purchase we made from you of these goods was 50,000 yards weekly, beginning Feb. 1st, and these 200,000 yards should now be delivered. While we granted you an extension of shipment until next week, it must be understood thoroughly that we cannot be limited to 50,000 yards per week, but that you must deliver us at least 100,000 yards of these next week, and 100,000 yards the following week, in order that we can comply with our contract here; otherwise, we will be compelled to buy material to substitute the best we can, charging you the difference. The reason for this is simply that the trade here has been as patient with us as they possibly can, and are now insisting that deliveries be made."

A telegram from plaintiffs to defendant, dated March 9, 1906, as follows: "Cannot wait longer must make immediate delivery can buy spot goods one eighth cent additional your expense answer"—and a telegram from defendant to plaintiffs on the same day, containing the following: "Read red lines on our letter heads before purchasing any goods for our account as written you we will commence delivering goods next week."

A letter on the same day from plaintiffs to defendant, containing the following: "We have your telegram to-day, and beg to state that we have seen and noticed the memorandum printed in red ink on your letter head, which, as manufacturers ourselves, we fully understand and know the importance of. But in this connection beg to state that you have never given us any notice that you would be or were prevented from fulfilling this contract for reasons given in this notice. On March 2d we wrote you that it would be agreeable to us to extend shipment a week from that date, which would bring it into March 9th, which is this week, provided you would deliver at least 100,000 yards in this week and 100,000 yards next week. You have not complied with this request, notwithstanding the fact that we have tried to make it clear that these goods were sold to the refinery here, who must have them for bags for shipment of their product, and it is not material that is put on the shelf and jobbed. Your letters have not even given us the slightest information as to what you would definitely ship next week."

A letter from the defendant to plaintiffs of same date, containing the following: "Your telegram received this morning, and in reply we wire you, as per inclosed confirmation, to read the red lines in our letter heads as to output, quotations, contracts, etc. Our brokers have no instructions to sell goods otherwise than as those lines plainly state; and every letter we have written you, in fact, the letter where we confirmed sale, has these lines on it. As written you, we expected to commence shipping you goods this week. We started on them, but found they were running a little light, and not wanting to deliver you light weight goods, preferring to wait until we could deliver you what we sold, we did not ship. Upon receipt of this letter, if you want us to continue the contract, say so, and we will proceed to ship you the goods; otherwise, we will not. We leave the matter entirely to you. Of course, we will ship the goods as soon as we can make them. Our position has been explained fully to you. We have been very scarce of hands, are still, and there is a great deal of sickness among them. We have left no stone unturned to get hands, and this at a considerable loss to us. We await your letter before making any shipment. We notice your letter heads are similar to ours."

Also a letter from plaintiffs to defendant, dated March 13th, reciting facts which they contended made a breach of contract on the part of the defendant, and insisting on their right to damages.

The letter head used by the defendant in its correspondence with the plaintiffs contained the following words printed in red ink: "Quotations subject to change without notice. All agreements are contingent upon strikes, accidents, and other delays beyond our control. Purchaser to take run out of looms, whether quantity is more or less than contract, and must accept what seconds are made at $\frac{1}{4}$ c. allowance from price of firsts."

The letter head of plaintiffs, employed in writing letters to defendant, contained the following printed in red ink: "All contracts taken subject to strikes of work people, fire, loss of goods at sea, or other accidents beyond our control. All quotations subject to change without notice, to market fluctuations, and to goods being unsold. Our responsibility for safe arrival of shipment ceases when we receive a clear receipt from a transportation line."

The paymaster of the defendant testified that, at the time when the contract with the plaintiffs was made, the defendant was short in number of operatives; that unsuccessful efforts were made to get help; that a considerable part of the machinery remained idle; that the total number of spindles in the factory was 30,048, and that the number of those that were idle at different times from January 6th to March 3d, covering the period of dealings with the plaintiffs, ranged from 2,620 to 9,275; and that an epidemic of measles and mumps among the operatives caused the stoppage of the spindles. There was some other testimony as to the capacity of the mill.

The presiding judge entered judgment for the plaintiffs, and refused a new trial. The defendant excepted.

Jos. B. & Bryan Cumming, for plaintiff in error. William H. Fleming, for defendants in error.

ATKINSON, J. One ground of the motion for new trial complained that the court erred in holding and finding, in effect, that the contract of sale was not modified, as to the time expressed in it for its completion, by the following words in red lines on the heads of the letters by which the contract was made: "All agreements are contingent upon strikes, accidents, and other delays beyond our control." If a contract in writing is plain and clear and unambiguous in its terms, it is not subject to modification by a statement in a letter head, printed at the top of the paper, which is not incorporated into the contract and is inconsistent with it. Even where a printed form of contract is used, but terms are written into it which are at variance with the printed matter, the writing will control. As stated in Civ. Code 1895, § 3675, par. 6: "Where a contract is partly printed and partly written, the latter part is entitled to most consideration." The expression "latter part," as here used, means the written part. If printed matter which forms a part of the contract, then, must yield to written terms inconsistent with the words printed, a fortiori a mere printed statement in a letter head, which does not form an integral part of the contract at all, cannot override or modify distinct terms of the contract with which it conflicts.

In Summers v. Hibbard, 153 Ill. 102, 38 N. E. 899, 46 Am. St. Rep. 872, a contract was made for the delivery of certain bundles of sheet iron at specified times and prices. The vendors failed to deliver at the times agreed upon. The vendees at a later date bought other iron, for which they were compelled to pay a higher price, and brought suit for damages against the vendors. The contract was made by letters passing between the parties. At the top of the letter heads of the vendors were the printed words: "All sales subject to strikes and accidents." It was held: "Printed matter in a letter head forms no part of the written letter on the sheet, and will not qualify an absolute contract which results from an acceptance of an offer by such letter. * * * If a party contracts conditionally to sell and deliver, at a specified time, goods to be made in his mill, the breakage of his mill will not excuse performance or bar a suit for damages." Mr. Justice Baker, in delivering the opinion, said: "The mere fact that appellants wrote their acceptance on a blank form for letters, at the top of which were printed the words, 'All sales subject to strikes and accidents,' no more made those a part of the contract than they made the other words there printed—'Summers Bros. & Co., Manufacturers of Box-Annealed Commoned and Refined Sheet-Iron'—a part of the contract. The offer was absolute. The written acceptance which they themselves wrote was just as absolute. The printed words were not in the body of the letter or referred to therein. The fact that they were printed at the head of their letter heads would not have the effect of preventing appellants from entering into an unconditional contract of sale."

In the present case the defendants wrote to their broker in New Orleans, authorizing him to sell 200,000 yards of sheeting, of two kinds described, to be delivered "25,000 yards weekly of each, commencing Feb. 1st, delivery in New Orleans." He was instructed to give defendant's letter to the plaintiffs, and say to them that they might write an acknowledgment, and that would be all the contract defendant required. It was alleged by the plaintiffs and admitted by the defendant that the former did duly acknowledge the letter, and thus complete the contract for the goods at the prices named. This closed a distinct and unambiguous contract. It fixed the time and place of delivery. It needed no aid from circumstances to construe it or arrive at its meaning in those respects. Neither was there any question of bringing home notice of some fact by means of printed statements. A positive statement that goods sold shall be delivered at a time specified in the written contract is not in harmony with a statement that "all agreements are contingent upon strikes, accidents, and other delays beyond our control." One declares definitely that delivery shall be at a time mentioned; the other, that delivery shall not necessarily be at a definite time, but shall be contingent, not only upon strikes, but also upon accidents and other delays beyond the control of the vendor. The written agreement was specific; the printed notice declared that the time of delivery might be contingent and indefinite. This is not construction. It is modification. If the written statement of the time of delivery is to be made subject to modification by other writing or printing, at least the modifying statement should be embodied or referred to in the contract itself, and not be made to depend upon mere printed matter forming part of a letter head.

Sturm v. Boker, 150 U. S. 312, 326, 14 Sup. Ct. 99, 37 L. Ed. 1093.

2. Another ground of the motion for a new trial alleged that the court erred in holding, in effect, and rendering a judgment accordingly, that the express time for the completion of a contract was of the essence of the contract; it being contended that the evidence showed that the defendant had not abandoned the contract, but was preparing to carry it out in a reasonable time when the plaintiffs withdrew from it. To this contention we cannot assent. Where a contract for the sale of personal property states a time when delivery is to be made, it is matter of construction as to whether the time for delivery is of the essence of the contract, so that damages may be recovered for a failure to comply therewith. If the contract is clear and without ambiguity, latent or patent, the construction is for the court. In proper cases, where there is a question of fact involved, it is for the jury. Civ. Code 1895, §§ 3675 (1, 8), 3672. In this case the judge acted both as judge and jury. Did he err in deciding that time was of the essence of this contract? The contract was for the sale of 200,000 yards of cotton goods by a factory to purchasers in a distant city. It was specified that 50,000 yards should be delivered each week, commencing February 1st, at stated prices, with payment at 30 days, or 5 per cent. discount for cash. It might well be inferred that it was important to a purchaser of such a quantity of cloth to have it arrive as specified, both in order to prepare for its reception and storage or use and to provide for payments in the time and manner stated, and that this was in contemplation of the parties. It might make a very material difference whether a merchant should receive and be prepared to handle 50,000 yards of cloth, ordered, perhaps, for some special purpose, each week, and commencing at a specified date, or whether he should have 200,000 yards of the cloth delivered to him in one bulk a month or more thereafter, or in installments commencing some six weeks after the proper time and delivered according as the vendor found himself able to meet the contract. It may also be that a merchant desires, during the season when certain goods are salable, to have them ready for delivery to his customers, or that he may have contracts to make delivery. If such were the case, it would ill suit his purpose to have goods suitable to or salable during a certain season only, and ordered to be delivered in installments at fixed times during that season, delivered to him in a single lump or shipment at a much later period or after the entire season was over.

If recourse is had in the case before us to the correspondence between the parties, the possible injury from extended delay which has thus been hypothetically stated would apparently have resulted to the plaintiffs. In one of their letters to the defendant it was said that these goods were not bought from the defendant to be sold in cloth, as dry goods people do, but were sold manufactured into bags for a sugar refinery, and that, as the refinery operated night and day, it was compelled to have the goods; and in another letter they stated to the defendant that the latter had not complied with their request to make the shipments, although the plaintiffs had tried to make it clear to the defendant that these goods were sold to the refinery at the place of delivery, and that the latter were obliged to have them for bags for shipment of their product, and that it was not material to be put on the shelf and sold in lots. See, in this connection, Savannah Ice Co. v. American Refrigerator Co., 110 Ga. 142, 35 S. E. 280; Branch v. Palmer, 65 Ga. 210; Henderson Elevator Co. v. North Ga. Milling Co., 126 Ga. 279, 55 S. E. 50; Gude & Walker v. Bailey Co., 4 Ga. App. 226, 61 S. E. 135; Norrington v. Wright, 115 U. S. 188, 6 Sup. Ct. 12, 29 L. Ed. 366; Cleveland Rolling Mill Co. v. Rhodes, 121 U. S. 255, 7 Sup. Ct. 882, 30 L. Ed. 920; McGrath v. Gegner, 77 Md. 331, 26 Atl. 502, 39 Am. St. Rep. 415. The cases in which contracts for purchases of real estate have been held not to be forfeited because of failure to pay the purchase price at the date named therefor, in the absence of anything in the contract making time of the essence thereof, and where the payment of interest has been held, under the circumstances of different cases, to be a sufficient compensation for the failure to pay on the exact date when due, are in no way in conflict with what is here ruled. "Time is not generally of the essence of a contract; but, by express stipulation or reasonable construction, it may become so." Civ. Code, § 3675 (8). But under the facts in this case the judge did not err in finding that time was of the essence of the contract involved. The statement in the opinion of Mr. Justice Gray in Norrington v. Wright, supra, that "in the contracts of merchants time is of the essence," was not laid down as an absolute rule, regardless of what the contract itself might show the intention of the parties to be. This clearly appears from the headnote, in which it is stated that: "In a mercantile contract, a statement descriptive of the subject-matter, or of some material incident, such as the time or place of shipment, is ordinarily to be regarded as a warranty, or condition precedent, upon the failure or nonperformance of which the party aggrieved may repudiate the whole contract."

3. If it were not clear that time was originally of the essence of the contract, nevertheless the judge was authorized to find that the vendee from time to time urged compliance, and finally fixed a time, after that specified in the contract, within which they insisted that delivery of the goods should be made, stating the necessity therefor, and that, if delivery should not be made within that time, they would be compelled to buy material in lieu of that which the vendor had contracted to deliver. If time was not of the essence originally, still the vendor did not have the right indefinitely to postpone compliance, and when the vendees, after a considerable delay, fixed a definite time in advance within which delivery would have to be made, and notified the vendor of that fact, if the time set was reasonable, it was incumbent on the vendor to meet such reasonable demand; and, if it failed to do so, the vendees were authorized to treat such failure as a breach of the contract. In Parker v. Tharold, 16 Beav. 59, Sir John Romilly, Master of the Rolls, said (on page 71): "It is, I consider, the undoubted law of this court that, although time was not originally an essential part of the contract, still that either party may, by a proper notice, bind the other to complete within a reasonable time to be specified in such notice; and if the party receiving such notice do not complete within the time so specified, equity will not enforce a specific performance of the contract, but leave the parties to their remedies and their liabilities at law." See, also, Ellis v. Bryant, 120 Ga. 890, 894, 48 S. E. 352, and authorities cited in note to Johnson v. Evans (Md.) 50 Am. Dec. 678, 679, and in note to Jones v. Robbins, 50 Am. Dec. 600.

The judge, in passing on both law and facts, could well have found that the time so fixed was reasonable, and that the failure of the vendor to make delivery was a breach. By the terms of the original contract delivery was to commence on February 1st, and 50,000 yards of the cloth were to be delivered each week. No delivery was made. On February 26th the vendees urged compliance, stating the necessity for promptness. On February 28th the vendor replied, somewhat vaguely, that "we are going to start to work on your goods either the latter part of this or the first of next week, and will do the best we can to make deliveries as rapidly as possible," also referring to the anxiety of the vendor to make deliveries and the hope that labor trouble and sickness of operatives would then have ceased to interfere with the work. On March 2d the vendees replied, stating the time which the contract specified for delivery, and stating that, while they had granted to the vendor an extension until the next week, it must be thoroughly understood that they must receive at least 100,000 yards of the cloth the next week and 100,000 yards the following week in order to comply with their contract, and insisting that the vendor must ship accordingly. Still no shipments were made, the vendor merely replying, in effect, on March 6th, that they were going to start to work on the goods "this week," and would make a shipment the next week, and then continue to ship "as fast as we can." On March 9th the vendees gave notice by telegram that they could not wait longer, but immediate delivery must be made. To this the vendor replied in a telegram, calling attention to the red lines on its letter heads, and stating that it would commence delivering goods "next week." The evidence showed that the mills had 36,048 spindles, and that at no time were more than 9,275 of them stopped. Other evidence was also introduced, tending to show what the producing capacity of the mill was each week. Under all the evidence there was no error in deciding that the defendant had committed a breach of its contract, and that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concurred.

FLETCHER v. BLUTHENTHAL & BICKERT.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. April 21, 1909.)

1. EXECUTION (§ 166*)—ESTOPPEL (§ 68*)—AFFIDAVIT OF ILLEGALITY—SUFFICIENCY—ESTOPPEL BY CLAIM IN JUDICIAL PROCEEDING.

Where a case was tried in a county court, and an appeal entered therein to the superior court, an order afterwards establishing, in the superior court, copies of the petition and appeal bond, reciting the contents of the judgment appealed from, was a judgment that the papers were in the superior court and were lost, and that the copies established were correct copies; and after verdict and judgment in the superior court the latter judgment could not be attacked by affidavit of illegality on the ground that in fact the papers were never transmitted from the county court to the superior court. This is especially true where the defendant, on the hearing of the illegality, proposed and took an order, in the superior court, establishing a copy of his plea in the case, thus estopping himself from denying that there was such a plea of file in that court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Execution, Cent. Dig. § 486; Dec. Dig. § 166; Estoppel, Cent. Dig. §§ 185-169; Dec. Dig. § 68.*]

2. AFFIDAVIT OF ILLEGALITY.

Such of the other grounds as were appropriate to be set up in an affidavit of illegality were, under the pleadings and evidence, without merit. A verdict in favor of the illegality would have been unauthorized, and, regardless of any errors occurring on the trial, the overruling of the motion for a new trial was proper.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Erwin County; U. V. Whipple, Judge.

Action by Bluthenthal & Bickert against Fletcher & Co. Judgment for plaintiff. On leave of execution, Joe Fletcher filed a plea of illegality. Judgment for plaintiffs in execution, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

McDonald & Quincey, for plaintiff in error. L. Kennedy, for defendants in error.

HOLDEN, J. The plaintiff in error filed an affidavit of illegality to an execution levied upon his property, and upon the trial of the issues made thereby a verdict was rendered against him, and to an order of the court overruling his motion for a new trial he excepted. Among other allegations in the illegality appear the following: The defendants in error brought suit on an open account, in the county court, against Fletcher & Co., alleged to have been composed of the plaintiff in error and J. P. Mauldin. Fletcher filed a plea, alleging that at the time the account was made the partnership between him and Mauldin had been dissolved, and that the defendants in error had given notice of this fact before the contraction of the account sued on. Upon the trial of the case in the county court, judgment was rendered only against the defendant Mauldin, whereupon the defendants in error appealed the case to the superior court, wherein judgment was rendered against both Fletcher and Mauldin. Fletcher contends that the execution issued upon such judgment is proceeding illegally against him, for several reasons, set out in the illegality. The main ground upon which it appears that Fletcher relied upon the trial of the illegality case was that contained in the amendment to his illegality, as follows: "That said papers were never entered in the superior court, and that at the time said papers were established and judgment given said case had not been sent up to said superior court by the judge of said county court." Fletcher contends that this amendment makes the issue upon which he should prevail; that the verdict and judgment were rendered against him in the superior court, when at the time of the rendition thereof no papers connected with the case had been transmitted from the county court to the superior court; and, if any papers were transmitted before such judgment and verdict were rendered, all of them were not thus transmitted, which was necessary before a valid verdict and judgment could be rendered against him.

The evidence is undisputed that copies of the declaration in the suit, and of the appeal bond, reciting the contents of the judgment appealed from, were established in the superior court before the verdict and judgment were therein rendered. The proceedings establishing these copies were regular on their face, and, when duly established by order of the court, they, apparently at least, had all the force and effect of originals until the order establishing them was set aside. The established copies of the petition and appeal bond, on their face, put the case apparently in the superior court regularly for trial, and verdict and judgment rendered after copies of the petition and appeal bond were established could not be attacked by affidavit of illegality. Fletcher could not, by affidavit of illegality, attack the judgment, regular on its face, by going behind it and showing that the orders establishing copies of the petition and appeal bond were improperly granted, on the ground that the original petition and appeal bond were never transmitted to the superior court. The established copies of the petition and appeal bond alone were sufficient on their face to authorize a verdict and judgment; but the defendant Fletcher, after the original affidavit of illegality was filed, and before filing his amendment thereto, had, on his motion, procured the superior court to establish a copy of the plea which he filed in the county court. The superior court would not have had the right to establish a copy of the plea if it had never been transmitted to the superior court from the county court, and, after having a copy of the plea established in the superior court on his own motion, the defendant would be estopped from denying that the plea was transmitted from the county court to the superior court, especially in view of the statement in his affidavit of illegality that the verdict was "indefinite, for the reason it failed to find for or against the special plea of misjoinder filed by this defendant." This statement is an admission that there was such a plea on file in the superior court before the verdict and judgment was rendered, and Fletcher would, in the face of this admission, be estopped from denying that there was. The affidavit admits that the papers were established.

In view of the facts above named, appearing on the trial of the case, the defendant had no right by affidavit of illegality to attack the judgment, regular on its face, by showing that the papers in the case had never been transmitted from the county court to the superior court when the verdict and judgment were rendered. There was no want of jurisdiction apparent upon the face of the judgment, or any other part of the record. On the contrary, everything appearing showed jurisdiction of the superior court to render the judgment. See Harbig v. Freund, 69 Ga. 180, and authorities therein cited.

2. Such of the other grounds as were appropriate to be set up in an affidavit of illegality were, under the pleadings and evidence, without merit, a verdict in favor of the illegality would have been unauthorized, and, regardless of any errors occurring on the trial, the overruling of the motion for a new trial was proper.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur, except BECK, J., absent.

WILLS (§ 741*)—ACTIONS—PETITION—SUFFICIENCY.

The allegations of the petition were not sufficient to withstand the force of the demurrer thereto, interposed by the defendants and sustained by the court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Dec. Dig. § 741.*]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Muscogee County; J. H. Martin, Judge.

Action by Charles J. Swift against Edward W. Swift and another. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Charles J. Swift brought an action against Edward W. Swift and James P. Kyle to recover damages which he alleged he had sustained at their hands. The substance of the petition was as follows: On or about January 26, 1897, George P. Swift died in the city of Columbus, Ga., leaving a will, with three codicils thereunto annexed, and leaving surviving him his children, Helen W. Murphy, Charles J. Swift, the petitioner, Elizabeth Shorter, Addie B. Kyle, and Edward W. Swift. By the terms of the will and codicils Edward W. Swift and James P. Kyle, the husband of Addie B. Kyle, were nominated and appointed executors, without bonds. The will was duly probated in both common and solemn form, and the executors entered upon the discharge of their duties thereunder, and have been executors up to the time of filing this petition. By the terms of the will and codicils the executors were not required to file a sworn inventory and appraisement of the estate, but were required to make a list or inventory of the property comprising the estate, for their own guidance and convenience, and for the information of the legatees. They have never filed any sworn inventory and appraisement. The will and codicils provided, among other things, that the residue of the estate, mentioned in the fourth item, be given absolutely and without limitation to petitioner and the other surviving children mentioned in the will, including Edward W. Swift, and be equally divided among them, share and share alike. Said residue included seven designated lots of land in Thomas county, Ga., of about 250 acres each, aggregating 2,095½ acres. At the time of the death of his father, and for a number of years prior thereto, petitioner was a resident of San Francisco, Cal. Several weeks after his father's death petitioner arrived at Columbus, Ga., and during his visit there in 1897 he sought information from the executors of what the residue of the estate consisted. To his inquiries concerning said Thomas county lands, as to their nature, character, and value, he being under the impression that they were valuable pine timber lands, he was told by the executors that, while these lands formerly constituted a tract of pine timber land, they had been "so despoiled and vandalized of the timber that they had lost their value and character as timber land, which information created the impression in the mind of the petitioner that the tract had become a barren, sandy waste, * * * with no value attaching thereto * * * on account of the pine and other timber that had at one time been on them." The executors and defendants well knew that petitioner had never seen these lands, and until July, 1899, and for several years thereafter, he knew nothing of the value and character of such lands, except through the information that he got from the defendants as executors, and they well knew that he relied upon them for such information, and that he had trusted, relied upon, and believed their representations as to the character and value of such lands. Until some months after defendants took charge of said estate, they made no list of the property of the estate that he ever saw, and on or about June, 1898, "petitioner saw wherein the said defendants, as executors, gave the valuation to said Thomas county lands of $2 per acre, and only mentioned them as 'lands' and as 'uncultivated,' which continued the impression and belief in the mind of petitioner that they had become practically worthless as timber lands. * * * In pursuance of an overture for settlement between petitioner, on the one hand, and the said defendants, as executors as aforesaid, and the said Edward W. Swift, Elizabeth M. Shorter, and Addie B. Kyle, as legatees as aforesaid, * * * Edward W. Swift represented, for the purpose of said settlement, that he had the sanction and authority of his sisters last aforesaid, together with James P. Kyle, representing his wife, and on or about the 1st of July, 1899, petitioner agreed that if the executors would furnish him a full, correct, and complete list of all property of said estate, together with its true, full, and correct character and value, he would submit his terms for a settlement, [and] in the afternoon of that day, in pursuance of such understanding, he examined the list, with the values and character of the property contained therein, and which had been given to him by said defendants as a true, full, and correct valuation and character and nature of all the property." Defendants, as executors, were familiar with the character and value of all the property of the estate, and petitioner was not, and especially of the Thomas county lands, and for information concerning the same petitioner relied upon the defendants as executors. "The one item of property which petitioner knew nothing about, except through information furnished him by the said defendants, was the said Thomas county lands." In listing these lands at only $2 per acre, "and having previously represented to petitioner that they had lost their character and value as pine timber lands, and describing them as 'lands' and 'uncultivated,' when their real nature and character were those of virgin pine timber lands, the said defendants knowingly and intentionally thereby misled, deceived, and misrepresented to petitioner both the value and character of said lands. At the time of said settlement these lands were reasonably worth $15 per acre, being the finest and most valuable large tract of virgin pine timber lands in southwest Georgia. * * * As a part of said settlement, petitioner sold his one-fifth interest in said Thomas county lands to Edward W. Swift, Elizabeth M. Shorter, and Addie B. Kyle at the rate of $2 per acre." After such settlement and until the latter part of July, 1904, petitioner was out of the state of Georgia a great deal of the time. On or about July 25, 1904, he met a resident of Thomasville, Ga., who told him of certain lands belonging to the Swift estate, of Columbus, Ga., which, he said, were "one of the largest and most valuable bodies of virgin pine timber land in Georgia." It was not until after about the 20th of July, 1904, that petitioner had any knowledge, or entertained any suspicion, that the said lands were otherwise in value and character than they had been represented to him by the defendants. Defendants, at the time of the settlement referred to, well knew that these lands were worth a great deal more than $2 per acre, that they had not been denuded of timber to the extent of decreasing their value, "and, with intent to deceive and defraud petitioner, they willfully and deceitfully concealed from petitioner the real value and character of said lands, and * * * knowingly misrepresented to [him] the true value and character of said lands, for the purpose of inducing [him] to part with his title to said lands." He, having confidence and faith in the defendants "and the list of values which they furnished him, * * * relied on [their] good faith and representations, * * * and he was thereby induced to and did part with his title in a one-fifth undivided interest in said lands for the sum of $2 per acre, to his injury and damage," etc.

The petition was demurred to, both generally and specially. Among the grounds of special demurrer were the following: (3) "It appearing that the specified lands constituted only a portion of the alleged residue to be equally divided, it is not averred in what constituted the balance of the residue to be equally divided as directed, nor does it appear that the entire residue was not equally divided by the will among those entitled thereto." (6) "It appears that the alleged sale by plaintiff at the price complained of was negotiated and made as a part and in consideration of an equal division and distribution of all the items of the residue, and it does not appear what the other items were, or what of them plaintiff received; nor does it appear that such settlement and distribution as a whole, including said land transaction, was not fair and equitable to the plaintiff; nor does it appear that plaintiff taking into account the alleged low price for the land, did not get in the settlement of the entire residue his just and equal share thereof." (7) "It appearing that said land transaction was only a part of a consummated settlement of the residue, the plaintiff has not nor does he propose to rescind the entire settlement, nor restore the original status, which it appears would be necessary in order for an equitable and just distribution of said residue, if such distribution has not already been made." (8) "It appears that the alleged settlement * * * was fully consummated, and that plaintiff received thereunder sundry large benefits and properties, which he does not restore or offer to restore to defendants, or any one of them, nor does he restore the status as at that state of said settlement, and that, without such restoration or offer thereof, the plaintiff is not entitled in law or equity to rescind or disturb the particular portion or portions of said settlement attacked." The demurrers were sustained, and the petition dismissed, whereupon the plaintiff excepted.

J. L. Willis and Charles J. Swift, for plaintiff in error. Goetchius & Chappell, for defendants in error.

FISH, C. J. (after stating the facts as above). It will be seen that the plaintiff's complaint is that he, as one of the residuary legatees under the will of his father, made a settlement with three of the other residuary legatees, and that he, as a part of said settlement, sold his undivided one-fifth interest in certain Thomas county lands, forming a part of the residue of the testator's estate, to them for much less than such one-fifth interest was really worth, and that he was induced to do this by certain representations of the defendants, who were executors of the will, as to the character and value of these lands, made in response to his inquiries upon the subject, and by the valuation placed upon these lands in a list of the property of the estate furnished him by the executors, which representations and valuation he alleges were false and fraudulent, and made for the purpose of misleading, deceiving, and defrauding him. He appears, from the allegations of his petition, to have made the settlement in which he claims to have been defrauded with his brother, Edward W. Swift, and his sisters, Elizabeth M. Shorter and Addie B. Kyle; his other sister, Helen W. Murphy, not being a party thereto. How he could effect a settlement as to his interest in the residuum of his father's estate with only three of the other residuary legatees, when there were five residuary legatees equally interested in the property forming such residuum, it is hard to understand. Of course, he might have sold his interest as a residuary legatee to the three other residuary legatees who participated with him in the settlement, or to any one of them; but, according to his petition, he did not do this, but entered into a settlement with three of the other residuary legatees and the executors, "and as a part of said settlement * * * sold his one-fifth interest in said Thomas county lands." But no point appears to have been made on this peculiarity of his petition.

It will be observed, from the allegations of the petition, that the alleged misrepresentations as to the character and value of these lands, other than the mere valuation placed upon them in the list of the property of the estate furnished to the plaintiff for his inspection at the time he offered to submit his terms for a settlement with the other residuary legatees, were made by the defendants in the early part of 1897, more than two years before he had even so much as indicated to them any desire, purpose, or intention to have a settlement with the other residuary legatees, and when, so far as his petition shows, there was no intention on his part to obtain his distributive share of the residuum of his father's estate through a settlement with his colegatees. So the allegations that the defendants in 1897 willfully and fraudulently misrepresented to the plaintiff the character and value of these Thomas county lands for the purpose of inducing him to part with his interest therein for a sum much less than the real value of such interest, were not well pleaded; the facts alleged not being sufficient to sustain such a conclusion. The same may be said with reference to the vague and hazy allegation that the plaintiff in June, 1898, "saw wherein the said defendants as executors gave valuations to the said Thomas county lands of $2 per acre, and only mentioned them as 'lands' and as 'uncultivated.'" Besides, if this can be taken to refer to a list, or written statement, of the properties of the estate and the respective valuations of the same, made by the executors, there is nothing whatever to show that this list or statement was prepared or intended merely for the inspection of the plaintiff; but the inference is strong that it was a list or statement prepared by the executors for their own guidance and convenience and the information of all persons interested in the estate. So far as the petition shows, the only false or misleading information which the defendants gave to the plaintiff after they knew, or had any reason to believe, that he desired information upon which to base a proposition for a settlement with the other residuary legatees, was the mere valuation of $2 per acre placed upon the Thomas county lands in question in the list of the property of the estate which they furnished to him in July, 1899, which valuation, it appears from the petition, had been placed by the executors upon these lands, and which list the petition indicates had been prepared long before they knew that he contemplated making such a settlement. Moreover, the petition does not allege that at the time the defendants furnished this list to the plaintiff they knew, or had any reason to believe, that he contemplated selling his interest in these lands to his legatees, or to any one else.

But, waiving all these criticisms of the petition, and others which might be made thereon, and taking it for granted that the defendants did willfully and fraudulently deceive him as to the value of these Thomas county lands, for the purpose of inducing him, in a settlement with the other residuary legatees, to part with his interest therein at a price much less than its true worth, still the petition is fatally defective, in that it fails to show that the plaintiff really suffered any loss or damage in the settlement. The petition fails to disclose what the terms of the settlement were, what other properties besides these Thomas county lands were involved therein, how such other properties respectively were valued, whether they were all estimated in the settlement at their true values, or like these Thomas county lands, were estimated at much less than they were really worth, or which, if any of them, were overestimated, and which were underestimated; and it fails to show that the aggregate value of the property which the plaintiff received in the settlement was not equal to the aggregate value of that which was received by each of the other legatees. He seeks to segregate and separate "a part of said settlement" which he had with the other legatees, and to recover damages because, if this particular portion of the settlement is isolated and considered entirely apart from the rest of the same, it appears that he was worsted in the settlement, when, for aught that appears in the petition, it may be that in other parts of the settlement the advantage was all on his side, and that the general result of the same was reasonably fair and just to all the parties interested therein, or, perhaps, that in the aggregate value of the properties which he received as his portion of the residuum of the estate he really received more than the value of his distributive share thereof. The other properties involved in the settlement, or some of them, at least, might have been as much undervalued in the list which the defendants furnished to the plaintiff, and in the settlement which he made with the three other legatees, as were these Thomas county lands; and the other legatees concerned in the settlement might have conveyed to the plaintiff their interests in property of the estate upon a valuation which was such as to counterbalance the undervaluation of his interest in these lands, or even at a valuation which was such as to more than compensate him for any loss which he might otherwise have sustained in consequence of the undervaluation of his interest in the lands in question. He seeks to turn the light on only one isolated portion of the transaction, leaving the rest in darkness. He ought to have turned the light on the whole, so that it could be seen whether he really suffered any loss in the settlement between himself and these other residuary legatees, in consequence of his reliance on the valuation which the defendants, as executors, had placed upon these Thomas county lands.

It is somewhat significant that he does not seek to set aside the settlement, which he alleges he had with three of his legatees, on account of the fraud which he alleges was practiced upon him by one of them in person and by the agent who acted for the others in the transaction, and to have a new and fair division and distribution of the property between the residuary legatees. But he holds onto all the property which he received in the settlement, and seeks to recover of the defendants damages because in one isolated item of such settlement, separated and considered entirely apart from the other matters involved therein, he appears to have got the worst of the bargain. So far as his petition shows, he might have got the best of the bargain in the transaction considered as a whole. It seems obvious that it cannot be ascertained whether he was really injured and damaged by the mere undervaluation which he alleges was placed by the executors upon the Thomas county lands unless and until there is a full disclosure as to the other properties involved in the settlement, the nature, character, and real value of each item thereof, and the valuation placed upon it in the settlement, and how it was disposed of therein. A fatal defect in his petition, therefore, is that it does not show that he really sustained any loss by reason of the alleged false and fraudulent undervaluation of these lands. A mere general allegation that he was injured and damaged in a specified sum is a mere conclusion of his own, as he does not allege all the facts which it is necessary to consider in order to determine whether this is true or not.

This general averment as to damages sustained by him might, perhaps, be sufficient, in the absence of a special demurrer calling for more specific information as to the facts upon which it was based, but will not do when attacked by the grounds of special demurrer set forth in the statement of facts. The trial court committed no error in sustaining these grounds.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

ATLANTA TERRA COTTA CO. v. GEORGIA RY. & ELECTRIC CO.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. April 19, 1909.
Rehearing Denied May 12, 1909.)

1. EMINENT DOMAIN (§§ 198, 238, 255, 274*)—PROCEDURE—AUTHORITY OF ASSESSORS—REMEDY OF LANDOWNER—APPEAL FROM AWARD.

In condemnation proceedings under the statute regulating the exercise of the right of eminent domain by a railroad company, the assessors can only determine the amount of compensation to be paid, and cannot pass upon the legal power of the company to institute such proceedings, or determine whether or not the quantity of land sought to be taken is necessary for public purposes. The remedy of the landowner is to apply to a court of equity to enjoin the condemnation proceedings, if they are unauthorized, or to enjoin the condemnation of such land as is not necessary for such public purpose.

(a) On appeal from the award of assessors appointed in pursuance of the statute in such proceedings, the issue cannot be broadened so as to raise the questions above indicated.

(b) Nor, after having appointed an assessor and entered into an arbitration and accepted money awarded to him by the assessors, will the landowner be heard for the first time, after verdict, on appeal, to complain that the evidence failed to show an effort by the condemnor to acquire the property from him by contract before commencement of the proceedings to condemn.

(c) Upon review of the decision in Piedmont Cotton Mills v. Georgia Ry. & Electric Co., 131 Ga. 129, 62 S. E. 52, as to the points stated in the first division and subdivision "a" of this headnote, it is affirmed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Eminent Domain, Cent. Dig. §§ 614, 619, 666, 753, 765-768; Dec. Dig. §§ 198, 238, 255, 274.*]

2. EMINENT DOMAIN (§ 191*)—PROCEDURE—NOTICE—WAIVER OF OBJECTIONS.

Where a notice, which was served on a landowner as the basis for a proceeding to condemn land for a right of way of a railroad, under Civ. Code 1895, § 4637 et seq., recited that the property was "sought to be condemned for the purpose of building, maintaining, and operating thereon a railroad, side tracks, terminals, and necessary connections and turnouts," such a notice was not subject to special demurrer on the ground that "it does not appear thereby for which of the purposes specified in said proceedings said plaintiff seeks to condemn this defendant's property, whether for a right of way, or side track, or connections and turnouts," filed on the trial of an appeal entered by the company from an award of assessors in favor of the landowner, who had received the amount so awarded.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Eminent Domain, Cent. Dig. §§ 509-518; Dec. Dig. § 191.*]

3. TRIAL (§ 41*)—EXCLUSION OF WITNESSES—DISCRETION OF COURT.

On the trial of a case the court ordered the witnesses to be sequestered. Counsel for defendant, which was a corporation, requested that both its president and vice president should be allowed to remain in the courtroom to assist in the trial, stating that the president was manager of the company's office and business affairs and that the vice president was manager of its manufacturing plant, and that the presence of both was necessary to assist in the trial. The court inquired if both were to be used as witnesses, and, being answered in the affirmative, refused to grant the request, and required the defendant to elect which should remain; the other being excluded from the courtroom. Held, that there is nothing in the record to show an abuse of discretion on the part of the presiding judge in such ruling.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 101-105; Dec. Dig. § 41.*]

4. EMINENT DOMAIN (§ 262*)—APPEAL—HARMLESS ERROR—INSTRUCTIONS.

While it may have been unnecessary for the court to charge the jury on the subject of the right of the condemnor to exercise the power of eminent domain, the charge on that subject was harmless to the defendant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Eminent Domain, Cent. Dig. § 686; Dec. Dig. § 262.*]

5. EMINENT DOMAIN (§§ 93, 149*)—DAMAGES—INSTRUCTION.

On the trial of an appeal from the award of assessors in a proceeding to condemn a right of way for a railroad, it was error to charge that, "if the injury be small or the mitigating circumstances be strong, nominal damages only are given," and that, "if the damages are only the imaginary or possible result of the tortious act, or other and contingent circumstances preponderate largely in causing the injurious effect, such damages are too remote to be the basis of recovery against the wrongdoer."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Eminent Domain, Dec. Dig. §§ 93, 149.*]

6. EMINENT DOMAIN (§ 321*)—DURATION OF RIGHTS.

It was inaccurate, on the trial of an appeal in such a proceeding, for the presiding judge to inform the jury that use and occupation for railroad purposes passes to the condemning party "for the duration of its charter, in this case conceded to be 101 years."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Eminent Domain, Dec. Dig. § 321.*]

7. EMINENT DOMAIN (§ 131*)—MEASURE OF DAMAGES.

Where land was sought to be condemned for a right of way of a railroad, on the trial on an appeal to the superior court from the award of assessors as to the property sought to be taken, the measure of recovery was the fair market value. If it contained valuable clay deposits, that was a proper subject for consideration in determining such value; but there would not be a recovery both for the value of the land and for the clay in it as two separate items.

(a) There was no error in refusing to charge that "the defendant is entitled to recover from the Georgia Railway & Electric Company the fair market value of the property taken, the land and also the clay in the land, if there be any, as such value may appear from the sworn evidence in the case."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Eminent Domain, Cent. Dig. § 853; Dec. Dig. § 181.*]

8. REVIEW—INSTRUCTIONS.

Other assignments of error, relating to the charge of the court and rulings touching the admissibility of evidence, were not such as to require special reference or to necessitate a reversal. As a new trial will be ordered on other grounds, it is unnecessary to deal with the objection made to the form of the verdict.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; W. D. Ellis, Judge.

Condemnation proceedings by the Georgia Railway & Electric Company against the Atlanta Terra Cotta Company. From the judgment, the Terra Cotta Company brings error. Reversed.

The Georgia Railway & Electric Company commenced proceedings under Civ. Code 1895, § 4657 et seq., to condemn a right of way through a tract of land belonging to the Atlanta Terra Cotta Company. The condemnor gave notice to the landowner, assessors were appointed by each, and a third selected. They awarded as the value of the land to be taken the sum of $4,500, and that there were no consequential damages and no consequential benefits to the property of the landowner which was not taken. An appeal was taken by the condemnor. On the trial in the superior court counsel for the appellee moved to dismiss the case, on the grounds that the condemnor had not been authorized and empowered by law to exercise the right of eminent domain, that it had no right to condemn or take the land described in the proceedings, and that it did not appear that it was necessary to do so for any of the purposes specified. The motion was overruled. The notice given by the condemnor contained this clause: "You are hereby notified that whereas, you and the Georgia Railway & Electric Company cannot agree upon compensation for the property hereinafter sought to be condemned for the purpose of building, maintaining, and operating thereon a railroad, side tracks, terminals, and necessary connections and turnouts in the following described property owned by you," etc. The appellee demurred to the proceedings, "because it does not appear thereby for which of the objects specified in said proceedings said plaintiff seeks to condemn this defendant's property, whether for a right of way, or side tracks, or connections and turnouts." The demurrer was overruled, and exceptions pendente lite were filed. The jury found the following verdict: "We, the jury, find for the Atlanta Terra Cotta Company against the Georgia Railway & Electric Company the sum of $1,100." The condemnor having paid, and the defendant having received, the $4,500 which had been awarded by the assessors, the judge entered judgment reciting this fact, and that the jury had found $1,100, and thereupon adjudging that the Georgia Railway & Electric Company recover of the Atlanta Terra Cotta Company the difference, amounting to $3,400, with interest. The Atlanta Terra Cotta Company moved for a new trial, which was refused, and it excepted.

H. L. Culberson, Owens Johnson, and Spencer R. Atkinson, for plaintiff in error. Rosser & Brandon and Walter T. Colquitt, for defendant in error.

ATKINSON, J. 1. The motion to dismiss the proceedings on appeal complained that under the law the Georgia Railway & Electric Company had no authority to exercise the power of eminent domain, or right to condemn and take the land in question, and that there was no necessity for taking such land, and these questions were also argued under certain grounds of the motion for a new trial. In different states of the Union the method of exercising the right of eminent domain is not uniform, and the issues which can be made in such proceedings in the several states may differ. In this state it has been held that, in condemnation proceedings under the statute, the assessors can only determine the amount of compensation to be paid, and cannot pass upon the legal power of a railroad company to institute such proceedings, or determine whether or not the quantity of land sought to be taken is necessary for public purposes. The owner of such land has the right to have a court of equity intervene and enjoin the condemnation of such land as is not necessary for such purpose. Piedmont Cotton Mills v. Ga. Ry. & Elec. Co., 131 Ga. 129, 62 S. E. 52, and cases therein cited. On appeal from the award of the assessors to a trial by a jury, the issue cannot be broadened, so as to raise the questions here sought to be made; but the trial is still as to the amount to be awarded to the landowner under the proceedings. Civ. Code 1895, § 4678. We have been asked to review and modify the decision in the case cited above, on the ruling mentioned; but, on review as to the point mentioned, we decline to modify it. This being so, the application to review that case on the question of the power of a street and suburban railroad company to condemn land need not be considered; the point not being one which can be raised in this case.

It was argued on one side that no charter or amendment to a charter was introduced in evidence, authorizing the condemning company to exercise the right of eminent domain, or to construct and operate a line of railway at the place where the condemnation was sought to be made, and that the courts will not take judicial cognizance of what may be contained in petitions or applications filed by persons desiring charters or amendments to charters in the office of the Secretary of State, but only of the powers conferred upon them by the general laws of the state when it has been made to appear that a charter has been granted. On the other hand, it was argued that under the decision in Atlanta & West Point R. Co. v. Atlanta, B. & Atlantic R. Co., 124 Ga. 125, 52 S. E. 320, judicial cognizance will be taken of the charter granted to a railroad company by the Secretary of State. The ruling which has been above made as to the remedy by injunction renders it unnecessary to discuss the question here raised further than to say that, while some of the language in the decision cited, in 124 Ga. 125, 52 S. E. 320, may have stated the ruling somewhat broadly, that case arose under an application to the equitable power of the superior court to enjoin a company from condemning land. The petition, which was filed on May 6, 1905, alleged that the defendant railroad company had no authority under the law to take the property of the plaintiff. It was also alleged that the company seeking to condemn was a corporation under the laws of this state, "recently incorporated," and authorized to construct a railroad between certain named points. In the opinion reference was made to this allegation, and it was treated as fixing the fact that the charter was issued by the Secretary of State under the general law. As the law for the issuing of charters to railroads by the Secretary of State in the general form in which it now exists has been in force for a number of years past, the allegation in the pleadings of the other party that the condemning company had been "recently incorporated" practically conceded that it had been chartered by the Secretary of State. So that the question as to whether or how far statements or recitals in petitions and applications filed with the Secretary of State should be taken judicial cognizance of by the courts was not then finally determined, nor is it necessary to do so now in a case arising only on an appeal from the award of assessors.

It was also argued that the statute requires an antecedent effort to agree with a property owner before beginning condemnation proceedings, and that no such effort was proved on the appeal trial. If, under the statutory form of procedure to condemn land in this state, the point mentioned can be raised and tried, there was no traverse of the statement in the notice—no plea or objection at any time till after verdict. Such an effort to agree can be waived by the property owner, and in this case it was waived. The owner went into the assessment, apparently without objection, received the amount of the award, and held it, entering no appeal. He went through the trial on appeal with no effort to raise any such issue, and he is in no position to do so on the ground that the verdict determining the amount to be paid should be set aside for want of proof on that subject.

2. A special demurrer was filed to the notice given by the condemnor to the landowner. The statement in the notice was that the property was "sought to be condemned for the purpose of building, maintaining, and operating thereon a railroad, side tracks, terminals, and necessary connections and turnouts." The objection raised by the demurrer was "because it does not appear thereby for which of the purposes specified in said proceedings said plaintiff seeks to condemn this defendant's property, whether for a right of way, or side track, or connections and turnouts." The demurrer does not specifically refer to the expression "terminals." A notice which forms the basis of condemnation proceedings should put the landowner on notice of the purpose for which it is proposed to take and use a portion of the land sought to be condemned. A mere statement that a company desired to condemn the land, without more, or a general statement that it was desired for public purposes, would not put him on notice as to the purpose, or the peculiar use or uses to which the land was to be applied, nor would it be sufficient to show that in fact the purpose was a public one. But the law does not require needless particularity and detail, such as is called for by this special demurrer. It objects that it does not appear whether the property is for a right of way, or side track, or connections and turnouts; but all of these are parts of the railroad, and a right of way is essential, whether a main line, a side track, a connection, or a turnout is to be laid upon it. Besides, this landowner entered into the assessment without objection, appointed an appraiser to take part in having an award made, and received the amount thus awarded. While, under the statute, it may be compelled to return a portion of the money if the jury should find less than the assessors awarded (Civ. Code 1895, § 4680), it was apparently satisfied with the award, and entered no appeal, and it can hardly be said that it had no sufficient notice of the purpose for which the assessment was had.

3. On motion of the condemnor the witnesses were ordered to be excluded from the courtroom when not testifying. The defendant's counsel requested that its president and vice president be allowed to remain in the courtroom to assist in the trial, stating that the president was manager of the company's office and business affairs, and that the vice president was manager of its manufacturing plant, and that it was necessary to have both present to assist in the trial of the case. The court inquired if both would be used as witnesses, and, being informed that they would, refused to grant the request, and required the defendant to elect which should remain; the other being sent out of the courtroom. A ground of the motion for a new trial complains of this ruling. This was a matter which rested to a considerable extent in the sound discretion of the presiding judge, and there is nothing in the case to indicate that he abused his discretion.

4. While it may have been unnecessary for the court to charge the jury on the subject of the right of the company to exercise the power of eminent domain, the rulings already made, showing that the defendant could not introduce that issue into the present case, make such a charge harmless to the defendant.

5. The court gave to the jury the following charges: "Damages are given as compensation for an injury done, or, in other words, for the property taken, or damaged, and generally this is the rule where the injury is of such a character as can be estimated in money. If the injury be small, or the mitigating circumstances be strong, nominal damages only are given." "If the damages are only the imaginary or possible result of the tortious act, or other and contingent circumstances preponderate largely in causing the injurious effect, such damages are too remote to be the basis of recovery against the wrongdoer." These charges embodied legal propositions relevant to the suit for a tort, but not to the determination of the amount to be awarded for the exercise of the power of eminent domain. If land is lawfully condemned for the right of way of a railroad, such condemnation and the taking and lawful use of the right of way under it do not constitute a tort. The measure of damages or the amount to be awarded to the landowner in such a case as this includes two elements: First, the value of the property taken or used (or the direct damage done); second, the consequential damages to the property not taken. As against the value of the property taken, there can be no reduction on account of any consequential benefit which may arise from the construction or operation of the railroad by the corporation, if any. If there be consequential damages to the property not taken, from them should be deducted the consequential benefits, if any, to be derived by the owner from the operation of the franchise by the railroad company, or by the carrying on of the business of the company, provided the consequential benefits assessed shall in no case exceed the consequential damages assessed. Civ. Code 1895, § 4675. The doctrines of mitigating circumstances, nominal damages, and imaginary or possible results of a tortious act have no application to such a case.

Where it is claimed that consequential damages will result to that part of the property which is not taken, of course, such damages must not be merely imaginary or possible; but it must be made to appear to the jury that they will naturally arise as a consequence of the exercise of the right of eminent domain, or the operation of the franchise, or the carrying on of the business. But this is a different thing from submitting a case of the character of the present one to the jury with instructions appropriate to an action for a tort; and, while the presiding judge elsewhere in his charge referred to the value of the land taken and consequential damages, we cannot say that no injury was done by reason of the charges referred to above. The jury found a verdict for a single amount, considerably less than that which had been awarded by the assessors. They did not mention separately the value of the land and consequential damages, and we cannot say with certainty whether the amount found by them was intended to include any consequential damages or not. But certain it is that, where the question of finding consequential damages was involved, references to mitigating circumstances and the finding of nominal damages were calculated to lead the jury to infer that they might reduce the damages which otherwise would be found because of such mitigating circumstances. What they might deem mitigating circumstances in a condemnation proceeding, which would lessen the consequential damages that the landowner would be entitled to recover, we do not know. Perhaps they might have considered that because a street and suburban railroad might be quite convenient to people living in the suburb, or because it might be difficult for the railroad company to obtain another route that would serve it as well, or because the defendant had a considerable amount of land, or because of a number of things which might be suggested, there existed circumstances which the jury could find were mitigating in character, so as to lessen the right of the landowner to recover; and the reference to nominal damages and to tortious conduct, when the lawful exercise of the right of eminent domain is not tortious conduct, whereby the jury might have inferred that because there was no tort there should be little or no recovery, was such material error as necessitates a new trial.

6. The court charged as follows: "Upon the condemnation and payment of damages, where the condemning corporation shall become vested with such interest in the property taken as may be necessary to enable the corporation to exercise its franchise or conduct its business, whenever the corporation shall cease to use the property taken for the conducting of its business, said property shall revert to the person from whom taken, or his heirs; that is to say, gentlemen of the jury, that in condemnation proceedings, such as you are now considering, the actual fee, the absolute ownership of the land, does not go to the condemning railroad company, but its use and occupation for railroad purposes passes to it for the duration of its charter, in this case conceded to be 101 years." This was not a strictly accurate statement of the law. The railroad company might renew its charter without forfeiting its previously acquired rights of way, or it might have a successor or assignee, who would be entitled to continue the use for railroad purposes. The right acquired would not necessarily and absolutely terminate with the life of the present charter. Whether this inaccuracy might have required a new trial, were there no other error, need not be decided; but, as a new trial is granted on other grounds, it will doubtless be avoided in charging again.

7. It was contended that the court erred in refusing a request to give the following in charge: "The defendant is entitled to recover from the Georgia Railway & Electric Company the fair market value of the property taken, the land and also the clay in the land, if there be any, as such value may appear from the sworn evidence in the case." There was no error in refusing this request. So far as the land taken was concerned, the fair market value was the measure. In determining such value the clay which formed a part of the land was a legitimate subject for consideration by the jury. Land containing valuable clay deposits may be of greater market value than if it did not do so. But the land and the clay in the land constitute one subject, and there cannot be a recovery both for the land as such and also for the clay in the land. Both are to be considered in determining the value of the land, but there should not be a recovery for each as a separate subject-matter. The charge of the court to which exception is taken in the fifteenth ground of the motion for new trial was in substantial accord with what has been said, except that it informed the jury that if they believed from the evidence that there were clay deposits on the land they might consider that in making up their estimate of the value of the land. It would have been more accurate to have informed them that, if they believed from the evidence that there were valuable clay deposits upon the land, they should take that fact into consideration in estimating the value of the land.

8. There were several grounds of the motion for a new trial, some of which related to rulings upon the admission of evidence, and some to the charge of the court; but under the evidence, and in the light of the entire charge, they furnish no ground for a reversal.

Complaint was also made that the verdict was contrary to law, on the ground that it was against the "Georgia Railway Company," there being no such party to the suit. There were only two parties to the suit, the Atlanta Terra Cotta Company and the Georgia Railway & Electric Company. As a new trial will be granted on the other grounds, we do not deem it necessary to say more concerning this objection to the verdict than that the next will likely be more formal.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur.

W. P. HARPER & CO. v. GINNERS' MUT. INS. CO. (No. 1,475.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. May 4, 1909.)

INSURANCE (§ 145*)—RENEWAL CONTRACT—COMPLETION.

Where an insurance company makes a proposal by letter to renew a policy of insurance on terms and conditions stated in the letter, and the insured retains the policy, but makes no reply to the letter, and does not pay the premium, or indicate in any manner an acceptance of the policy, until after the happening of a fire several months after the proposed insurance, there is no completed contract of insurance. There must be some act of acceptance, binding on the party accepting, as well as on the party proposing, to make a contract.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Washington; S. H. Hardeman, Judge

Action by W. P. Harper & Co. against the Ginnners' Mutual Insurance Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs bring error. Affirmed.

F. H. Colley and Wm. Wynne, for plaintiffs, in error. Cobb & Erwin and R. C. Norman, for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. Harper & Co. sued the Ginnners' Mutual Insurance Company on a policy of insurance covering their cotton gin. The insurance company made three defenses: (1) That there was no complete contract of insurance; (2) that, if there was a complete contract of insurance, it had lapsed by failure to pay the premium; and (3) that, if the contract of insurance had been completed, it was avoided and forfeited by the operation of the gin at night in violation of its terms and conditions. At the conclusion of the evidence the court directed a verdict for the defendant, and this is the error assigned.

Was there, under the facts, a complete contract of insurance? The facts show that the insurance company had issued to Harper & Co. a policy of insurance covering this cotton gin, which expired on September 22, 1907. Just before the expiration of this policy the secretary of the insurance company, without any knowledge or intimation that Harper & Co. desired the policy renewed, voluntarily wrote a renewal policy covering the same property, and on August 13, 1907, mailed this renewal policy to Harper & Co., accompanied by the following letter (omitting immaterial parts): "Inclosed find policy No. 964 covering $2,250 upon your ginning outfit. * * * For some reason unknown to us, you allowed your old policy to lapse on our 15 per cent. call. We have, however, taken the liberty of renewing the same from the date upon which it would have expired, had it been kept in force, namely, September 22. Attached to this policy you will find our regular form 25 per cent. dividend note and receipt for policy. Kindly sign and return to us, together with your check for $88.59, same being 75 per cent. premium due and payable upon delivery of policy." This letter was duly received by Harper & Co., but its receipt was not acknowledged, and the requests as to signing the premium note and receipt for policy and sending check for $88.59, being the 75 per cent. premium due and payable upon delivery of policy, were entirely ignored. Thereafter, on September 26, 1907, the secretary of the insurance company wrote Harper & Co. the following letter (omitting immaterial parts): "We mailed you some weeks ago policy covering your ginning outfit, and as yet we have received no reply from you. Our records show that the premium under this policy is $118.13. After deducting the amount of dividend, the balance due is $88.60. We wish to say that we are endeavoring to close up all open accounts, and, if you are not in a position to pay this premium, we will be glad to carry same for you 30 or 60 days from date of policy, without interest. * * * If you wish your matter continued, kindly advise us, and we will furnish you with blank note; otherwise, we will thank you for remittance covering the 75 per cent. of premium as above indicated. Trusting that this may be satisfactory, and awaiting your reply, we are," etc. Harper & Co. admitted receiving the foregoing letter, and admitted that they made no reply, but had absolutely ignored it. On the evening of October 17, 1907, about dark, the ginhouse described in the policy was destroyed by fire. Proofs of loss were duly furnished, and, the company refusing to pay the policy for the reasons above stated, this suit was brought.

The secretary of the company testified that, having received no response from either one of the two letters above quoted, prior to the day of the fire, he marked upon the insurance company's policy register, at the place where this policy had been registered, the words "Not taken" in red ink; and the record was introduced in evidence and showed this entry. Harper admitted that he had never, up to the time of the trial, paid or tendered any premium to the insurance company. He did not testify that he had accepted the policy, or had intended to accept the policy, and pay for it; but he insisted that the contract of insurance was complete because of the following facts: That his first policy with the company had been taken out at the solicitation of Quinn, an agent of the company, and that some time prior to the expiration of this policy this agent had come to his place of business and solicited a renewal of the policy, and he agreed with him to take the renewal policy provided he was given 30 or 60 days to pay the premium, and the agent agreed to this. The insurance company had received no notice of this agreement between Harper and Quinn and both Quinn and the secretary of the company testified that Quinn had no authority to write policies, or to give time for the payment of premiums. Two witnesses, neighbors of Harper, testified that Harper told them that he had no insurance on his gin. To one of these witnesses he made the statement during the fire, and to the other witness he made the statement the morning after the fire.

The insurance company contended that the sending of the renewal policy to Harper & Co. by its secretary was simply a proposal to effect a contract of insurance upon the terms stated in the letter of August 13, 1907, inclosing the policy, and that, as Harper & Co. had not acknowledged receipt of the policy or complied with the terms set forth in the latter, the policy was not accepted, and no contract of insurance was consummated. Section 3637 of the Civil Code of 1895, which is a codification of simple, elementary principles of law, reads as follows: "To constitute a valid contract, there must be parties able to contract, a consideration moving to the contract, the assent of the parties to the terms of the contract, and a subject-matter upon which it can operate." "While a contract can be made by correspondence through the mail, or by telegram, the offer of the seller must be accepted by the purchaser unequivocally, unconditionally, and without variance of any sort. There must be a mutual assent of the parties, and they must assent to the same thing in the same sense." Robinson v. Weller, 81 Ga. 705, 8 S. E. 449; Stix v. Roulston, 88 Ga. 748, 15 S. E. 826; Harris v. Lumber Co., 97 Ga. 465, 25 S. E. 519; Larned v. Wentworth, 114 Ga. 209, 39 S. E. 855. "The acceptance of a proposal of insurance must be evidenced by some act that binds the party accepting. A mental resolution, that can be changed, is not sufficient. Any appropriate act, which accepts the terms as they were intended to be accepted, so as to bind the insurer, is sufficient to show the concurrence of the parties, the meeting of minds." Cooley's Briefs on the Law of Insurance, 421. "Where the proposal to insure comes from the insurer, he must be notified of the acceptance of the offer by the insured." Id. 423, 424, 432.

The application of these elementary principles of law to the facts of this case, we think, clearly demonstrates that there was no complete contract between the insured and the insurer. It is admitted by Harper & Co. that there was no actual acceptance by them of the contract of insurance, and no compliance with any of the terms contained in the letter inclosing the policy, which would give evidence of such acceptance and make effective the contract of insurance. The mere statement which Harper made to the soliciting agent, Quinn, that he would renew the policy upon terms as to the payment of premiums, although this agent stated that the terms would be satisfactory to the company, was not binding upon the company, and certainly did not bind Harper & Co. to take the policy. This soliciting agent had no authority to issue policies, or change the conditions as to the payment of premiums, and Harper & Co. could have changed their minds and have refused to accept the policy when tendered to them. Besides, the evidence shows that this agreement, made between the soliciting agent and Harper, was never communicated to the insurance company, and therefore was never assented to by it. The secretary of the company, who alone was authorized to make contracts of insurance, testified that he had received no communication from Quinn in reference to renewing Harper & Co.'s policy, that he had no intimation that a renewal was desired, and that the sending of the policy by him to Harper & Co. was upon his own initiative, and simply an offer on his part, representing the insurance company, to effect a contract of insurance upon the terms stated in his letter inclosing the policy.

Conceding that the statement of Harper as to his agreement with Quinn, the soliciting agent, was true, yet, when he received the letter from the company itself, inclosing the renewal policy, the contents of this letter clearly put him on notice that the insurance company rejected any application for the policy on the terms proposed by him to Quinn, and constituted a counter proposal by the company to make a contract of insurance only upon the terms stated in the letter. Any impression or understanding that Harper & Co. had, arising from the interview with Quinn, that time was to be given for payment of premiums, was completely removed by the positive statement contained in the letter of the secretary of the insurance company, demanding an immediate payment of the premium then due. It was the duty of Harper & Co., therefore, to assent to the terms of the contract, if they expected to receive any protection thereby. Their failure to assent to the terms of the contract as proposed by the company, their failure to pay the premium, and their conduct in absolutely ignoring the matter, show conclusively that their minds did not assent to the contract as proposed by the company, and that, therefore, there was no complete contract of insurance in existence between them when the fire occurred. Not only does their failure to act show that they did not intend to make the contract, but the statement by Harper, at the time of the fire, and immediately after the fire, that he had no insurance, is strong corroboration of the other facts showing that there was no contract consummated. It was too late, several months after the proposal of insurance had been made by the insurance company to Harper & Co., which they had completely ignored, and after the property covered by the alleged insurance policy had been destroyed by fire, for them to assent to the terms upon which the contract of insurance had been proposed.

Judgment affirmed.

MASON v. HAMBY & TOOMER. (No. 1,438.)
(Court of Appeals of Georgia. May 4, 1909.)

1. CONVICTS (§ 12*)—CONTRACTS FOR LABOR—CUSTODY OF CONVICTS.

By the convict leases made by the prison commission under the act of December 21, 1897 (Acts 1897, p. 76), and the amendment thereto approved August 17, 1903 (Acts 1903, p. 66), the state did not deliver the physical custody of the convicts into the hands of the lessees. Only the labor of the convicts was contracted for. The state itself had full control and management of the convicts, and appointed all the wardens, guards, etc., who had charge of the men employed in the work of the lessees. Subleases on similar terms were permitted, when approved by the prison commission.

2. CONVICTS (§ 10*)—CONTRACTS FOR LABOR—LIABILITY OF LESSEES FOR INJURY.

Lessees of convicts, under the acts mentioned above, were not, by virtue of their mere relation as such, liable to a convict for injuries inflicted upon him by the wrongful act of a guard or "boss," or by the negligence of a sublessee or of one of his employes.

Error from City Court of Atlanta; H. M. Reid, Judge.

Action by Frank Mason, by next friend, against Hamby & Toomer. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Mason brought suit against Hamby & Toomer, alleging that in 1906 he was a felony convict and was assigned to the defendants, who were lessees from the state of felony convicts; that he was subleased to the Southern Steel Company, and on May 24, 1907, was being worked in the plant of that company in Bartow county; that a "boss," alleged to have been an employe of that company, negligently and wrongfully ordered him into a dangerous position, described in the petition, and caused him to be hurt. The plaintiff seeks to hold the defendants liable for the injuries he received, on the ground that they were the original lessees from the state, and were responsible for the wrong and negligence of the sublessees. The court below sustained a general demurrer and the plaintiff excepts.

Lawson Lamar and Edgar Latham, for plaintiff in error. Candler, Thomson & Hirsch, for defendants in error.

POWELL, J. (after stating the facts as above). 1. Not since 1897 has the state of Georgia delivered the physical custody of any of its felony convicts into the hands of any private person or corporation. By the act of December 21, 1897 (Acts 1897, p. 76), and the amendment thereto of August 17, 1903 (Acts 1903, p. 66), the prison commission was authorized to lease the labor of certain of the convicts to private persons; but the state itself, through the commission, was to retain the full control and management of the men so employed. The lessees were to furnish the prescribed buildings, clothing, food, etc.; but the prison commission was to appoint all wardens, guards, physicians, and other persons in charge of the men. The prison commission prescribed rules and regulations as to all matters relating to the care of the convicts, and it was the duty of the wardens and other officers to see that these rules were observed. Since the lessees were to furnish suitable buildings, clothing, food, etc., regulations upon these subjects were prescribed, and the lessees gave bond for the fulfillment of their duty in this respect. It was provided that the original lessees might sublet, with the consent of the prison commission, and in this event the wardens, guards, etc., caused the convicts to be worked for the sublessees, instead of the original lessees; but this in no wise varied or discharged the obligation created by the bond taken from the original lessees, and fixing the contractual duty on them of seeing that the necessary buildings, clothing, food, etc., were provided, and that the regulations, so far as applicable to them, were carried out. Hamby v. Georgia Iron Co., 127 Ga. 792, 797, 56 S. E. 1033. Under the act of 1908 neither the persons nor the labor of convicts are now leased to any one; but this case arose under the old law.

2. By section 4940 of the Civil Code of 1895, "an action for a tort must, in general, be brought * * * against the party committing the injury, either by himself, his servant or agent in his employment." No act of commission on the part of the defendants, or of any of them or of any employé of them, is alleged in the present action. The negligent situation was created by fault of the Southern Steel Company. The wrongful command that the plaintiff should go into this unsafe place was given by the "boss," who is alleged to have been an employé, not of the defendants, but of the steel company. No wrongful act of omission is alleged against the defendants, unless there was resting in them and in favor of the convict an absolute duty of protection. We know of no law creating such duty, and there is no allegation that it was otherwise created. It was plainly contemplated by the law which allowed these leases and subleases, and which placed the entire management and control of the convicts and the duty of protecting their welfare in the hands of the prison commission, that the state should have such an interest in protecting the men from undue hardship or danger as to give the prison commission the right to annul a sublease, or even the original lease itself, if necessary to effectuate this purpose, and to hold the bond of the original lessees liable for any breach of the regulations, even though committed while the men were working for a sublessee. Hamby v. Georgia Iron Co., supra.

However, the primary duty of protecting the convicts was upon the state itself, and we find nothing in the law which charged the original lessees with liability for torts committed by the wardens, guards, or "bosses," or by the sublessees, or by outsiders, upon these unfortunate human beings. It is most manifest that the Legislature intended that the lessees should have no control over the persons of the convicts. They had a prima facie right to designate the work to be done; but the state's own officers were there to care for the men in the doing of it. Of course, we do not mean to say that the proprietors of mills, mines, or other places into which the convicts might have been sent to work would not be liable to the convicts, just as they would to any other human being, and perhaps even in a greater degree than they would be to free persons, for any failure in ordinary care as to the keeping of the instrumentalities, place of work, etc., in reasonably safe condition. But if any one is liable to the plaintiff in this case it is the "boss" who gave the wrongful command, or the Southern Steel Company, or both, and not the defendants.

Judgment affirmed.

SAVANNAH ELECTRIC CO. v. ELARBEE.
(No. 1,470.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. May 4, 1909.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1002*)—CONFLICTING EVIDENCE—REVIEW.

On the facts the jury could have found for either plaintiff or defendant, and the verdict on that issue ends the controversy.

2. STREET RAILROADS (§ 85*)—RIGHTS AND DUTIES OF TRAVELER.

A street railway company has only an equal right with the traveling public to the use of the street in which its track is laid. In using the highway at a public crossing, the law gives to the traveler on the highway the same right to cross the track that it gives to the car to cross the highway, and imposes upon both the same duty of exercising reasonable care and prudence to avoid injuries.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Savannah; Davis Freeman, Judge.

Action by A. B. Elarbee against the Savannah Electric Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Osborne & Lawrence, for plaintiff in error. Garrard & Meldrim, for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. Elarbee sued the Savannah Electric Company to recover damages for personal injuries received by him from a collision between his wagon and a street car at a public street crossing. The only issue made by the pleadings and evidence was one of crimination and recrimination. The plaintiff charged and proved negligence on the part of the motorman in the manner in which he approached the crossing. The defendant denied the negligence attributed to the motorman, and charged and proved that the plaintiff's own negligence was the sole cause of his injuries. The jury might have found a verdict either way; but in the exercise of their exclusive legal function on issues of fact they decided the conflict in the evidence in favor of the plaintiff, and their decision must stand, unless in some material respect the court contributed to it by an error of law. Two errors of law are complained of.

1. On the subject of the relative rights of street cars and other vehicles to the use of the public streets, the court instructed the jury as follows: "One driving a wagon or vehicle, and a street car company, have equal rights on the streets. Neither one or the other has any superior right to the other. Each must use them in such manner as to preserve the rights of the other within the limit of the exercise of ordinary care." The defendant says this instruction was error, "because the street car company has the right of way over pedestrians and drivers of wagons. The charge was confusing to the jury." According to our view of the law the instruction correctly defined the relative rights of street cars and drivers of other vehicles to the use of the street. A street railway company has only an equal right with the traveling public to the use of the street where its track is laid. Of course, when a vehicle meets a car on the track at a public crossing, the driver of the vehicle should give to the car precedence in crossing, for the car can only run on the track; but this does not preclude the driver of the vehicle from his equal right to use the street. He is not required to abandon his right to cross the track at the crossing in order to avoid possible injuries that may result to him from the carelessness of the railway company. Both company and traveler have the same right to use the street at the crossing, and both are required to exercise ordinary care and diligence to avoid injuries. What would amount to this degree of care might in some cases differ, when applied to the company and to the traveler. The jury are to make the application in each case according to the particular facts.

The Supreme Court in Macon Ry. & Light Co. v. Barnes, 121 Ga. 445, 49 S. E. 283, clearly settles the law on the point under discussion: "A street railway company has no superior right to the use of the public highway in which its cars are operated over the rights of other users of the highway, except that, from the necessity of the case, the latter, at places other than crossings, must give the company's cars the right to pass when occasion requires. In other respects, the rights of street railway companies, in using public highways with their cars, are precisely like the rights of others who use the highways with other vehicles." This decision goes to the extent of holding that the necessity of the case above adverted to by us does not apply at public crossings. The expression of the Supreme Court in the case of Savannah Ry. Co. v. Beasley, 94 Ga. 142, 21 S. E. 285, relied upon by the attorney for plaintiff in error, that "the cars of the railway company had the superior right of way," appears to be "obiter," according to the opinion of Justice Fish in the case just cited. Macon Ry. & Light Co. v. Barnes, 121 Ga. 447, 49 S. E. 282. See, also, Cordray v. Savannah Electric Co., 5 Ga. App. 625, 63 S. E. 710.

2. The second special exception alleges error because the court did not charge on the theory of unavoidable accident, "there being evidence from which the jury might find that the injury was caused without fault upon the part of either plaintiff or defendant." We have carefully searched the brief of evidence, and we can find no circumstance suggesting an accident. The only issue made by the pleadings was one of negligence, and all the evidence in the case was pertinent alone to that issue. The trial judge is required to submit to the jury only the issues made by both pleadings and evidence. He is not required to present an issue purely academic and imaginary.

Judgment affirmed.

L. CAMPBELL & CO. v. MION BROS.
(No. 1468.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. May 4, 1909.)

1. FRAUDS, STATUTE OF (§ 84*) — SALE OF GOODS—WORK AND LABOR.

A contract for the improvement of realty is not within the statute of frauds, although it involves the furnishing by the contractor of materials in excess of the sum of $50.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Frauds, Statute of, Cent. Dig. § 135; Dec. Dig. § 84.*]

2. CONTRACTS (§ 353*)—EXISTENCE OF CONTRACT—INSTRUCTIONS.

Where a contract not within the statute of frauds is the subject-matter of the suit, and the defendant admits that he made the agreement according to the terms asserted by the plaintiff, but insists that it was to have been in writing, the court may, without error, instruct the jury that the fact of the making of the contract was not in issue.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contracts, Cent. Dig. § 1830; Dec. Dig. § 353.*]

3. DAMAGES (§ 120*) — MEASURE—BREACH OF CONTRACT.

Where one employs another to furnish the labor and material and to do the work necessary to the improvement of real estate, but renounces the contract prior to the time when the contractor has incurred any expense toward the performance of it, the recovery for the breach of the contract is limited to the difference between the contract price and what it would have cost the contractor in labor and materials to have performed it. But, if the contract is not broken until after the contractor has gone to expense toward its performance, the net loss incurred by him on account of the amount so expended should be added to the difference between the contract price and what it would have cost him to perform the contract.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Atlanta; H. M. Reid, Judge.

Action by Mion Bros. against L. Campbell & Co. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants bring error. Affirmed.

Campbell & Co. employed Mion Bros. to furnish the materials for and lay a ceramic mosaic tile floor in a building on Whitehall street in Atlanta at a price of $363.82. Mion Bros. ordered the tiling, which was of a peculiar pattern having no general market value, at a cost of $166.46, including the freight paid thereon; but, when they came with the material to the building in order to do the work, Campbell & Co. refused to allow them to do it. Mion Bros. thereupon brought suit against Campbell & Co. for damages resulting from the breach of the contract. Pending the trial it developed that, subsequently to the institution of the suit, the plaintiffs sold the tiling for $95. The jury found for the plaintiffs $100, and to the overruling of a motion for a new trial the defendants except. Further facts necessary to an understanding of the case will be stated in the opinion.

Maddox & Sims, for plaintiffs in error. Moore & Pomeroy and W. A. Hood, for defendants in error.

POWELL, J. (after stating the facts as above). 1. The first insistence is that the contract was void, because not in writing, and therefore within the inhibition of the statute of frauds. A contract for the doing of a designated piece of work is not within the statute of frauds, although it involves the furnishing of materials which themselves may be classed as goods, wares, and merchandise in an amount exceeding $50, unless the real intention of the parties is that the transaction should in substance be a sale of the materials, and that the doing of the work and labor should be merely incidental. Cason v. Cheely, 6 Ga. 554.

2. Exception is taken to the fact that the judge charged the jury: "On the trial it is not disputed by the defendants but that they entered into a contract mentioned in the petition. It is not on the trial a disputed issue as to whether the contract was made or not. The defendant in his evidence on the trial admits that the contract was made." Upon an inspection of the brief of the evidence we find that the defendant who testified did not deny making a contract such as claimed by the plaintiffs; his insistence being that the plaintiffs were to bring him a written contract embodying its terms, which had not been brought or signed. The agreement was complete, however, and the writing would have only been evidence. This would have been true, even if the agreement had been within the statute of frauds. Capital City Brick Co. v. Atlanta Coal & Ice Co., 5 Ga. App. 436, 63 S. E. 562.

There are certain other assignments of error upon the charge of the court; but they are not well taken. They will not be reported, as they present no question of general importance or interest.

3. It is insisted that the proof did not authorize the amount of the verdict rendered. It was shown on the trial that the contract price for the work was $363.82; that the tiling and the freight on it cost the plaintiffs $166.46, and that the cost of laying the tile would have been $80; that the plaintiffs had received from the resale of the tiling the sum of $95. By an ingenious method of calculation counsel for the plaintiffs in error attempt to show that the plaintiffs' loss under this state of facts was only $22.36. The process of calculation suggested is as follows: By adding together the cost of the tile and the freight and the sum which the labor would have cost (making a total of $246.46), and by subtracting this from the contract price the result is $117.36—the profit which the plaintiffs would have earned if the contract had been executed according to its terms. By deducting from this $117.36 the $95 for which the tile was resold, the result obtained is $22.36, which, it is argued, represents the plaintiffs' actual loss.

In this calculation counsel are guilty of bad mathematics. Taking the figures given above as true, it will be seen that, if the plaintiffs had completed the contract according to its terms, it would have cost them $246.46, and that then they would have been entitled to receive from the defendants the sum of $363.82. If the defendants had renounced the contract before the plaintiffs went to any expense toward its performance, they would have been primarily liable for the contract price, but would have been entitled to compel the plaintiffs to credit them with the amounts saved by reason of being relieved from performance; that is to say, the plaintiffs' recovery in that event would have been limited to $363.82, less the $246.46. But the defendants did not break or renounce the contract at that time, nor until after the plaintiffs had gone to the expense of procuring the tiling, which, on account of its peculiar pattern, was not worth in the market what it cost to have it made. The defendants, therefore, were entitled to have the contract price of $363.82 reduced only by the amount which the plaintiffs saved on the item of labor ($80) and the amount which was received for the tiling on a resale thereof ($95). Therefore any verdict up to the amount of $188.82 (the difference between $363.82 and $175) would have been authorized.

Judgment affirmed.

BAKER v. HOOKS. (No. 1,342.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. May 4, 1909.)

1. BANKRUPTCY (§ 421*)—DISCHARGE—"PROVABLE DEBT."

A discharge in bankruptcy may be a good defense against all debts of the bankrupt which were provable at the time of the adjudication in bankruptcy; but the probability that one who has retained title to a horse, which has been sold by the purchaser by a third person under a warranty of title, will retake such horse, and that thereby a breach of the warranty will result, is not a "provable debt" within the meaning of the bankruptcy act.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Bankruptcy, Dec. Dig. § 421.*]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 6, p. 5746.]

2. SALES (§ 430*)—WARRANTY OF TITLE—DEFENSES.

One who warrants title is not relieved from his warranty by the suggestion of an ineffectual means of retaining possession against an impending attack and an offer to pay attorney's fees to present a worthless defense thereto.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sales, Dec. Dig. § 430.*]

3. SALES (§ 441*)—BREACH OF WARRANTY OF TITLE—ACTIONS—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

No error of law is assigned. The evidence authorized the verdict, and no reason appears why a new trial should have been granted.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Dublin; J. E. Burch, Judge.

Action by C. C. Hooks against W. A. Baker. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Ira S. Chappell, for plaintiff in error. W. C. Davis and J. S. Adams, for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. Baker bought a horse from Smith to which Smith retained the title. This horse Baker swapped to Hooks for a certain roan horse. Baker filed an application in bankruptcy, and the horse he obtained from Hooks was taken possession of by the trustee in bankruptcy and sold as Baker's property. After Baker was adjudicated a bankrupt, Smith, by trover, recovered from Hooks the horse which had been sold to him by Baker, and Hooks thereupon brought suit against Baker and recovered $105 upon an alleged breach of warranty. Baker denied that he had warranted the title of the horse to Hooks; but the jury found in favor of Hooks' contention that Baker had warranted the title. Three reasons why a new trial should have been granted are urged by the plaintiff in error: First, that the evidence does not authorize the verdict rendered in favor of Hooks; second, that Smith ratified Baker's action in substituting one horse for the other; third, that if there was a breach of warranty of title it was a provable debt, and was discharged in bankruptcy.

1. We will consider these contentions in inverse order. Then is the finding against Baker unauthorized by reason of the fact that he has been adjudicated a bankrupt? There can be no question that Baker's discharge, which appears in the record, would be a good defense as against all provable debts; and for this reason it is insisted that the breach of warranty, if any existed, should relate back to the original transaction, which antedated Baker's discharge, and even his petition in bankruptcy. However, was Hooks' claim upon the breach of warranty ever a provable debt until Smith succeeded by trover in depriving Hooks of the horse? We think not, and for this reason we are of the opinion that the breach of warranty cannot relate back to the original transaction, because it only had its birth after it was ascertained by Smith's assertion of his title that the warranty had failed. Till then it was a mere contingent liability, and not a provable debt. If Smith had not recovered the horse by trover, and taken it from Hooks' possession, there would have been no breach of warranty; and who could have said, at the time that Baker was adjudicated a bankrupt, that Smith would assert his title to the horse which he had retained? It is true that Smith could do so; but it was not certain that he would do so, and until he had done so, and Hooks had thus lost possession of the horse, there could certainly be no provable debt. The breach of the warranty having arisen after the adjudication in bankruptcy, the plea of bankruptcy presented no defense, and was properly overruled in the verdict of the jury.

2. One who retains title to a given piece of personal property may release his claim of title, and may ratify the act of another in substituting one piece of property for another. In the latter event, however, no substitution can result, except upon the consent of all parties at interest. But, even if it were possible for Smith to have consented for Baker to substitute a horse which was not included or mentioned in the note in which the title was reserved (and this would not be possible), nevertheless the contention of the plaintiff in error that Smith was estopped from setting up title to the horse sold by Baker to Hooks, because he bought the substituted horse at the bankrupt sale, and that therefore Hooks had a good defense to the trover brought by Smith, is not sustained by the evidence, nor is Smith a party to this proceeding.

A contention of plaintiff in error is that Baker notified Hooks that Smith had agreed to the substitution of the horse obtained from Hooks by Baker for the horse sold by Smith to Baker; that he had bid in the horse scheduled by Baker in his application for bankruptcy, and this presented a good defense to Smith's action of trover; and that, inasmuch as Hooks failed to make any defense in the trover proceeding, he is estopped from asserting any claim upon the breach of warranty. Aside from the point, to which we have alluded, that Smith is not a party to the present action, the contention of the plaintiff in error was adjudged adversely to him by the jury, and the finding of the jury is supported by the positive testimony of Smith, who testified that he never released his claim of title to the horse he had sold to Baker, and when he bought the horse which Baker had obtained from Hooks at the sale of Baker's bankrupt estate he did so merely as an ordinary buyer seeking a bargain, without any claim of title in the horse, and paid the purchase price of his bid.

3. The jury might have returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff in error; but the verdict in favor of the defendant in error is amply supported by the evidence, and no reason appears why the trial judge should have granted a new trial overruling the finding of the jury upon issuable facts. Baker testified, it is true, that he made no warranty of title to Hooks; but Hooks testified that he did. This is the turning point in the case, because it is uncontested that Smith had the title to the bay horse which Baker traded to Hooks, and that after Baker was adjudicated a bankrupt Smith recovered this horse from Hooks by trover. Hooks testified that Baker did not tell him that Smith held title to the horse. Baker testified that he did. This difference is immaterial, as, although Hooks was charged with constructive notice of the reservation of title, which was recorded, there is no reason why Baker could not still have warranted the title and have protected Hooks against loss by settling Smith's claim. The fact that Baker told Smith to defend the suit which Smith brought against him for the horse, and promised to pay the attorney's fees, is of no importance in the case, because, under Smith's testimony, he never having ratified Baker's sale of the horse, and never having claimed any interest in the animal which Baker received in lieu thereof, the defense suggested by Baker would have been fruitless, and the effect of the jury's finding was so to declare.

Judgment affirmed.

RICE v. STATE. (No. 1,783.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. May 4, 1909.)

1. LARCENY (§ 15*)—TAKING—BAILMENT.

Where it is shown, upon the trial of a defendant upon an accusation for simple larceny, that he borrowed from the prosecutor the article of personalty charged in the accusation for a mere temporary purpose of his own, and took it without the prosecutor's consent, and carried it away to another state, and the testimony is such as to justify the inference that the borrowing and the carrying away were with intent to steal, the conviction is lawful.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Larceny, Cent. Dig. §§ 39-42; Dec. Dig. § 15.*]

2. LARCENY (§ 15*)—LARCENY AFTER TRUST.

In cases of larceny after trust delegated, under section 191 of the Penal Code of 1895, it must appear that there was a bailment of the article converted or stolen, and that the delivery of the property to the defendant was for some purpose in which the bailor, or some person other than the defendant, had an interest and a benefit. A mere temporary loan of the property, without hire or other benefit to the person loaning, is not such a fiduciary bailment as would make the conversion or stealing of the property larceny after trust, as distinguished from simple larceny.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Larceny, Cent. Dig. §§ 39-42; Dec. Dig. § 15.*]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

3. LARCENY (§ 15*)—CONVERSION BY "BAILEE."

The word "bailee," used in its broad sense, includes every person to whom the possession of personal property is delivered by another; but, as used in Pen. Code 1895, § 191, which provides that any factor, commission merchant, warehousekeeper, etc., or any other bailee, who shall fraudulently convert anything of value intrusted to him, shall be guilty of a felony, it is necessary that the character of the relation be a more fiduciary one than that arising from a mere loan for the benefit of the borrower.

Russell, J., dissenting.

Error from City Court of Blakely; W. A. Jordan, Judge.

Corrie Rice was convicted of larceny, and brings error. Affirmed.

P. G. Thompson and James & Thompson, for plaintiff in error. Walter G. Park, Sol., for the State.

POWELL, J. 1. The defendant, a woman, borrowed a pistol from the prosecutor, stating that her husband had gone away from home and left her alone. The prosecutor loaned her the pistol, that she might use it, for three or four days. In about two days after she borrowed the pistol the woman went to Alabama, and carried the pistol away with her, and never offered to return it, nor made any explanation of her conduct. Some months later she was arrested in Alabama and brought back upon a requisition. She was accused and convicted of simple larceny. She presents the point in this court that, if there was any larceny, it was larceny after trust delegated, and not simple larceny. "If, with intent to steal, one borrows or hires a horse or carriage, as he pretends, to ride, or obtains the loan of any other chattel, * * * his offense, notwithstanding this consent of the owner, is larceny." 2 Bishop's New Criminal Law (8th Ed.) § 813. The intent to steal is inferable from the defendant's conduct in the present case.

2. The real question is: Was the offense simple larceny, or was it larceny after trust delegated, under section 191 of the Penal Code of 1895? That section provides: "If any factor, commission merchant, warehouse keeper, wharfinger, wagoner, stage driver, or common carrier on land or water, or any other bailee," shall fraudulently convert anything of value intrusted to him, he shall be guilty of a felony. In Sanders v. State, 86 Ga. 718, 12 S. E. 1058, it is said that the words "other bailee," found in this section, are equivalent to the words "other like bailee." This statement, however, was characterized as obiter, and not binding, in the case of Cody v. State, 100 Ga. 109, 28 S. E. 106; and it is there said that the words "other bailee" were intended to include any person with whom money or other thing of value might be intrusted or deposited. A similar criticism was made upon the Sanders Case in Weaver v. Carter, 101 Ga. 213, 28 S. E. 869, and in Belt v. State, 103 Ga. 15, 29 S. E. 451. While the word "bailee," in its broad sense, may be construed to include every person to whom the possession of personal property is delivered by another, yet from a careful reading of the Cody Case and the Belt Case, supra, it will be seen that a bailment more fiduciary in its character than that of a mere loan for the sole benefit of the borrower is necessary to fulfill the legislative intention in the employment of the word. In Cunnegin v. State, 118 Ga. 125, 44 S. E. 846, the prosecutor voluntarily delivered the stolen article to the defendant, who carried it away and disposed of it, fraudulently intending to steal it, and the court sustained the conviction of simple larceny, saying that "the element of trust of the character which enters into all cases of larceny after trust was absent." This case cites Finkelstein v. State, 105 Ga. 618, 31 S. E. 589, in which it is shown, in the course of the argument, that while the words "other bailee," used in section 191 of the Penal Code, were not so restricted in meaning as was indicated in the obiter in the Sanders Case, supra, yet that under that section there must be a "delegated trust." See, also, in this connection, Harris v. State, 81 Ga. 758, 7 S. E. 689, 12 Am. St. Rep. 355.

Our conclusion is that, before a prosecution will lie under section 191 of the Penal Code, it must appear that the property was delegated to the defendant upon some trust or purpose in which the person delivering the article, or some person other than the defendant himself, has an interest or benefit, and that the mere delivery of the chattel to the defendant as a temporary loan, without hire and for the benefit of the defendant only, does not create such a bailment as is contemplated by that section.

Judgment affirmed.

GELDERS v. MATHEWS. (No. 1,483.)
(Court of Appeals of Georgia. May 4, 1909.)

CHATTEL MORTGAGES (§ 283*)—AFFIDAVIT OF ILLEGALITY—BOND—AMENDMENT.

A replevy bond, given on filing an affidavit of illegality by the defendant in a mortgage fi. fa. issued to subject personal property, contained conditions varying from those prescribed by the statute, to wit: The bond was conditioned for the delivery of the property at the time and place of sale, and was made payable to the levying officer, when, according to the statute, it should have been conditioned for the return of the property when called for by the levying officer, and should have been made payable to the plaintiff in fi. fa. Held, that the bond was amendable in both respects before final judgment, so as to make it conform to the requirements of the statute.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Chattel Mortgages, Dec. Dig. § 283.*]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Ben Hill County; U. V. Whipple, Judge.

Isadore Gelders filed an affidavit of illegality to the levy of a mortgage fi. fa. on personal property by Thomas Mathewz. The affidavit was dismissed, and Gelders brings error. Reversed.

Ryman & Wall, for plaintiff in error. E. Wall, for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. This was an affidavit of illegality to the levy of a mortgage fi. fa. upon personal property. The bond filed with the affidavit varied from the replevy bond required in such cases by section 2766 of the Civil Code of 1895 in the following particulars: First, the condition of the bond was for the delivery of the property levied upon at the time and place of sale, instead of "for the return of the property when called for by the levying officer"; second, the levying officer was made the obligee in the bond, instead of the plaintiff in fi. fa. Because of the variance in the above particulars a motion was made to dismiss the affidavit of illegality. To meet this motion plaintiff in illegality offered to amend the bond so as to make it conform in the particulars mentioned to the terms of the statute. The court refused to allow the amendment and dismissed the affidavit of illegality.

1. While the terms and conditions of the bond in the particulars mentioned are not in accordance with the requirements of the statute in such cases, these defects were clearly amendable, as the motion to amend was offered before any judgment of the court on the motion to dismiss the illegality. The Supreme Court, construing section 3505 of the Code of 1882, now section 5123 of the Civil Code of 1895, distinctly holds that a bond given on filing an affidavit of illegality by the defendant in a mortgage fi. fa. issued to subject personal property falls under the terms of this section, and that such bond is amendable. Lytle v. De Vaughn, 81 Ga. 228, 7 S. E. 281. What is here held is certainly applicable to the variance from the statute in the condition of the bond first alluded to.

2. We think this holding is also applicable to the second variance mentioned. But, even if the bond was not amendable by making a change as to the obligee therein mentioned, it was accepted by the levying officer and the papers returned into court. While, strictly speaking, it is not in this respect a statutory bond, it was a good common-law bond, and suit could have been brought on it in the name of the sheriff for the use of plaintiff in fi. fa. Wall v. Mount, 121 Ga. 831, 49 S. E. 778; Stroud v. Hancock, 116 Ga. 332, 42 S. E. 496.

It is insisted by the plaintiff in error that the amendments in question could not have been properly made without the consent of the surety in the bond. We do not think this objection well founded. The defects indicated by the amendment in the terms of the bond in no wise affected the risk of the surety, or increased his liability. Besides, the surety signed the bond with the knowledge of the law that it was amendable in these respects under the statute, and the statute also provides that new security may be given after an amendment, if necessary. Judgment reversed.

PIERSON v. WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH CO.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. May 5, 1909.)

1. TELEGRAPHS AND TELEPHONES (§ 38*)—DELIVERY OF MESSAGE—DELAY—NEGLIGENCE.

Where a message was filed with the telegraph company as a night message on Saturday at 8 p. m., and was not delivered till nearly 10 a. m. Monday, though under the rules of the company it should have been delivered by 8 a. m. Sunday, and the addressee resided within 200 yards of the telegraph office, the company was guilty of gross negligence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Telegraphs and Telephones, Cent. Dig. § 33; Dec. Dig. § 38.*]

2. TELEGRAPHS AND TELEPHONES (§ 73*)—DELIVERY OF MESSAGE—DELAY—INJURY TO PLAINTIFF—QUESTION FOR JURY.

In an action for delay in delivering a telegram announcing the probable death of a niece of the addressee, evidence held to present a question for the jury whether the addressee would have arrived in time for the funeral if the message had been properly delivered.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Telegraphs and Telephones, Cent. Dig. § 76; Dec. Dig. § 73.*]

3. TELEGRAPHS AND TELEPHONES (§ 38*)—DELIVERY OF MESSAGE—NOTICE OF CHARACTER OF MESSAGE.

A telegram, stating that a person is dying, puts the telegraph company on notice of its importance to the sendee and that it is sent for his benefit.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Telegraphs and Telephones, Cent. Dig. § 33; Dec. Dig. § 38.*]

4. TELEGRAPHS AND TELEPHONES (§ 73*)—DELIVERY OF MESSAGE—DELAY—ACTIONS—QUESTION FOR JURY.

Evidence that a child concerning whose death a message was sent to plaintiff was his niece, with whom he had lived and to whom he was much attached, presented a case for the jury as to whether he suffered any mental anguish from inability to attend her funeral by reason of delay in delivery of the message.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Telegraphs and Telephones, Cent. Dig. § 76; Dec. Dig. § 73.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Caldwell County; Ward, Judge.

Action by R. H. Pierson against the Western Union Telegraph Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. No error.

Civil action for damages arising from delay in delivering a telegram to plaintiff, as follows: "Statesville, N. C., Oct. 13, 1906. R. H. Pierson, Lenoir N. C. Come to Statesville at once Hamp's child dying. J. H. Holden." These issues were submitted: (1) Was the defendant guilty of negligence in respect to the transmission and delivery of the telegram to the plaintiff, R. H. Pierson? Ans. Yes. (2) If so, was the plaintiff, R. H. Pierson, injured thereby? Ans. Yes. (3) What damages, if any, has the plaintiff sustained? Ans. $300." From the judgment rendered defendant appealed.

Avery & Avery and Geo. H. Fearons, for appellant. W. C. Newland, Thos. Newland, and Lawrence Wakefield, for appellee.

BROWN, J. The message was filed with defendant company as a night message for transmission on Saturday, October 13, 1906, at 8 p. m. It was delivered to the plaintiff on Monday morning between 9 and 10 o'clock. That this is gross negligence is not open to discussion. Assuming that it was filed and accepted as a night message, under the rules of the company it should have been delivered next morning about 8 o'clock according to the testimony of defendant's operator. It was not received at Lenoir until 9:42 a. m. Sunday, and when received at Lenoir it was addressed to the care of Jim Better, instead of Jim Booth; but there is no evidence that plaintiff is chargeable with that error. There is no evidence of any effort being made Sunday morning to find plaintiff or Jim Better in Lenoir, although the former resided within 200 yards of the telegraph office. We think his honor did not err in directing the jury that, if they believed the evidence, to answer first issue "yes." The real defense of the defendant is based upon the theory that, if the telegram had been delivered on Sunday morning, according to contract, the plaintiff could not have reached Statesville in time to attend the funeral, and that therefore the plaintiff has failed to show that defendant's negligence was the proximate cause of the injury. It is plain that there was no train leaving Lenoir on Sunday morning which he could have taken, as the only Sunday train left at 5 a. m.; but plaintiff testifies he would have gone to Statesville Sunday morning had he received the message, and that he could have gotten there for the funeral by driving to Hickory. The possibility of such an achievement was contested by defendant, but we think his honor properly submitted the question to the jury when he told them "that the plaintiff must show to your satisfaction that he could have gone to Statesville before the funeral." Upon this contention his honor fairly submitted to the consideration of the jury the evidence and facts relied on by defendant as well as plaintiff.

It is further contended that there is no evidence that the plaintiff suffered any mental anguish. The character of the message put defendant upon notice of its importance to the sendee, and that it was sent for his benefit. The testimony shows that the dying child was plaintiff's niece, with whom he had lived in his brother's house, and that he was much attached to her. It is true that plaintiff does not use as strong language in endeavoring to portray his grief as is sometimes employed; but facts sometimes speak louder than words, and both together made out a case sufficiently strong to be submitted to the jury.

No error.

GARRISON v. SOUTHERN RY. CO.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. May 5, 1909.)

1. CARRIERS (§ 20*)—REGULATIONS—PENALTIES—DEFENSES.

When a carrier shows the existence of conditions for which it is not responsible, preventing the discharge of its duty to receive goods for shipment, it will not be held liable for the penalty imposed by Revisal 1905, § 2631, for failure to receive and ship goods.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Dec. Dig. § 20.*]

2. STATUTES (§ 174*)—CONSTRUCTION—GENERAL RULES.

The court will not attribute to the Legislature the intention to punish the failure to do an impossible thing.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Statutes, Cent. Dig. § 254; Dec. Dig. § 174.*]

3. CARRIERS (§ 20*)—REGULATION—PENALTIES—TENDER OF GOODS.

To entitle a shipper to the penalty imposed by Revisal 1905, § 2631, for a carrier's failure to receive freight for shipment, it must be tendered at a regular depot and during business hours.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Dec. Dig. § 20.*]

4. CARRIERS (§ 20*)—REGULATION—PENALTIES—"REFUSAL TO RECEIVE SHIPMENT."

Where a shipper was permitted to place lumber on a car, but the carrier refused to receive it for shipment, or to issue a bill of lading for it, this was a "refusal to receive" it, within Revisal 1905, § 2631, imposing a penalty for such refusal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Dec. Dig. § 20.*]

5. CARRIERS (§ 20*)—REGULATION—PENALTIES—EXCUSE OF CARRIER.

That the consignee of freight failed to unload cars consigned to him, creating a congestion of traffic at the point of destination, was not a sufficient excuse for the carrier's refusal to receive and issue a bill of lading for an additional shipment to relieve the carrier from liability for the penalty imposed by Revisal 1905, § 2631, for refusal to receive freight for shipment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Dec. Dig. § 20.*]

6. CARRIERS (§ 21*)—REGULATION—DISCRIMINATION.

At common law and under Revisal 1905, § 3749, it is an indictable offense for a common carrier to unjustly discriminate between members of the public.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Dec. Dig. § 21.*]

7. CARRIERS (§ 20*)—REGULATION—PENALTIES—"TENDER AND REFUSAL OF FREIGHT."

Where a shipper placed lumber on a car with the carrier's consent and demanded a bill of lading, which was refused, and went to the agent of the carrier two or three times and asked if he had shipped the car load, and he said he had not, and plaintiff refused to unload the car, there was a tender and refusal to ship on each day from the time the goods were placed in the car until they were finally shipped, within Revisal 1905, § 2631, imposing a penalty of $50 for each day a carrier refuses to receive freight.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Dec. Dig. § 20.*]

8. STATUTES (§ 241*)—CONSTRUCTION—PENAL STATUTES.

While penal statutes are to be construed strictly against the party against whom they are enforced, they are not to be construed so as to make them of no effect.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Statutes, Cent. Dig. §§ 322, 323; Dec. Dig. § 241.*]

9. COMMERCE (§ 61*)—MEANS OF REGULATION—CARRIERS—PENALTIES.

Revisal 1905, § 2631, imposing a penalty for a carrier's refusal to receive freight for shipment, as applied to a shipment between points within the state, and in the absence of specific action by Congress or the Interstate Commerce Commission, is not invalid as a regulation of interstate commerce, though it may indirectly affect interstate commerce.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Commerce, Cent. Dig. §§ 81, 84; Dec. Dig. § 61.*]

10. COMMERCE (§ 61*)—MEANS OF REGULATION—CARRIERS—PENALTIES.

That Revisal 1905, § 2631, may in certain cases affect interstate shipments, does not invalidate the statute, but merely gives an additional excuse to the carrier for nonperformance.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Commerce, Dec. Dig. § 61.*]

11. CARRIERS (§ 20*)—REGULATION—PENALTIES—POWER TO IMPOSE.

The state has power to impose penalties upon carriers for failure to discharge public duties, provided they are not so enormous that the carrier is prevented from resorting to the courts to determine the validity of the statute.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Dec. Dig. § 20.*]

12. CARRIERS (§ 2*)—REGULATION—PENALTIES.

Revisal 1905, § 2631, imposing a penalty of $50 for each day's failure to receive freight for shipment, is not invalid as imposing a penalty which would prevent the carrier from resorting to the courts to determine the validity of the statute.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Dec. Dig. § 2.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Buncombe County; Gulon, Judge.

Action by W. A. B. Garrison against the Southern Railway Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. No error.

This action is instituted for the recovery of the penalty imposed by section 2631. Revisal 1905, for failure to receive a car load of lumber tendered defendant by plaintiff at Black Mountain Station to be shipped to W. H. Westall at Asheville; both points being within this state. The facts, as stated in defendant's brief, are: Plaintiff had contracted to sell lumber f. o. b. cars at Black Mountain to Westall at Asheville. Plaintiff hauled the lumber to Black Mountain, loaded it on cars furnished by defendant June 7, 1906, and demanded a bill of lading, which defendant's agent declined to give to him upon the ground that an embargo had been placed upon shipments of lumber consigned to W. H. Westall and English & Co. at Asheville on account of accumulation of business for them at that point. When the embargo against Westall was placed, there were many loaded cars on defendant's yard at Asheville for him which he could not or would not handle, and this, with other conditions, created a congested condition of the Asheville yards and caused the embargo to be placed upon shipments to him. There was evidence tending to show: That the defendant's yards and tracks at Asheville were congested by an unusual number of cars of freight which were left unloaded. That on May 30, 1906, defendant's superintendent issued the following notice to "All Agents, Asheville Division: Until further notice, place embargo on all shipments of lumber consigned to W. H. Westall and English & Co. at Asheville, N. C., account accumulation of business for these people at Asheville." On June 16th the embargo against Westall was canceled. There was evidence tending to show: That, before and during the time of the embargo, defendant had on its yard and tracks at Asheville for Westall some 18 or 20 cars of lumber—had more than could be placed on his tracks for unloading, and they occupied other tracks. That they congested the yard and occupied cars that defendant required to move other freight on the line. The traffic in the summer of 1906 was one-third heavier than ever before. Plaintiff testified that he made several demands upon defendant's agent for a bill of lading, each of which were refused until June 20, 1906, when he gave him the bill and shipped the car. The only issue submitted to the jury was directed to the number of days which defendant refused to receive the car load of lumber. Under instructions of his honor the jury found a delay of "nine days deducting two Sundays." His honor rendered judgment for the penalty of $50 a day, imposed by the statute, amounting to $450. Defendant excepted and appealed, assigning errors set out in the opinion.

W. B. Rodman, Moore & Rollins, and R. G. Lucas, for appellant. Craig, Martin & Winston, for appellee.

CONNOR, J. The exceptions to the rulings of his honor are not very clearly stated in the record, but in the well-considered brief of defendant's counsel the questions argued before us are thus formulated: (1) Was the defendant entitled to have its reasons and excuses for not issuing the bill of lading, on demand, considered by the jury? (2) Can the plaintiff recover a penalty for each day of delay to ship without showing a daily renewal of the tender? (3) Is the statute (Revisal 1905, § 2631) void: (a) As a regulation of interstate commerce in conflict with article 1, § 8, cl. 3, of the Constitution; (b) as being in conflict with the fourteenth amendment to the federal Constitution?

In discussing the first question we are uncertain whether his honor was of the opinion that the statute imposed upon the defendant an absolute duty to receive plaintiff's lumber for shipment to Westall, and that no defense was open to it other than "the act of God or the public enemy," or whether, taking all of the evidence as true, it failed to show such a condition as excused the defendant from receiving the lumber for shipment to Westall. Having received the testimony, over plaintiff's objection, it would seem that his honor was of the opinion that no valid defense was established. As the construction of the statute has, in this and other appeals, been pressed upon our consideration, we think it well to discuss and decide it. Section 2631 provides that transportation companies "whose duty it is to receive freight for shipment" shall, for refusing to receive all freight "whenever tendered" to its agent, etc., forfeit and pay a penalty of $50 for each day it refuses to receive said freight, together with actual damages sustained. The freight must be tendered at a regular depot and within business hours. Alsop v. Express Co., 104 N. C. 278, 10 S. E. 297, 6 L. R. A. 271. It is well settled that, when statutes give new and additional remedies for the enforcement of rights and duties given or imposed by the common law, unless a contrary intention is manifested, the courts will not assume that the Legislature intended to enlarge or modify the common-law right or duty. This we think is illustrated by the decisions of this court.

In Branch v. Railroad, 77 N. C. 347, the first case in which a statute imposing a penalty upon a common carrier came before the court, it was insisted by the defendant that, although the language of the statute was imperative and contained no exonerating or excusing exceptions, it was open to the defendant to show that conditions existed which excused it from performance of the duty and liability for the penalty. The statute (Acts 1874-75, p. 322, c. 240; Code 1883, § 1967) imposed a penalty of $25 a day for "permitting freight to remain unshipped for more than five days unless otherwise agreed." Mr. Justice Rodman, in an able opinion, held that: "The act does not supersede or alter the duty or liability of the company at common law. The penalty in the case provided for is superadded. The act merely enforces an admitted duty." He further says that it was not necessary to decide whether "any excuse, short of the act of God or the king's enemies, would suffice," because "the excuse offered was insufficient." He proceeded, however, to discuss the reasons assigned for not discharging the duty, and concludes that the conditions which were shown "were brought about by its own acts in inducing large shipments from points beyond its southern terminus." The defendant was an intrastate road.

In Keeter v. Railroad, 86 N. C. 346, de-defendant showed that there was an accumulation of cars at its depot at Halifax, N. C. The court, without discussing the question, said that the excuse was insufficient, citing Branch's Case, supra. It did not appear how the conditions at Halifax were brought about. The court disposed of the question by saying that "it was the duty of defendant to provide cars for the transportation of all the freight delivered." This language indicated the opinion that the duty was absolute, and that no excuse could be heard to avoid the recovery of the penalty, when it was not discharged.

At the next term Whitehead v. Railroad, 87 N. C. 255, was before the court. The conditions urged by defendant as an excuse for failing to ship within five days were found by the superior court and set out upon the record. Plaintiff relied upon the language used in Keeter's Case, supra. Ashe, J., who wrote the opinion in this case, said: "It may be well to observe that the court did not go into the discussion of that question," because the delay did not go beyond five days. The learned and always candid justice said: "The court could not have intended to hold that there could be no excuse, when it was citing Branch's Case with approval, in which it is conceded that excuses may be admitted." After discussing the facts found by the judge, he concludes: "The delay in making the shipment, then, it seems, has not been caused by any act of negligence or default on the part of the defendant, but resulted from the concurrence of circumstances entirely beyond its control." Smith, C. J., in a concurring opinion, after citing authorities holding that exonerating conditions may be shown, says: "This seems to me a just view of the carrier's liability at common law; and the statute, as this court declares in the case cited, does not enlarge or extend the obligation, but merely provides an additional method of enforcing it." Justice Ruffin dissented from the conclusion reached in regard to the sufficiency of the conditions shown, to excuse defendant from discharging the duty, but concurred that the statute created no new duty, and that conditions could be shown in excuse. He said that the effect of the statute was not to enlarge a common-law duty, but "is intended simply to enforce an admitted duty." In regard to the conditions which would, in his opinion, be held sufficient to excuse the carrier, he says: "Nothing short of that diligence which would acquit the defendant of his common-law duty and liability should be allowed to exonerate it from the penalty prescribed by the statute."

We conclude from these decisions, sustained by reason, that when the carrier shows the existence of conditions, for which it is not responsible, preventing or rendering impossible the discharge of the duty, it will not be liable for the penalty. The principle which commends itself to us as just is thus stated by Judge Ashe: "When the facts show that, by force of circumstances for which it was in no way responsible, the carrier was disabled from performing the duty imposed by the statute, it would be unjust to punish it for failing to comply with its requirements." Keeping this principle in view, the validity of the claim for excuse or exoneration must depend very largely upon the facts in each case as they are presented. While the policy of the legislation which has for its object the enforcement of the performance of the duty to the public by transportation companies should be sustained, the statutes should be so construed and enforced as to advance the remedy and suppress the evil without, at the same time, becoming harsh, unjust, and oppressive. When a new and additional duty is imposed by the statute, we can see no reason why the same principle should not prevail. It is an elementary rule in the construction of statutes that the court will not attribute to the Legislature the intention to punish the failure to do an impossible thing. "No text imposing obligations is understood to demand impossible things." Walker v. Railroad, 137 N. C. 163, 49 S. E. 84; Stone v. Railroad, 144 N. C. 226, 56 S. E. 932. "Acts of Parliament are to be so construed as no man that is innocent or free from injury or wrong be, by a literal construction, punished or endangered." Margate Pier Co. v. Hannam, 3 Barn. & Ald. 266. The court should enforce the legislative will, as expressed in the statute, remembering "the letter killeth while the spirit giveth life."

The validity of statutes enacted for the purpose of compelling common carriers to discharge their duty to the public, by the imposition of penalties, has been in some instances, successfully attacked by reason of harsh and literal construction given them by the court. This is illustrated by the case of Houston, etc., R. R. Co. v. Mayes, 201 U. S. 321, 26 Sup. Ct. 491, 50 L. Ed. 772, strongly urged upon our attention in this and other cases. The statute of Texas, upon which that decision is based, required the carrier, upon demand, to furnish cars. No excuse was named in the statute other "than strikes or other public calamities." The Texas court held that the duty was imperative, and no other excuse than that named in the statute could be heard for failure to comply with the demand for cars. The validity of the statute was called into question upon a writ of error from the Supreme Court of the United States. It was insisted that the statute violated the commerce clause of the Constitution, as is contended by defendant in this case. Justice Brown said: "An absolute requirement that a railroad shall furnish a certain number of cars on a specified day regardless of every consideration, except strikes and other public calamities, transcends the police powers of the state and amounts to a burden upon interstate commerce." In Texas, etc., R. R. v. Loving, 98 S. W. 451, the Court of Civil Appeals held that the duty imposed by the statute was imperative. This court has never so held. The principle announced in Branch's Case, supra, and approved in the other cases cited, has never been called into question. In Stone's Case, supra, we said: "We should be slow to find in the language of a statute the imposition of a penalty for the omission to perform a duty, the standard of which is fixed by the law, which did not, either in terms or by necessary intendment, except from its operation causes which a high degree of foresight and precaution could not anticipate or prevent." In Alsop v. Express Co., 104 N. C. 278, 10 S. E. 297, 6 L. R. A. 271, it was held, in an able and well-sustained opinion by Mr. Justice Avery, that Acts 1879, p. 840, c. 182 (Revisal 1905, § 2631), enlarged the common-law duty of common carriers to receive all freight tendered them for shipment by requiring them to do so "whenever tendered." In other words, the statute prescribes what is the reasonable time within which they must perform the duty—receive the freight. It must be tendered at a regular depot and during business hours. Alsop's Case, supra. While, both at common law and with the superadded duty imposed by the statute, the carrier must receive the freight whenever tendered, yet, upon the authority of the cases cited, if it is shown that by reason of controlling conditions for which the carrier is not responsible, such as the destruction by fire of warehouses, wharfs, platforms, tracks, etc., before a reasonable time to rebuild has elapsed or the unexpected tendering of an extraordinary quantity of freight at a depot and probably other unforeseen causes, the duty cannot be performed, it would not be liable for the penalty.

It is not practicable, in the discussion of this appeal, to do more than apply these general principles to the facts in the case. This brings us to a consideration of the defense offered by defendant as an excuse for not receiving plaintiff's freight. Do they establish, or tend to establish, any valid, legal excuse? While plaintiff was permitted to place the lumber on the car at Black Mountain, it is conceded that defendant refused to receive it for shipment or to issue a bill of lading for it. This was a refusal to receive. Twitty v. Railroad, 141 N. C. 355, 53 S. E. 957. It is not suggested that any conditions existed at Black Mountain which prevented defendant from receiving for shipment all freight tendered, or that it did not have the necessary cars for the purpose of transporting, or that the track was obstructed. For any and all other persons, except Westall and English & Co., the defendant was ready and able to perform its duty to receive freight for shipment. It will be observed that the plaintiff had contracted to sell the lumber and deliver to Westall f. o. b. Hence the defendant, upon receipt of the lumber, would have owed no further duty to plaintiff. For any delay in transporting and delivering, within a reasonable time, as prescribed by the statute, defendant would have been liable to Westall. The defense, then, comes to this: Conditions at Asheville to which Westall contributed, by failing to unload and remove freight consigned to him, congested defendant's yards and tracks, kept cars "tied up," and prevented it from discharging its duty to other members of the public, who might demand its services.

We do not think that these conditions excused defendant from performing its duty to plaintiff at Black Mountain. If, on account of the conditions existing at Asheville, the cars could not be carried there and unloaded, the defendant should have provided reasonable facilities for caring for the freight at Black Mountain, until it could transport it. It will be observed that the duty to receive freight is confined to such as is "of the nature and kind received" by such carrier. This relieves the defendant from all unreasonable demands in respect to the character of freight which may be tendered. When it is remembered that, in addition to these protective provisions, the defense is open to the carrier that unforeseen, unexpected conditions not to be anticipated may be successfully urged as a defense, we do not perceive that any harsh or oppressive measure of duty is imposed upon the carrier. In the case of Houston R. R. v. Mayes, supra, so strongly urged upon our attention by counsel, Justice Brown says that there is much to be said in favor of laws compelling railroads to furnish adequate facilities for the transportation of both freight and passengers, etc. We entirely concur with the learned judge, when he further says: "While railroad companies may be bound to furnish sufficient cars for their usual and ordinary traffic, cases will inevitably arise when, by reason of an unexpected turn in the market, a great public gathering, or an unforeseen rush of travel or pressure upon the road for transportation facilities may arise which good management and a desire to fulfill all its legal requirements cannot provide for." None of the conditions which are suggested are presented in this case, so far as receiving the freight is concerned. It was tendered at the proper place, at the proper time, was of the nature and kind which defendant shipped, the cars necessary for receiving were at the depot, and there was no obstruction of the track or shortage of motive power or labor. The only reason assigned was that Westall, by refusing to unload cars consigned to him at Asheville, contributed to the congestion of the yard and tracks at Asheville; in other words, defendant refused to discharge its duty to plaintiff because Westall refused to discharge his duty to defendant at Asheville. We cannot think this a valid excuse. We do not intimate that defendant has any right to issue an embargo upon one or more of its customers or patrons and refuse to carry or receive any freight for him. To permit this to be done would empower the carrier to discriminate not only against him, but against other persons from dealing with him.

It is a fundamental principle of the common law, enforced by statutes and made indictable in this state, for a common carrier to unjustly discriminate between members of the public. Revisal 1905, § 3749. It must serve all alike under the same circumstances. The purpose of the law is the "prevention of unjust discrimination, or, to put the proposition affirmatively, to secure to every person constituting a part of the public an equal and impartial participation in the use of the facilities which the carrier is capable of affording and which it is its duty to afford." Lumber Co. v. Railroad, 141 N. C. 171, 53 S. E. 823, 6 L. R. A. (N. S.) 225. Mr. Justice Brewer, in Mo. Pac. Ry. Co. v. Lumber Mills, 211 U. S. 612, 29 Sup. Ct. 214, 53 L. Ed. —, says: "While no one is compelled to engage in the business of a common carrier, yet when he does so certain duties are imposed which can be enforced by mandamus or other suitable remedy. The Missouri Pacific engaged in the business of transferring cars from the Santa Fé track to industries located at Stratford, and continued to do so for all parties except the mill company. So long as it engaged in such transfer, it was bound to treat all industries at Stratford alike, and could not refuse to do for one that which it was doing for others. No legislative enactment, no special mandate from any commission, or other administrative board was necessary, for the duty arose from the fact that it was a common carrier. This lies at the foundation of the law of common carriers." After further discussion the learned justice concludes: "Indeed all these questions are disposed of by one well-established proposition, and that is that a party engaging in the business of a common carrier is bound to treat all shippers alike and can be compelled to do so by mandamus or other proper writ." In no possible form can this fundamental truth be evaded. It is a "thing fixed" in the common law, enforced by both common-law and statutory remedies, its violation denounced as criminal and subjected to severe punishment. We cannot permit any departure from it, however persuasive the reasons assigned may be for doing so.

On the other hand, we do not wish to be understood as intimating that one or more patrons of a common carrier may, by refusing or failing to receive freight consigned to him, so monopolize the car tracks, etc., as to prevent or interfere with it in the discharge of its duty to the public. The statutes enacted for the enforcement of the duties of common carriers, imposing penalties, are not intended to simply penalize railroads, but to secure prompt, efficient service to all, and not a favored few. The patrons owe duties to carriers and to other patrons. Reasonable rules and regulations may be made either by the railroads or the Corporation Commission to enforce these relative rights and duties. The evidence shows that at a time when all of the railroads and the people were confronted with an unusual condition in regard to the transportation of freight, Westall permitted 18 or 20 cars loaded with lumber to stand upon the defendant's tracks at Asheville. How far this conduct would have been a valid defense to an action brought by him for penalties for failing to transport and deliver freight is not presented in this case. The Corporation Commission has made rules and imposed penalties for their enforcement in regard to unloading cars. If they are not sufficiently stringent, and the penalties are not sufficiently large to protect the roads and their patrons from congested yards and tracks, we have no doubt the commission will make them so. We cannot weaken the principles of the common law founded in wisdom and justified by experience, nor construe away the plain provisions of statutes to accomplish this end. If the enforcement of these statutes in some instances work hard results, the appeal must be made to the General Assembly for their modification. We cannot think it improper to express the hope that a clear recognition by those who manage railroads and by those who use them of their respective rights and duties will remove much of the friction which has resulted in the statutes enacted by our Legislature.

The defendant next urges that the penalty of $50 for each day the said company refuses to receive said shipment can be recovered only when a tender is made on each day. We cannot concur in this view. The plaintiff hauled his lumber to the defendant's regular depot and, with its consent, placed it upon the car, demanding a bill of lading, which was refused. Plaintiff says that he went to the agent two or three times and asked if he had shipped it, and he said that he had not. He wanted plaintiff to unload the car, which he refused to do. The agent said that he was holding the car at plaintiff's expense. Plaintiff explains how, by reason of the refusal to ship the lumber, he was compelled to cancel other orders which he had accepted from Westall, was compelled to stop sawing, his only occupation, etc. To require the plaintiff to haul the lumber home and return it to the depot each day, or to go through the empty form of making a constructive tender, imposes either an unwarranted hardship, or savors of trifling with a man's substantial rights. The plaintiff left the lumber on the car with a standing tender and demand that it be shipped. This was well understood by the defendant's agent when, on June 18, 1906, without any other reason than that the embargo was raised, he shipped it. It is not shown that conditions at Asheville had changed on that day. If plaintiff had removed his lumber on the refusal to ship—hailed it away—of course, he could claim only for the day when it was tendered; but he made his "tender good" each day and at all hours of the day. The statute would be of little value as a remedy for an existing evil if the narrow construction is given it as contended by defendant. The Legislature evidently intended to impose a penalty for each day upon which the freight was at the depot ready for shipment. If the freight tendered were bales of cotton, hogsheads of tobacco, or other heavy, bulky articles, it would be impracticable to haul and rehaul it to defendant's depot each day. While penal statutes are to be construed strictly as against the party against whom they are enforced, they are not to be so construed as to make them of no force and effect. Upon the defendant's evidence the tender was made on June 7th, and kept good until the lumber was shipped on June 18th. Each day's delay in shipping was "a refusal to ship" within the meaning of the statute.

Defendant contends that the statute is a regulation of interstate commerce and violates the Constitution of the United States. The proposition is founded upon the decision in Houston R. R. Co. v. Mayes, supra. In that case the demand was for cars to ship cattle beyond the state. Here the point from which the lumber was to be shipped and its destination were both within the state. Defendant's contention is that, while this is true, as it is an interstate road, engaged in interstate commerce, if it is compelled to receive all freight whenever tendered, it will be prevented from discharging its duty to its patrons engaged in interstate commerce. To state the contention in the words of defendant's brief: "The statute, if enforced, would interfere with interstate commerce, in that it would require the defendant under heavy penalties, excessive and unreasonable, to give preference to intrastate shipments." The contention is also made that "the statute in terms includes freight tendered for both interstate and intrastate shipments," and that this court has, in several cases, applied this and similar statutes to interstate shipments.

Passing the question whether, in the absence of any suggestion that to receive plaintiff's lumber when tendered, in the slightest degree interfered with the duty of defendant to its interstate business, it is in a position to raise the question in this appeal, we think it well to examine the contention and decide it. St. George v. Hardie, 147 N. C. 88, 60 S. E. 920. In Mayes' Case we find that, after holding that, as construed by the Supreme Court of Texas, the statute was imperative, making no allowance for defenses, it "transcended the police power of the state and amounted to a burden upon interstate commerce," the opinion concludes: "We think that sufficient allowance is not made for the practical difficulties in the administration of the law, and that, as applied to interstate commerce, it transcends the legitimate power of the Legislature." We hold that, upon well-settled rules of construction, proper allowance is made for the difficulties suggested by Judge Brown. In this case the statute is not applied to interstate commerce. The case of Mo. Pac. Ry. v. Larrabee Mills, supra, is instructive upon the question presented here. There, the mill company applied to the Supreme Court of Kansas for an alternative writ of mandamus compelling the railway company to make provisions for the transfer of cars between the lines of the Santa Fé company and the mill and elevators of the plaintiff. Mr. Justice Brewer thus states the contention involving the question presented in this appeal: "The Missouri Pacific and the Santa Fé Railroads are common carriers, engaged in interstate commerce and, as such, are subject to the control of Congress and therefore, in those respects, not amenable to the power of the state. It appears from the findings that about three-fifths of the flour of the mill company is shipped out of the state, while the other two-fifths are shipped to points within the state. In addition, the hauling of the empty cars from the Santa Fé track to the mill was, if commerce at all, commerce within the state. The roads are therefore engaged in both interstate commerce and that within the state. In the former they are subject to the regulation of Congress, in the latter to that of the state, and to enforce the proper relation between Congress and the state the full control of each over the commerce subject to its dominion must be preserved. How the separateness of control is to be accomplished it is unnecessary to determine. Its existence is recognized in the first section of the interstate commerce act (Act June 29, 1906, c. 3591, 34 Stat. 584 [U. S. Comp. St. Supp. 1907, p. 892]): 'That the provisions of this act shall not apply to the transportation of passengers or property or to the receiving, delivering, storage or handling of property wholly within one state, and not shipped to or from a foreign country, from or to any state or territory as aforesaid.'" The following language is quoted with approval from the opinion of Mr. Justice Brown in Cleveland Ry. Co. v. Illinois, 177 U. S. 514, 20 Sup. Ct. 722, 44 L. Ed. 868: "Few classes of cases have become more common of recent years than those wherein the police power of the state over the vehicles of interstate commerce has been drawn in question. That such power exists and will be enforced, notwithstanding the constitutional authority of Congress to regulate such commerce, is evident from the large number of cases in which we have sustained the validity of local laws designed to secure the safety and comfort of passengers, employes, persons crossing railway tracks, and adjacent property owners, as well as other regulations intended for the public good." A number of cases are cited in which state laws, such as those requiring engineers to be examined with respect to their ability to distinguish colors. Railway v. Alabama, 128 U. S. 96, 9 Sup. Ct. 28, 32 L. Ed. 352, requiring telegraph companies to receive dispatches, to transmit and deliver them with due diligence as applied to messages outside the state. Western Union Tel. Co. v. James, 162 U. S. 650, 16 Sup. Ct. 934, 40 L. Ed. 1105, forbidding running freight trains on Sunday. Hennington v. Georgia, 163 U. S. 299, 16 Sup. Ct. 1066, 41 L. Ed. 166, requiring railway companies to fix their rates annually for the transmission of passengers and freight, and to post a printed copy at stations. Railway Co. v. Fuller, 17 Wall. 560, 21 L. Ed. 710, regulating the heating of passenger cars and directing guards and guard posts to be placed on bridges and trestles. N. Y., N. H., etc., R. R. v. New York, 185 U. S. 628, 17 Sup. Ct. 418, 41 L. Ed. 853, and others, in regard to which it is said: "In none of these cases was it thought that the regulations were unreasonable or operated in any just sense as a restriction upon interstate commerce." Mr. Justice Hoke, in Morris v. Express Co., 146 N. C. 167, 59 S. E. 667, 15 L. R. A. (N. S.) 983, has discussed the same question as it applies to section 2634, Revisal 1905, citing the same line of authorities. In that section the penalty is imposed for failing to adjust and pay a valid claim for damages sustained to goods shipped from another state. See, also, Porter v. Railroad, 63 S. C. 169, 41 S. E. 108, 90 Am. St. Rep. 670.

Without extending this discussion further, we find in the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States the principle uniformly announced and enforced that, "until specific action by Congress or the commission, the control of the state over these incidental matters remains undisturbed." It is not claimed that either Congress directly, or through the Interstate Commerce Commission, has enacted any statute or made any rule with which the statute conflicts or interferes. Of course, neither has any power, by statute or rule, to enforce the duty of carriers to receive or transport all interstate shipments. Hence it must follow that, if the state cannot do so because possibly its enforcement may indirectly affect interstate commerce, they may receive and transport such freight at such times as suits their convenience or pleasure free from any control whatever. It would work a strange result if the state has lost so essential an element of her police power without surrendering it to the federal government; that it is not lodged in either government. It is not denied that the state must exercise the police power in subordination to the power which she has conferred upon the federal government to regulate interstate commerce, and all statutes are to be construed and applied in the light of this fact. The law in this respect, is thus stated by Justice Matthews in Smith v. Alabama, 124 U. S. 465, 8 Sup. Ct. 564, 31 L. Ed. 508: "There are many cases where the acknowledged powers of a state may be exerted and applied in such a manner as to affect foreign or interstate commerce without being intended to operate as commercial regulations. If their operation and application in such cases regulate such commerce, so as to conflict with the regulation of the same subject by Congress, either as expressed in positive laws, or implied from the absence of legislation, such legislation on the part of the state, to the extent of that conflict, must be regarded as annulled. * * * A carrier exercising his calling within a particular state, although engaged in interstate commerce, is answerable according to the laws of the state for acts of nonfeasance or misfeasance committed within its limits. If he fail to deliver goods to the proper consignee at the right time or place, he is liable in an action for damages under the laws of the state in its courts; or if, by negligence in transportation, he inflicts injury upon the person of a passenger brought from another state, a right of action is given him by the local laws. In neither case would it be a defense that the law, giving him the right to redress, was void as being an unconstitutional regulation of commerce by the state. If it is competent for the state to administer justice according to its own laws for wrongs done and injuries suffered, when committed and inflicted by defendants while engaged in the business of interstate or foreign commerce, notwithstanding the power over those subjects conferred upon Congress by the Constitution, what is there to forbid the state, in the further exercise of the same jurisdiction, to prescribe the precautions and safeguards foreseen to be necessary and proper to prevent, by anticipation, those wrongs and injuries which, after they have been inflicted, it is admitted the state has the power to redress and punish." Sherlock v. Alling, 93 U. S. 99, 23 L. Ed. 819; Plumley v. Mass. 155 U. S. 461, 15 Sup. Ct. 154, 39 L. Ed. 223. In Louisville & N. R. R. v. Kentucky, 161 U. S. 702, 16 Sup. Ct. 724, 40 L. Ed. 849, it is said: "It has never been supposed that the dominant power of Congress over interstate commerce took from the states the power of legislation with respect to the instruments of such commerce, so far as the legislation was within its ordinary police powers." Discussing the same objection to a statute enacted by the Legislature in Ohio requiring a road engaged in interstate commerce to run three trains a day each way, and to stop at a certain class of stations, Justice Harlan, in an able and vigorous opinion, said: "We perceive, in the legislation of Ohio, no basis for the contention that the state has invaded the domain of national authority or impaired any right secured by the national Constitution. * * *

The state of Ohio, by the statute in question, has done nothing more than to so regulate the use of a public highway, established and maintained under its authority, as will reasonably promote the public convenience. It has not unreasonably obstructed freedom of commerce among the states. Its regulations apply equally to domestic and interstate railroads. Its statute is not directed against interstate commerce, but only incidentally affects it." Calvert on Interstate Com. 159.

It is said that we have held that the statute applies to interstate shipments. In Bagg v. Railroad, 109 N. C. 279, 14 S. E. 79, 14 L. R. A. 596, 26 Am. St. Rep. 569, it was held that the statute of 1874-75 (section 1967, Code 1883) applied to an interstate shipment because it was in aid of commerce. The discussion by Mr. Justice Avery is full and satisfactory. Currie's Case, 135 N. C. 535, 47 S. E. 654, was decided upon the authority of Bagg's Case. Walker's Case, 137 N. C. 163, 49 S. E. 84, and Twitty's Case, 141 N. C. 355, 53 S. E. 957, were intrastate shipments. In Harrell's Case, 144 N. C. 532, 57 S. E. 383, the transportation was completed, and the action was for the recovery of the penalty for refusing to deliver freight. Revisal 1905, § 2633. In Reid v. Railroad, 149 N. C. 423, 63 S. E. 112, the shipment was beyond the limits of the state. We do not think that, in the light of the authorities, it is material whether the shipment is interstate or, as in this case, intrastate. We do not doubt that if in either case it was shown that the enforcement of the statute interfered with, or prevented, the carrier from discharging its duties in regard to interstate commerce, or meeting any demand imposed upon it by an act of Congress, or a rule of the Corporation Commission, such condition would constitute a valid defense to an action for the penalty imposed by the statute. This result does not invalidate the statute, but affects its enforcement by introducing an additional excuse for nonperformance. We do not understand how the enforcement of the statute gives preference to intrastate shipments. The construction which we have given it has the opposite result. What was said in Branch's Case, supra, applies only to an intrastate road which did not come under the control of Congress or its agencies. After an anxious consideration of the very full briefs and the authorities cited, we are unable to concur with the defendant that the enforcement of the statute regulates or interferes with interstate commerce; nor do we see how, under the conditions existing at Asheville, N. C., the receipt for shipment of plaintiff's lumber at Black Mountain, N. C., could directly or indirectly affect its duty to the public as an interstate carrier.

But defendant urges that the statute is harsh and oppressive, takes its property without due process of law, and therefore violates the fourteenth amendment. The power of the state to impose penalties upon carriers for failure to discharge public duties is not denied. Branch's Case, supra; Stone v. Railroad, supra. The same contention was made in Minn. & St. L. R. R. v. Emmons, 149 U. S. 364, 13 Sup. Ct. 870, 37 L. Ed. 769, to an action based upon a statute requiring railroads to maintain fences and for a failure to do so subjecting them, in case of litigation, to triple damages. The court said: "The answer to this is that there is no inhibition upon a state to impose such penalties for disregard of its police regulations as will insure prompt obedience to their requirements, * * * and the extent of the penalties which should be imposed by the state for any disregard of its legislation in that respect is a matter entirely within its control. It was not essential that the penalty should be confined to damages for the actual loss to the owner of cattle injured by the want of fences and guards." Speaking for myself, I do not doubt that, under the constitutional prohibition against the imposition of excessive fines and cruel and unusual punishments, as well as the protective provisions of the state and federal Constitutions securing life and property against governmental invasion, except by the "law of the land," the court has the power, and in a clear case it would be its duty, to declare invalid a statute imposing penalties so enormous in amount and out of proportion to the gravity of the offense and its effect upon private and public interest, as to come within the inhibition of the Constitution. I could never assent to the proposition that, by legislative enactment, a person, either natural or corporate, could be destroyed, and its property taken by the imposition of excessive and unusual penalties, leaving no power of prevention in the judicial department of the government. I think that the correct limitation upon legislation of this character is stated by Mr. Justice Peckham in Ex parte Young, 209 U. S. 123, 28 Sup. Ct. 441, 52 L. Ed. 714, 13 L. R. A. (N. S.) 932. If the penalties are so enormous that the person upon whom they are imposed is prevented from resorting to the courts to determine the validity of the statute—that is, that an unsuccessful effort to do so would work their destruction—they are invalid. No such result could follow the enforcement of the statute under consideration. While it may be that, in some cases, the penalty imposed may be large as compared with the value of the property involved, or the actual damage sustained, yet as, in the case before us, the refusal to receive freight may work serious injury, destructive of the business of the party aggrieved. The plaintiff was engaged in operating a sawmill, cutting and selling lumber for sale in other markets. He had contracted to sell to Westall other car loads of lumber, which by reason of the refusal of the defendant to receive for shipment Westall refused to take. He "had to shut down his mill for months." It is not difficult to see what disastrous results would naturally follow to plaintiff from the refusal of defendant to discharge its duty, and yet in an action for damages it would be difficult for him to recover full compensation for such injury. It is to compel obedience to its manifest duty and protect the public from just such results that penalties are imposed upon the carrier.

We do not find in the amount of the penalty any ground for questioning the validity of the statute as violating any provision of either the state or federal Constitution. In regard to the remedy prescribed for its enforcement, every legal right of the defendant is safeguarded. The penalty can be recovered only by an action in a court of competent jurisdiction, in which trial by jury, regular procedure, and the right to appeal is secured. The statutory presumptions are made to relieve the plaintiff from proving his case. It may be, and doubtless is, sometimes difficult for those engaged in the management of railroads to meet and discharge all of the duties imposed upon them. We venture to hope that, with a clear understanding of the relative rights and duties of carriers and the public, more satisfactory business relations will prevail.

We have discussed the questions presented upon this record at more than usual length because several appeals are pending in the court in which they are involved.

Upon a careful consideration of the entire record, we find no error.

WAMPUM COTTON MILLS v. CAROLINA & N. W. RY. CO.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. May 5, 1909.)

1. CARRIERS (§ 20*)—REGULATION—PENALTIES—"TENDER."

To entitle a shipper to the statutory penalty for refusal to receive freight for shipment, it is not enough to constitute a tender that he place the freight on the carrier's platform merely as a matter of convenience, but he must tender it for shipment, and simply asking the agent when the freight can be shipped is not a tender, but there must be an actual tender, though it is not essential that any particular language be used, but it is sufficient if the language amount in common understanding to a tender and refusal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Dec. Dig. § 20.*]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 8, pp. 6910, 6911.]

2. CARRIERS (§ 20*)—REGULATION—PENALTIES—QUESTION FOR JURY.

Evidence held to present a question for the jury as to the sufficiency of a shipper's daily tender of freight to a carrier to entitle him to the statutory penalty for failure to receive the freight for shipment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Dec. Dig. § 20.*]

3. CARRIERS (§ 20*)—REGULATION—TENDER.

To entitle a shipper daily to the statutory penalty for failure to receive freight for shipment, there must have been a tender and refusal each day.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Dec. Dig. § 20.*]

Clark, C. J., dissenting.

Appeal from Superior Court, Lincoln County; Justice, Judge.

Action by the Wampum Cotton Mills against the Carolina & Northwestern Railway Company. From a judgment for $100 for plaintiff, it appeals. No error.

See, also, 64 S. E. 588.

Plaintiff sued for a penalty of $50 a day for 72 days, alleging that defendant refused, on each day, to receive freight tendered for shipment. The evidence tended to show that plaintiff deposited on the defendant's platform, the usual place for receiving freight, 25 bales of cotton waste and tendered it to defendant's agent for shipment, which was refused. The bales were left on the platform. Plaintiff's president says: "Later on I called to see the agent from time to time as I was passing from my place of business. Every day or two I stopped to see whether or not he was in a position to ship the waste, and he said he was not," etc. Mr. Carter, defendant's agent at Lincolnton, after testifying in regard to the transaction substantially as the president of plaintiff company, said: "After that Mr. Abernathy made a further tender of this shipment of waste, once that I remember. That was some little time after. I could not give the exact date. It was along the latter part of March or first of April. * * * He told me he would tender it to me again for shipment." His honor instructed the jury: That it was not enough to constitute a tender that the plaintiff placed the freight on defendant's platform merely as a matter of convenience, but that it must tender it for shipment; that simply asking the agent when the freight could be shipped was not a tender; that the president must have made an actual tender and the defendant a refusal to entitle plaintiff to the penalty; that it was not essential that any particular language be used to constitute a tender and refusal; but that, if such language was used as "amounted in common understanding" to a tender and refusal, that would be sufficient. The plaintiff excepted. Plaintiff tendered a number of prayers for special instructions not necessary to set out. The jury answered the third issue, "Two days," and the fourth, "$100." Judgment was rendered upon the verdict. Plaintiff excepted and appealed.

A. L. Quickel, for appellant. O. F. Mason, O. E. Childs, and J. H. Marion, for appellee.

CONNOR, J. The evidence left the question of the status of the freight, after the first tender and refusal, in doubt. It seems that the freight was placed upon the defendant's platform in accordance with a custom, but without any express contract with defendant. After completing the number of bales constituting a car load, the president tendered it to the agent for shipment, which was refused. The freight remained on the platform, and the president of plaintiff company frequently talked with the agent about shipping. There is evidence that some 30 days after the tender he made a second tender. In Garrison's Case (at this term) 64 S. E. 578, it was conceded that defendant furnished the car upon which plaintiff loaded the lumber, and it remained on the car until shipped. There the facts were conceded. We concur with his honor's instruction to the jury. The status of the freight was uncertain. This is shown by the conduct of the parties. It was therefore a question for the jury and was properly left to them. If the plaintiff wished to insist upon a daily tender and refusal, its president should have made it clear to defendant's agent that he was keeping the tender good. We cannot undertake to do more than dispose of each case as it arises in regard to what constitutes a tender and refusal. When the conduct and language of the parties leaves the matter in doubt, it must be submitted to the jury. His honor correctly told the jury that they must find that there was a tender and refusal each day.

Upon an examination of the entire record and the charge of the court, we find no error.

CLARK, C. J. (dissenting). Concurring entirely in the opinion in the defendant's appeal in this case, I must dissent from the conclusion reached in the plaintiff's appeal.

The court should have instructed the jury that if they believed the evidence to find a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for the penalty prescribed by the law for 72 days. The evidence is uncontradicted that the plaintiff placed on the defendant's platform, the usual place for receiving freight, 25 bales of cotton waste and tendered it to the defendant's agent for shipment, which was refused. The bales were left on the platform. The plaintiff's chief officer called to see the defendant's agent every day or two thereafter to learn if he was ready to ship the waste, and he said he was not. The law of tender is as old as the hills and as well settled. When one tenders money, for instance, it is not necessary to tender it again every day. It is sufficient if it is "kept good." Here the tender was made and kept good. The cotton remained on defendant's platform, a standing tender, irrespective of the constant reminder by the plaintiff's agent. The statute makes, and was intended to make, the common carrier liable for every day that he thus refuses to accept freight. The people of this country make, and have a right to make, its laws. The business interests of the country, great and small, are absolutely at the mercy of the railroads, and can be destroyed at will, unless these great common carriers are subject to public regulations. Experience having demonstrated that the common-law remedy by damages is not always adequate where common carriers refuse to receive freight when tendered, or fail to ship and transport in a reasonable time, the people have enacted through their Legislature that in such cases a prescribed penalty, in nature of liquidated damages, shall be recovered by the "party aggrieved." If such penalty is high in this case, it is because the defendant persisted in its violation of law. The courts have no choice but to obey the law themselves. For 72 days the plaintiff's bales stood on defendant's platform awaiting shipment. The bales had been tendered for shipment and refused. For 71 more days they stood on that platform awaiting shipment. Every day the defendant's agent saw them and knew they were there for shipment, besides being constantly reminded by the plaintiff's officer. Every day the bales remained there, the defendant's agent knew they were a standing tender, and his not shipping them was a refusal, for "actions speak louder than words." Pierson v. Telegraph Co. (at this term) 64 S. E. 577. Had the defendant's agent each day said, "I will ship them," and then did not ship, could it be said that in fact he did not refuse, and therefore the defendant would not be liable? Such construction would but be trifling with the law.

The law says that for each day the carrier refused to ship the plaintiff was entitled to recover $50. The Legislature thought this penalty necessary to compel respect for the rights of shippers. The evidence being uncontradicted, the court should have told the jury that, if they believed it, they should return a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for 72 days at $50 per day. When the law is enforced, it will be respected and obeyed.

WAMPUM COTTON MILLS v. CAROLINA & N. W. RY. CO.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. May 5, 1909.)

1. CARRIERS (§ 20*) — REGULATION — PENALTIES—EXCUSES.

That a connecting carrier refuses to receive freight for a certain consignee does not relieve the initial carrier from liability for the penalty imposed by Revisal, § 2631, for refusal to receive freight.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Dec. Dig. § 20.*]

2. CARRIERS (§ 20*) — REGULATION — PENALTIES.

That a shipper asked for a bill of lading to a point on a connecting line does not relieve the carrier from liability for the penalty imposed by Revisal, § 2631, for refusal to receive the freight for shipment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Dec. Dig. § 20.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Lincoln County; Justice, Judge.

See, also, 64 S. E. 586.

Action for recovery of penalty for failing to receive goods for shipment. The facts, as stated in defendant's brief, are: Defendant is a common carrier, with track and equipment running from Lenoir, N. C., to Chester, S. C., through Lincolnton, N. C., intersecting with the Southern Railway at Gastonia, N. C.; both roads using the same depot, the property of the Southern. The Southern runs from Gastonia to Charlotte, N. C. Defendant receives freight for shipment to Charlotte, delivering to Southern at Gastonia. The Seaboard Air Line Railway runs from Lincolnton to Charlotte. Defendant and Seaboard use at Lincolnton a depot in common. On March 6, 1907, B. G. Fallis, superintendent of the Southern Railway at Charlotte, sent the following notice to the general manager of defendant company at Chester: "Until further notice, we will not accept any cotton waste from your road consigned to the South Atlantic Waste Company, Charlotte, N. C. Please be governed accordingly." This embargo was raised May 20, 1907, and then only as to three cars per day from defendant. On March 11, 1907, plaintiff tendered to defendant company at Lincolnton, N. C., 25 bales (one car load) of cotton waste for shipment to the South Atlantic Waste Company, Charlotte, N. C. The agent of defendant declined to receive this shipment, assigning as a reason that he had instructions from his company not to receive it because of embargo against South Atlantic Waste Company. Thirty days later the agent of defendant company offered to issue a bill of lading to plaintiff "Subject to delay on account of embargo at Gastonia." The plaintiff declined to accept this proposition and suggested to defendant's agent to carry the waste to Gastonia and tender it to the Southern. There is evidence tending to show that it would not have been received by the Southern at Gastonia. There was evidence tending to show that defendant's manager and officers made several efforts to induce the Southern Railway Company to accept this particular shipment, but in each instance was notified that the Southern would, under no circumstances, accept the shipment. A request was also made to the Seaboard Company and refused. There was no contention that the defendant did not have room to store and care for the freight at Lincolnton, nor that it did not have motive power and cars sufficient to carry it to Gastonia. There was evidence that the tracks and yards of the Southern at Gastonia were congested. His honor was of the opinion that the statute (section 2631, Revisal 1905) made it the duty of the defendant to receive the freight for shipment, carry it to Gastonia, and tender it to the Southern Railway Company, and that the embargo placed upon shipments to the waste company was not a legal excuse for defendant's refusal to receive it for shipment at Lincolnton and so instructed the jury. Defendant excepted. There was a verdict and judgment for plaintiff. Defendant excepted and appealed.

O. F. Mason, C. E. Childs, and J. H. Marion, for appellant. A. L. Quickel, for appellee.

CONNOR, J. This action is prosecuted for the recovery of the penalty imposed by section 2631, Revisal 1905, for refusing to receive for shipment freight tendered defendant at Lincolnton, N. C., to be transported to Charlotte, N. C. We have discussed and decided many of the questions presented and argued upon this record in Garrison v. Railroad (at this term) 64 S. E. 578. As we then endeavored to point out, there is no question of transportation and delivery involved in this case. The sole question is whether the reasons assigned by defendant for refusing to receive for shipment constitute a legal excuse. There is no suggestion that the defendant's warehouse at Lincolnton was insufficient to care for the freight until it could be shipped, or that defendant did not have the cars, motive power, and other facilities for carrying the freight to Gastonia and tendering it to the Southern Railway. Defendant's agent says that it could have been handled as far as Gastonia. It was clearly its duty to comply with the requirement of the statute by receiving for shipment and throwing upon the Southern the responsibility for failing to perform its duty at Gastonia. The fact that the Southern maintained an embargo upon shipments to the waste company at Charlotte could not excuse the defendant from discharging its duty at Lincolnton. We have no doubt that the defendant's officers and agents acted in good faith in endeavoring to induce the Southern to promise to take the freight at Gastonia, but this did not measure up to the standard of its common-law or statutory duty. It should have received the freight, carried it to Gastonia, and then tendered it to the Southern. If, by simply ordering an embargo against one of its customers at Charlotte, the Southern could paralyze all of the connecting roads and relieve them from the duty to receive shipments to such person, the common law would fail, and the statutes passed to enforce the public duty be of no avail—one company could destroy the business of any person or corporation, starve it out of existence, bankrupt it by ordering an embargo and notifying all other roads that it would not receive freight for the person selected as the subject for discrimination. Each company must discharge its duty and cast the responsibility for refusing upon the one which is derelict.

There is no question of interstate commerce involved in this case. It is immaterial that plaintiff asked for a bill of lading to Charlotte. If defendant had received the freight for shipment to Gastonia, its terminus for Charlotte freight, or offered to do so, it would have met and discharged the duty imposed upon it. This it failed to do, but, 30 days after refusing to receive the freight, offered a bill of lading containing a provision which would have deprived plaintiff of any redress against the Southern if it had refused to receive at Gastonia. The defendant company was placed, by the action of the Southern, in an embarrassing position. We are not able to understand, upon the evidence, why the Southern selected the Carolina Waste Company of Charlotte as the subject of its embargo for more than two months. It is true that there is evidence that the general demand upon its capacity for transporting freight was very heavy, and that a large number of unloaded cars were on its tracks and yards at Charlotte and Gastonia; but this certainly does not justify it in imposing upon one manufacturing plant an embargo for 72 days, cutting off its supply of raw material not only over its own line, but from its connecting lines. If this can be done with impunity, the power of control and regulation, so essential to the protection of the right of all persons complying with the law to be served without discrimination, would be of but little value. We concur with his honor that it was the duty of defendant to receive the freight for shipment and cast upon the Southern the responsibility of discharging its duty. It elected to obey the Southern Railroad Company, rather than the law. The fact that the discharge of its duty to the plaintiff would have imposed the liabilities of a common carrier is no excuse for refusing to do so. It is given by the state the franchise and the right to do business as a common carrier, in consideration of its assuming and performing the duties incident to the business.

Upon a careful examination of the entire record, we are of the opinion that his honor correctly instructed the jury. There is no error.

CRAWFORD v. SOUTHERN RY. CO.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. May 13, 1909.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 243*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—DISOBEDIENCE OF RULES—PROXIMATE CAUSE.

Where an injury to a servant is occasioned by his disobedience to the orders of the master, such disobedience bars a recovery.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 759-775; Dec. Dig. § 243.*]

2. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 243*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—DISOBEDIENCE OF ORDERS.

Where a brakeman in the habit of jumping on the pilot of an engine, in violation of a rule forbidding it, is given specific and repeated instructions not to do so, there can be no recovery for his death resulting from his jumping on the pilot of the engine while in motion, though the pilot step was defective, and though the rule had been generally disobeyed, since in view of specific instructions no question of abrogation of rules could arise.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 759-775; Dec. Dig. § 243.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, McDowell County; Adams, Judge.

Action by Lee P. Crawford, administrator, against the Southern Railway Company, for death of his decedent. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed, and new trial ordered.

These issues were submitted: "(1) Did the negligence of the defendant cause the death of the plaintiff's intestate as alleged in the complaint? Ans. Yes. (2) Did Bob Lytle by his own negligence contribute to his injury as alleged in the answer? Ans. No. (3) Did the defendant after the original injury to Bob Lytle cause his death by its neglect of him, while he was in its charge as alleged? Ans. ———. (4) What damage, if any, has the plaintiff sustained? Ans. $1,500, with no interest." The court rendered judgment against defendant, from which it appealed.

S. J. Ervin and Avery & Ervin, for appellant. Craig, Martin & Winston and Pless & Winborne, for appellee.

BROWN, J. The intestate, Robert Lytle, was a brakeman in the employ of the defendant on its yards at Old Fort, and was injured while attempting to mount the pilot of one of defendant's engines while the same was in motion and running on the track about dark on the evening of January 20, 1907, and of the injuries sustained defendant died on the 26th day of January, six days later.

There was evidence on the part of the plaintiff tending to show that the intestate mounted the pilot on the engineer's side, and that the step on this side of the pilot was loose and gave way, and that the intestate fell to the ground and was injured and shortly thereafter died. There was evidence that the rules and regulations of the defendant forbade employes to mount the pilot while the engine is in motion, and there was also evidence that these rules and regulations were frequently disobeyed by the employes who were accustomed to mount the pilot while the engine was running. The defendant contended that, according to the evidence in the case, the intestate had personally received specific orders not to mount the pilot of the engine while moving, and that the violation of such orders was the proximate cause of his death. In order to present this view, defendant in apt time handed up several similar prayers for instruction, one of which is as follows: "If the jury find from the evidence that Robert Lytle had been ordered by the conductor in charge of the train, or the yardmaster in directing his work, not to mount the pilot while the engine was in motion on the track, and you further find that he did mount the pilot or attempt to mount it while the engine was in motion on the track, and that in consequence thereof lost his footing and fell, and by reason thereof sustained the injuries which resulted in his death, then it is your duty to answer the first issue, 'No,' although you may find that the step on the pilot was defective." His honor gave the prayer, but added these words: "Unless you shall find under the charge heretofore given that the rule was waived or abrogated."

We are of opinion that his honor erred in making such additions to the prayers. The defendant was entitled to have the instruction given without the added words. This is not a question of the abrogation of a rule by such long-continued violation of it that it becomes obsolete, as in Bordeaux v. Railroad (at this term) 64 S. E. 439. The question involved is the right of the defendant to exact of its brakeman obedience to the specific orders of his superiors given in good faith and meant to be obeyed. Assuming that the defendant's rule forbidding its employes from mounting the pilots of moving engines has been violated so long that it may be regarded as in abeyance, that did not deprive the defendant of its right to give specific orders to its employes and to insist on obedience to them. If the company is to be deprived of this right, then there is an end to all discipline. The evidence upon which the prayer was based is clear and uncontradicted. Burgin, the conductor of the train on which the intestate was brakeman, testified: "I had told Bob Lytle that it was very dangerous to catch the pilot while the train was in motion. I gave him instructions several times not to do this. I saw him doing this and told him it was against instructions." Again: "I had a right to direct the work on the yard. Couplings were made under my direction. I had directed Bob Lytle not to mount the pilot while the engine was in motion. I had given him such orders several times. I gave such an order to Bob only a few days before the injury. He was on the yard when I gave this order and at the time of the injury." Again witness says: "I had been giving orders to Bob and others forbidding mounting moving cars. I always told them not to do it every time I saw it done. It was done often, and I would tell them not to do it. It was the most dangerous thing they could do. I could have had Bob discharged." E. L. Winslow testified: "I live at Old Fort. Engineer in employ of defendant. Robert Lytle fired for me and helped me couple and switch. Helped switch and couple about two weeks before the injury. I instructed him not to jump on pilot of engine while engine was in motion. Told him several times. It is not necessary for coupler to ride on pilot in order to make coupling."

Assuming that the intestate was compelled to mount the engine's pilot in order to perform his duty (which is denied), he was not compelled to mount it when the engine was running. It was his duty to get on it before it started. Had the intestate done so, he would not have been run over, although the step had given way. We have recently said that it was the duty of railway companies to frame rules for the protection of its employes not only to protect them from the carelessness of their fellow servants, but to guard them as far as practicable from their own carelessness as well. Bordeaux v. Railroad, supra. We have here such a rule well calculated to guard the brakemen and switchmen from their own recklessness, which is the usual result of constant exposure to danger. It is said that the rule had been violated so much that it was in abeyance. Assuming that to be so, it cannot be denied that the defendant had a right to revive the rule and enforce it. That is what the conductor and the engineers were endeavoring to do in regard to the intestate, for the evidence shows that these orders were given repeatedly, and almost up to the very time of the accident. There is not a scintilla of evidence, or even a suggestion, that the conductor and engineer were "joking" or indulging in "mere talk," as is said in Smith v. Railroad, 147 N. C. 609, 61 S. E. 575. If words mean anything, then their orders were given in earnest, with the expectation and intention that they should be obeyed. They were not suffered to become stagnant, but were reiterated and repeated almost up to the hour of the disaster. It is difficult to understand what more the conductor or engineer could do to enforce obedience. They could not commit an assault and punish the disobedient servant without subjecting themselves to indictment and the company to damages. This court has repeatedly said that, where the injury to the servant is occasioned by his disobedience to the orders of the master, such disobedience is the proximate cause of the injury and bars recovery. Stewart v. Carpet Co., 138 N. C. 64, 50 S. E. 562, and cases cited. In that case Mr. Justice Walker well says: "When he chose to disregard the instructions he had received and do the work in his own way, the resultant injury to himself will be referred to his own negligence or willful disobedience, as its proximate cause, and not to any fault of his employer." There being no evidence that the orders given to the intestate by the conductor and engineer, under whose control he worked, were in any way revoked or modified, his honor erred in not giving the instructions as prayed. The additions he made were unwarranted.

As this case is to be tried again, we will suggest that the first issue is not in very good or the usual form. It seems to assume that the defendant was guilty of negligence, which is denied in the pleadings and contested in the proof.

New trial.

STATE v. CLINE.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. May 18, 1909.)

1. PERJURY (§ 1*)—ELEMENTS OF OFFENSE.

"Perjury" is committed when a lawful oath is administered in some judicial proceeding or due course of justice to a person who swears willfully, absolutely, and falsely to a matter immediately in issue or to a material circumstance having a legitimate tendency to prove or disprove the fact immediately in issue.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Perjury, Cent. Dig. § 1; Dec. Dig. § 1.*]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 6, pp. 5305-5310; vol. 8, p. 7751.]

2. INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION (§ 56*)—INDICTMENT—STATUTES—SUFFICIENCY.

Revisal 1905, §§ 3246, 3247, providing that in an indictment for perjury it shall be sufficient to set forth the substance of the offense and by what court or before whom the oath was taken, together with the proper averment to falsify the matter wherein the perjury is assigned, etc., do not violate the constitutional provision requiring that, before a citizen is called on to answer a criminal charge, he must be informed of the accusation against him.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Indictment and Information, Cent. Dig. §§ 175, 176; Dec. Dig. § 56.*]

3. PERJURY (§ 25*) — INDICTMENT — SUFFICIENCY.

An indictment for perjury must show on the face of the facts alleged that the matter sworn to and on which the perjury is assigned was material, or there must be an express averment to that effect.

[Ed. Note.—For other case, see Perjury, Cent. Dig. §§ 82-89; Dec. Dig. § 25.*]

4. PERJURY (§ 11*)—FALSE TESTIMONY CONSTITUTING PERJURY.

A witness giving a false answer to a question asked for the purpose of impeachment is a good assignment of perjury, under the rule that a question having no general bearing on the matters in issue may be made material by its relation to the witness' credit, and that false swearing thereon is perjury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Perjury, Cent. Dig. § 51; Dec. Dig. § 11.*]

5. PERJURY (§ 19*) — INDICTMENT — SUFFICIENCY.

An indictment for perjury, which alleged that accused committed perjury on the trial of an action before a justice of the peace, wherein a third person was plaintiff and accused was defendant, by falsely stating on oath that he had offered to a county commissioner a specified sum to influence his official action as a member of the board of commissioners in awarding to him a contract, etc., but which did not show the character of the action or the matter in issue, nor aver that the false testimony was material, was insufficient, notwithstanding a bill of particulars showing a purpose on the cross-examination of accused testifying at the trial was to show that he had spread a false report concerning the officer, and that he denied that he had spread any report concerning him.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Perjury, Cent. Dig. §§ 65, 66, 70; Dec. Dig. § 19.*]

6. INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION (§ 121*) — BILL OF PARTICULARS—EFFECT.

A bill of particulars cannot supply a defect in the indictment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Indictment and Information, Cent. Dig. § 320; Dec. Dig. § 121.*]

7. PERJURY (§ 37*) — MISLEADING INSTRUCTIONS.

An instruction on a trial for perjury that, if accused had satisfied the jury that the statements he made were true, and that they were lacking in any of the essential ingredients of perjury, it was their duty to return a verdict of not guilty, was misleading, as leading the jury to believe that accused must show that the statements he made were true, and had no other essential elements of perjury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Perjury, Cent. Dig. §§ 134-138; Dec. Dig. § 37.*]

8. PERJURY (§ 31*)—BURDEN OF PROOF.

The state, in a trial for perjury, has the burden of proving beyond a reasonable doubt all the essential elements of the offense.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Perjury, Cent. Dig. § 107; Dec. Dig. § 31.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Catawba County; Murphy, Judge.

B. S. Cline was convicted of perjury, and he appeals. Reversed.

See 146 N. C. 640, 61 S. E. 522.

The defendant was called upon to plead to the following bill of indictment: "That B. S. Cline, of Catawba county, did willfully, unlawfully, and feloniously commit perjury upon the trial of an action in a justice of the peace court before J. H. McLelland, in Catawba county, wherein W. H. Marlow was plaintiff and B. S. Cline was defendant, by falsely and feloniously asserting on oath that he, the said B. S. Cline, offered to D. M. Boyd, a member of the board of county commissioners of Catawba county, the sum of $25 to influence his official action as a member of said board in procuring for and awarding to the said B. S. Cline the contract with the said board of county commissioners, as keeper of the home for the aged and infirm of Catawba county, for two years, and subsequently paid to the said D. M. Boyd, commissioner as aforesaid, $10 on the said offer, after having been awarded said contract for one year by said board, and that the said D. M. Boyd accepted the same, knowing said statement or statements to be false, or being ignorant whether said statement was true." Defendant moved in apt time that the solicitor furnish bill of particulars. Motion allowed. Bill of particulars filed. Whereupon defendant moved to quash the bill of indictment on the ground that the same, with the bill of particulars, does not charge any crime in law. Motion denied. Defendant excepted and pleaded "not guilty."

After hearing the evidence his honor instructed the jury as follows:

"If you shall find from the evidence, beyond a reasonable doubt, that in the trial of Marlow v. Cline the defendant Cline made the statements set out in the bill of indictment under oath, and that after an oath was lawfully administered to him, and that such statements were willfully, corruptly, and falsely made, it will be your duty to return a verdict of guilty.

"If you shall find beyond a reasonable doubt that the statement or statements were not true, and if you shall further find beyond a reasonable doubt that other essential elements or ingredients of perjury, as I have defined it, appear in this evidence then it will be your duty to return a verdict of guilty.

"But if the defendant has satisfied you, gentlemen, that the statements he made are true, and, further, that they are lacking any of the essential ingredients or elements of perjury, as I have defined it, then it will be your duty to return a verdict of not guilty."

Defendant excepted to the last paragraph. There was a verdict of guilty, motion in arrest of judgment for that the bill did not charge any indictable offense, motion denied, judgment and appeal.

W. A. Self, R. Z. Linney, A. B. Whitener, and C. W. Bagby, for appellant. The Attorney General, for the State.

CONNOR, J. Prof. Greenleaf, with his usual accuracy, thus defines "perjury" at the common law: "The crime is committed when a lawful oath is administered in some judicial proceeding or due course of justice to a person who swears willfully, absolutely, and falsely in a matter material to the issue or point in question." 3 Greenleaf, Ev. 191, citing 3 Inst. 164; 4 Blackstone, Com. 1371;

Hawk. P. C. 69; 2 Roscoe's Crim. Ev. 1045, 836. The indictment in this case conforms to the statute (Revisal 1905, §§ 3246, 3247). The defendant, when called upon to plead, moved the court to quash the indictment because it failed to set forth facts showing that the alleged false testimony was material to the issue being tried in the case in which it was given. His honor refused the motion. Defendant excepted. The statute relieves the state from alleging mere matters of form, as was theretofore required. It does not, however, do violence to the constitutional provision which requires that before a citizen is called upon to answer a criminal charge he must be informed of the accusation against him. Matters of substance must be alleged, to the end that the court may see that an indictable offense is charged. It has always been uniformly held that to constitute perjury the false oath must be in regard to "some material fact tending to injure some person. If it be entirely immaterial, it cannot affect any one." State v. Dodd, 7 N. C. 226. It is equally well settled that "it must either appear on the face of the facts set forth in the indictment that the matter sworn to, and upon which the perjury is assigned, was material, or there must be an express averment to that effect." 2 Roscoe's Crim. Ev. 849. "The materiality of the false swearing to the issue or point of inquiry must appear from the indictment, either by general averment or by the facts set forth." Note to State v. Shupe, 16 Iowa, 36, 85 Am. Dec. 485-498, where the authorities are collected. 2 Wharton's Crim. Law, § 1304; 2 Bishop's Crim. Proc. § 921. "An indictment for perjury must show upon its face that the oath assigned as perjury was willful and false, and that the alleged false statement was material to the issue, or it cannot be sustained." Marvin v. State, 53 Ark. 395, 14 S. W. 87; State v. Chandler, 42 Vt. 446.

The bill of indictment in this record contains no averment that the testimony alleged to be false was material. We are therefore to ascertain whether the facts, appearing upon the face of the indictment, are, as matters of law, material to the issue which was being tried. It is well settled that "a party not only commits perjury by swearing falsely and corruptly as to the fact which is immediately in issue, but also by so doing as to material circumstances which have a legitimate tendency to prove or disprove such fact." Com. v. Grant, 116 Mass. 17. So in State v. Strat, 5 N. C. 124, it was held that if the question asked the defendant, when testifying as a witness, was for the purpose of impeaching him, a false answer was properly assigned as perjury. "A question having no general bearing on the matters in issue may be made material by its relation to the witness' credit, and false swearing thereon will be perjury." 2 Roscoe, 1062. As if one being examined as a witness be asked for the purpose of impeachment if he had been convicted of larceny, a false answer will undoubtedly be a good assignment of perjury. The principle is stated in King v. Nicholl, 1 Barn. & Adol. 21, 20 E. C. L. 336, wherein Bayley, J., said: "An indictment must be good without the help of argument or inference. In the case of perjury, the indictment must show, either by a statement of the proceedings, or by other averments, that the question to which the offense related was material." In the indictment before us it is charged that the alleged false testimony was given upon the trial of an action wherein W. H. Marlow was plaintiff and B. S. Cline was defendant. It is not suggested what the character of the action was, or what the matter in issue, whether an account, the items of which were disputed, a note, the execution of which was denied, or a plea of payment interposed. We are left to conjecture in respect to each and all of these matters. The charge is that he swore that he paid to D. M. Boyd, a member of the board of commissioners, $20 to influence his official action, etc. It does not appear that Boyd's official conduct was, in any respect, under examination, or had any relation whatever to the matter in issue or the parties to the action. There is not the slightest suggestion, either directly or by inference, how the matter set out in the indictment was material or could, in the most remote degree, affect the result.

It is suggested that possibly the purpose of the question was to impeach the witness—to affect his credibility. If this be conceded, although it would be the merest conjecture, we are unable to perceive how charging himself falsely with having given a bribe could strengthen his credibility. To deny it might do so. As said by Bayley, J., in King v. Nicholl, supra: "We know nothing of the merits of the case except from the indictment. The innuendoes introduce greater doubt than certainty." To sustain this view we would be compelled to conjecture that the witness was asked whether he did not give Boyd the money as a bribe for the purpose of affecting his credibility, and that he falsely swore that he did so for the purpose of weakening his credibility; whereas, in truth he did not do so. In swearing falsely that he gave Boyd a bribe, he injured Boyd; but it is difficult to see how, by admitting the truth of the impeaching question, he injures his adversary in the civil action or interfered with the due course of justice. The fact is that the question was not asked the witness for the purpose of impeaching him. He demanded that the solicitor file a bill of particulars. From this it appears that defendant was asked: "What connection, if any, did you have with circulating a report against Sheriff D. M. Boyd during the political campaign in which it was charged that you had paid him $10 for securing for you a position as keeper of the county home? I had none whatever." He was then asked whether he signed a statement to that effect, to which he answered that he did not. "How, then, was such a report circulated, if you didn't circulate it?" He answered, "I don't know." He then, of his own motion, asked if the counsel wanted the whole truth about it, and proceeded to state the facts set out in the indictment. From this it appears that the purpose of the cross-examiner was to show that he had spread a false report about Boyd having taken from him a bribe. He denied that he had spread any report whatever, and there is nothing in the indictment charging that he had sworn falsely in that respect. If he had denied spreading the false report, when in truth he had done so, it was well calculated to weaken the credibility of his testimony in the case on trial; but nothing of this kind is suggested. While we have held in State v. Van Pelt, 136 N. C. 633, 49 S. E. 177, 68 L. R. A. 760, that a bill of particulars cannot supply a defect in the indictment, and we adhere to that ruling, if we could look to the bill of particulars to supply the missing link, we would fail to find it.

The defendant may be guilty of uttering a slander against Boyd, but, in no aspect of the case, is he guilty of perjury as defined at common law. We think that in refusing to quash the bill of indictment there was error. While not necessary to the decision of this appeal, we think it proper to say that exception to the last paragraph of the instruction is well taken. While probably not so intended by his honor, it was calculated to make the impression upon the jury that it was the duty of the defendant to satisfy them that the statements he made were true and had no other essential elements of perjury. It will be noted upon that hypothesis alone he instructed the jury that they could return a verdict of not guilty. In the trial of criminal cases, it is always best to adhere closely to well-settled forms of expression. Save in a few exceptional cases, of which this is not one, the state carries the burden of proof to show beyond a reasonable doubt all the essential elements of the crime charged.

It must be certified that there is error.

POOL et al. v. ANDERSON et ux.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. May 13, 1909.)

1. BILLS AND NOTES (§ 499*)—ACTIONS—PRESUMPTIONS—PAYMENT.

Mere possession by the payor of a note, without any indorsement thereon, is not evidence of payment, unless it appears that it was delivered to the payee.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Bills and Notes, Cent. Dig. § 1696; Dec. Dig. § 499.*]

2. VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§ 299*)—NOTE FOR PRICE—EVIDENCE OF PAYMENT.

A note from which the payor's name has been cut off, found wrapped in a bond for title among the papers of the obligee after his death, the note being in the same handwriting as the bond and corresponding to its recitals except as to amount, is admissible, in an action to recover the land, to show payment of the bond, especially where the obligee and those claiming under him have been in possession of the land for 28 years.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Vendor and Purchaser, Dec. Dig. § 299.*]

3. EVIDENCE (§ 271*)—DECLARATIONS—SELF-SERVING DECLARATIONS.

Declarations by the obligee in a bond for title that he had paid a note for the purchase money are inadmissible in his favor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 1068, 1072; Dec. Dig. § 271;* Payment, Cent. Dig. § 205.]

Appeal from Superior Court, McDowell County; J. S. Adams, Judge.

Action by M. A. Pool and others against A. T. Anderson and wife. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Action for recovery of land. Plaintiffs claim under John E. Gray, who, on March 12, 1879, executed a bond obligating himself to make title to S. N. Stockton upon the payment of $300 "as stipulated by note or otherwise." The signature to the bond was attested by H. W. Wise. Stockton went into possession of the land upon the execution of the bond and remained thereon, until his death, devising it to the feme defendant, Cordelia Anderson, who has been in possession at all times since the death of said Stockton. Defendants alleged that the purchase money for the land was paid by Stockton. There was evidence of acts and declarations of Gray and Stockton tending to sustain the contention of both parties. For the purpose of sustaining the allegation of payment, defendants offered to introduce a note of which the following is a copy: "$200. On or about the 15th day of April, 1879, I promise to pay John E. Gray the sum of two hundred dollars for value received of him. Witness my hand and seal this the 12th day of March, 1879." The defendant A. T. Anderson testified that he found the note wrapped in the bond for title among the papers of S. N. Stockton after his death, and that when he first saw it it had Harve Wise's signature as a witness. He does not know Harve Wise's initials. The clerk of the court testified that the note and bond for title are on the same kind of paper and in the same handwriting and appear to have been written about the same time, though it might appear this way if one had been written one year after the other. H. W. Wise is dead. The note had no signature, but the paper appeared to have been cut off at the place for the signature. Plaintiff objected to the introduction of the note. His honor, being of the opinion that there was some evidence to identify the paper as a part of the note referred to in the bond, admitted it to be read to the jury, leaving to them the question of its identity. Plaintiffs excepted. There was a verdict and judgment for defendants. Plaintiffs assigned as error the admission of the note and appealed.

Pless & Winborne, for appellants. Sinclair & McBrayer, for appellees.

CONNOR, J. Conceding that, notwithstanding the fact that Stockton, and those claiming under him, have been in possession of the land since the execution of the bond for title, the burden of proof to show that the purchase money had been paid was on defendant, we think that his honor correctly held that the note was competent evidence to be considered by the jury upon that issue. Plaintiff's counsel strongly urges that there is no evidence connecting the note with the bond for title. We think that there is evidence tending to show that it was given in part payment of the purchase money for the land. In every respect except amount it is shown to correspond with the recitals in the bond. It bears the same date. There is evidence tending to show that it was written and witnessed by the same person, at the same time, and that the name of the payor has been cut off. If the jury found that it was given in part payment of the purchase money, we think the fact that it was found in its present condition wrapped in the bond for title, among Stockton's papers after his death, is a pregnant circumstance tending to show that it was paid by him. Especially is this so in view of the long-continued possession of the land under the bond. It is true that the mere possession, by the payor, of a note without any indorsement thereon, is not evidence of payment, unless it appears that it was delivered to the payee. When, however, the bond for title, executed by the payor, reciting the execution of a note, accompanied with the possession of the land by the payor for 28 years, both parties to the transaction being dead, the note is found in the possession of the payor wrapped in his muniment of title, it should not be excluded from the jury. The possession does not raise any presumption of payment or change the burden of proof. It is a circumstance—a condition open to explanation, but of sufficient relevancy to the fact in issue to entitle it to be considered in connection with other evidence to aid the jury in arriving at a correct conclusion.

It is a mistake to say that rules governing the admissibility of evidence where the question of relevancy is involved are technical. They are based upon conclusions drawn from experience rather than logic. For instance, it is well known that among persons not engaged in trade, banking, or other occupations requiring the keeping of books, containing a record of their transactions, where a note is paid, the payor usually cuts or tears his name out of it and preserves it. Any one having occasion to examine the papers of persons deceased knows that he usually finds the notes which such persons have paid canceled, as the one in controversy. It may be said that such is the general custom. The possession of a note under the conditions found in this case would be regarded as very strong evidence of its payment. This conclusion would be strengthened when the person claiming that the debt for which the note was given has not been paid is unable to produce another note corresponding to the debt, in date, amount, and other respects. It was suggested that the declaration by Stockton that he had paid the note would not be admissible. This is true, but its exclusion would not be based upon the suggestion that such declaration was not relevant, but upon the principle that a man's declarations made in his own interest are not admissible. Here we have an act consistent with admitted facts and conditions, and inconsistent with the theory that he had not paid for the land. The other evidence bearing upon the issue is not set out in the record. It is simply stated that declarations of both parties to the transaction were admitted. Certainly, in the condition of the case, it would aid the jury to show that the note was found in the possession of the payor wrapped in his bond. Jurors are men of experience and observation. They usually attach proper weight to facts and circumstances relating to the transactions which they are investigating. While the courts should carefully exclude such evidence as is misleading or confusing, they should admit such as experience has shown to be enlightening and helpful in getting at the truth—which is the ultimate end to which every judicial investigation should be directed.

We concur with his honor's ruling.
There is no error.

(82 S. C. 333)

STATE v. STOCKMAN.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. April 9, 1909. On Rehearing, May 5, 1909.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1153*)—APPEAL—DISCRETION OF TRIAL COURT—LEADING QUESTIONS.

The allowance of leading questions, being within the discretion of the trial court, will rarely be cause for reversal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 3064; Dec. Dig. § 1153.*]

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1169*)—APPEAL—HARMLESS ERROR—ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE.

Permitting a witness to answer a leading question is not reversible error, where the evidence elicited thereby was fully brought out in other testimony given previously, and afterwards by other witnesses.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 8138; Dec. Dig. § 1169.*]

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1043*)—APPEAL—OBJECTIONS FOR REVIEW.

Error in allowing a leading question to be asked a witness will not be reviewed on appeal, where the objection to the question did not state the reasons for objecting.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 2654, 2655; Dec. Dig. § 1043.*]

4. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1169*)—APPEAL—HARMLESS ERROR—EXCLUSION OF EVIDENCE—EVIDENCE ALREADY ADMITTED.

The overruling of an objection to a question asked a witness in regard to his testimony, if he meant to say a certain thing, was not prejudicial, where the witness had already so stated without objection.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 8138; Dec. Dig. § 1169.*]

5. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 656*)—TRIAL—COMMENTS OF JUDGE ON EVIDENCE.

In a prosecution for homicide, a witness for the state having denied that he and decedent were intoxicated on the day of the homicide, a witness for the defense was permitted to testify that on that day he met them on a road, and that they were apparently intoxicated. Counsel for the defense then asked whether witness was traveling in a wagon, and how many wagons he had, both of which questions were answered, and finally, who had the wagon, when the court said: "All that is irrelevant." Held, that the court's action was not error, as it in no wise excluded the real matter sought to be shown, which was that witness met decedent and the witness for the state, and that they were both apparently intoxicated.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Dec. Dig. § 656.*]

6. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1170*)—APPEAL—HARMLESS ERROR—EXCLUSION OF EVIDENCE—EVIDENCE OTHERWISE ADMITTED.

In a prosecution for homicide, refusal to permit a witness to answer a question inquiring if he heard decedent make threats against defendant, on the ground that it was a conclusion, was not reversible error, where the witness was later permitted to state the language constituting the threat.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 8147, 8148; Dec. Dig. § 1170.*]

7. HOMICIDE (§ 189*)—SELF-DEFENSE—EVIDENCE—HOSTILE FEELINGS OF DECEDENT.

Where there is some evidence tending to support a plea of self-defense in a trial for homicide, evidence reasonably tending to show that decedent had hostile feelings toward defendant at the time of the encounter, such as former threats to injure, quarrels, or difficulties, assaults, and the like, is competent to show that decedent was the aggressor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. § 398; Dec. Dig. § 189.*]

8. HOMICIDE (§ 189*)—SELF-DEFENSE—EVIDENCE.

In a prosecution for homicide, the exclusion of evidence that decedent considered himself to be of better stock than defendant as not bearing on issue of self-defense was not error, since it might well be supposed by the trial court that such a feeling could not tend to show such a hostile state of mind as would prompt or explain a personal assault upon decedent, but would rather tend to produce aloofness.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Dec. Dig. § 189.*]

9. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 338*)—EVIDENCE RELEVANT IN CONNECTION WITH EVIDENCE ALREADY INTRODUCED.

In a prosecution for homicide, in which the state, to show bias of a witness for the defense against decedent, elicited the fact that the witness had been prosecuted by decedent for the killing of his dog, evidence as to whether decedent sometimes killed dogs was irrelevant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Dec. Dig. § 338.*]

10. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 450*) — OPINION EVIDENCE—MATTERS DIRECTLY IN ISSUE.

In a prosecution for homicide, in which the defense was self-defense, evidence of a non-expert as to what would have happened if defendant had not killed decedent at the time he did, being a mere opinion on the vital question in the case, and not within the class of cases which allow a nonexpert witness to give his opinion as to matters which cannot be made intelligible to the jury except as interpreted by the impression made on the mind of the witness at the time, is inadmissible.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 1036; Dec. Dig. § 450.*]

11. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 683*)—TRIAL—SCOPE OF EVIDENCE IN REPLY.

Where, in a prosecution for homicide, a witness for the defense had testified that he met decedent and a witness for the state on the day of the homicide while traveling on a certain road, and that they were both apparently intoxicated, evidence for the state by another witness that he also had met them on such day while traveling on the same road, and that they both appeared to be sober, was admissible in reply.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Dec. Dig. § 683.*]

12. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 457*)—OPINION EVIDENCE—INTOXICATION.

The determination of whether a person is intoxicated or sober at a particular time, being a matter which involves the impression on the mind of one seeing the person, produced by the various circumstances occurring at the time, and not being a matter relating to which it is practicable to put the jury in possession of all the facts as they appeared upon which the opinion is grounded, may be the subject of nonexpert opinion evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 1046; Dec. Dig. § 457.*]

13. WITNESSES (§ 398*)—IMPEACHMENT—NECESSITY OF FOUNDATION.

Where, in a prosecution for homicide, a witness testified as to a conversation in a certain house on the day after the homicide, the laying of a foundation for contradicting the testimony was not necessary as a prerequisite to the admission of evidence that the witness was not at the house on that day.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Witnesses, Cent. Dig. § 1274; Dec. Dig. § 398.*]

14. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 683*)—TRIAL—SCOPE OF REPLY—EVIDENCE.

Where, in a prosecution for homicide, a witness for the defense testified that he heard decedent declare that he would kill the defendant, and fixed the day of the declaration as the time in a certain month when he purchased some goods at decedent's store and had them charged, evidence in a reply was admissible to show that goods were sold and charged to witness on only one day in the month named, and that on such day decedent was out of town, and not in the store.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Dec. Dig. § 683.*]

15. WITNESSES (§ 398*) — CONTRADICTION — FOUNDATION—SUFFICIENCY.

Where, in a prosecution for homicide, a witness for the defense had admitted meeting a man in the road close to the place of the homicide, and shortly thereafter, but stated that he did not know whether it was a certain person or not, and denied that he had made certain statements incriminating the defendant, a proper foundation was laid for contradicting the witness by the person whom he met.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Witnesses, Dec. Dig. § 398.*]

16. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 478*) — OPINION EVIDENCE—TESTIMONY OF EXPERTS—COMPETENCY.

In a prosecution for homicide, there was evidence that decedent, while engaged in a personal encounter with a person other than defendant, just before the commission of the crime, struck such person with his pistol, or a pair of knucks, or the butt of a whip, breaking his nose. The sheriff, who arrested the person with whom decedent had the encounter, testified in reply that, when such person arrived at the jail that night after the homicide, he had a bruise on each side of his nose, and that the skin was not broken. Held, that the sheriff, after describing the wounds and stating that he had seen bruises made by a man's fist, and was familiar with such wounds, was competent as an expert to give his opinion that the bruises on the nose must have been made with the fist.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Dec. Dig. § 478.*]

17. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 822*)—TRIAL—CONSTRUCTING CHARGE AS A WHOLE.

In a prosecution for homicide, an instruction that self-defense is an affirmative defense, and must be established by a preponderance of the testimony, is not error, where the jury is also instructed that, in order to convict, the state must establish defendant's guilt beyond a reasonable doubt.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Dec. Dig. § 822.*]

18. HOMICIDE (§ 116*)—SELF-DEFENSE—IMMEDIATE DANGER — BELIEF OF REASONABLE PERSON.

To make out a case of self-defense, the evidence should satisfy the jury that accused actually believed that he was in immediate danger of losing his life, or sustaining serious bodily harm, so that it was necessary to take the life of his assailant, and the circumstances must have been such as would, in the opinion of the jury, justify such a belief in the mind of a person possessed of ordinary firmness and reason.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. §§ 158-163; Dec. Dig. § 116.*]

19. HOMICIDE (§ 300*)—SELF-DEFENSE—INSTRUCTIONS—IGNORING DEFENDANT'S FAULT—MODIFICATION.

A requested instruction as to self-defense, omitting the principle that defendant must have been without fault in bringing about the difficulty, is properly modified by the court by adding such principle.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. §§ 614-632; Dec. Dig. § 300.*]

20. HOMICIDE (§ 123*)—DEFENSE OF HABITATION—IMMEDIATE DANGER.

Though a man's dwelling is his castle, and he may repel force by force in defense of his personal habitation and property against one who manifestly endeavors by violence to commit a felony on either, and in such case is not bound to retreat, but may pursue his adversary until he has secured himself from all danger, even taking his life if necessary, and the danger is imminent and immediate, still he cannot take life if the danger has passed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. §§ 182, 183; Dec. Dig. § 123.*]

Appeal from General Sessions Circuit Court of Lexington County; Chas. G. Dantzler, Judge.

S. W. Stockman was convicted of manslaughter, and appeals. Affirmed.

Graham & Sturkie and W. H. Sharpe, for appellant. Geo. Bell Timmerman, for the State.

JONES, J. The defendant, S. W. Stockman, at his residence in Lexington county on December 29, 1906, shot and killed his son-in-law, Hampton Hartley. Upon an indictment of murder he was tried at summer term, 1907, general sessions for Lexington county, Judge Dantzler presiding, convicted of manslaughter, with recommendation to mercy, and sentenced to seven years' imprisonment in the State Penitentiary. The defendant contended that Hartley entered his home under the influence of whisky, and was guilty of impropriety of conduct toward one of defendant's daughters, a sister of Hartley's wife, and was rebuked therefor by defendant, and ordered to leave the house; that thereupon Hartley with a buggy whip made an attack upon defendant and his nephew, J. W. Taylor, who was visiting at the house; that Mrs. Stockman got Hartley to leave the house; that he went some distance, and started back again towards the house, meeting Taylor near the gate, and assaulted Taylor, with whip in left hand and pistol in right hand; that Hartley, after knocking Taylor down, pointed his pistol at defendant, who was then in the yard with a shotgun in hand, and threatened to kill defendant, whereupon defendant shot and killed Hartley in defense of his person and habitation. The theory of the state's case was that, whatever may have taken place in the house, Hartley left it and went out of the gate into the road; that Taylor came out of the gate and went up to Hartley, and they commenced fighting, Taylor with his fist, and Hartley with a buggy whip held in his right hand; that Hartley drew no pistol, his pistol being found in his right hip pocket under him, with his overcoat buttoned up; that defendant fired upon Hartley while he was fighting Taylor, the line of fire being from the rear at an angle of about 45 degrees, some of the shot striking Hartley in the right temple, some striking behind and in front of the right ear.

The defendant presents 18 exceptions to the ruling of the court as to the admissibility of certain testimony, and 8 exceptions to the charge given the jury.

1. State's witness Elzy Long testified as to the position of Hartley's body on the ground where he fell, and the solicitor, with reference to the position of his hands, asked the question, "Were they or not lying by his side?" Defendant's counsel objected without stating reason, and, the court ruling the question competent, the witness answered, "Yes." Appellant claims that the question was leading and prejudicial. Conceding that questions beginning "Whether or not," etc., may be leading in certain circumstances, such questions are in the discretion of the trial court and will rarely be cause for reversal. State v. Marchbanks, 61 S. C. 22, 39 S. E. 187; Koon v. Southern Ry., 69 S. C. 104, 48 S. E. 86. There is nothing to show abuse of discretion nor prejudice to appellant. The position of the hands of deceased was fully brought out in other testimony given previously, and afterwards by other witnesses. Further, the trial court was not informed that the question was objected to as leading, and had no opportunity to have the question properly framed.

2. Defendant's witness Pick Sullivan testified that John Wingard, a witness who was present at the homicide and testified for the state, told witness at a house on McCarthy's place, a few days after the killing, that he went behind the shed, and did not see the killing. Defendant's counsel asked who was living in that house, and witness answered, "Mr. Wingard." Then counsel asked: "You mean to say that Wingard was living in this house where this conversation took place?" The witness answered, "Yes," when the solicitor objected, and the court sustained the objection as to what he meant to say, saying to defendant's counsel: "He is your witness, let him state." There was no error and no prejudice. As the witness had stated without objection that Wingard was living in the house where the conversation occurred, the point seems very immaterial.

3. State's witness Wingard having denied that he and Hartley were drunk on that day previous to the homicide, when riding together in a buggy leading two mules, and having testified that he did not on that occasion meet Simeon P. Alewine in the road, Alewine for the defense testified that he did meet them in the road apparently drunk; that the horses had broken out of the buggy. Counsel for defendant asked, "Did he get them?" and the witness answered, "Yes." The court asked counsel, "How is that relevant?" Counsel did not think it strictly relevant, but proceeded to ask the witness whether he (witness) was traveling in a wagon, which was answered, and how many wagons he had, which was answered, and then, finally, who had the wagon, when the court said: "All that is irrelevant." The third exception complains of this ruling. It is manifest that the court was correct, and that the ruling in no wise excluded the real matter sought to be shown; that is, whether Ale-wine met Wingard and Hartley at the same time mentioned, and that they were apparently drunk.

4 and 5. The fourth and fifth exceptions are based upon the following from the case: "Q. Did you know the late Hamp Hartley? A. Yes, sir. Q. Did you hear him make threats against Stockman? The Solicitor: We object. The Court: Objection sustained. That is a conclusion. Q. (By Mr. Graham) Did you hear him say anything about Stockman? A. Yes, sir; I heard him speak about him. Q. What did he say? A. I heard him say that he considered himself of better stock than Stockman. The Solicitor: We object. The Court: Yes, sir; strike that out. Q. Give me the words he used. A. He said if Stockman fooled with him, he would shoot him the same as a rattlesnake. Q. How long before Hartley was killed did you hear him say that? A. I suppose it was over a year. He talked and ran on."

The fourth exception is based upon the first ruling of the court above. It is proper, in giving evidence as to the threats, for the witness to state the language, or the substance of the language, used by the declarant, so that court and jury may determine whether there was in fact any threat, and what was the nature thereof. The appellant met this view later by having the witness state the language constituting the threat, and hence there is no ground for objection. Under the fifth exception it is contended that it was harmful for the court to strike out the statement that Hartley said he considered himself of better stock than Stockman, as the statement tended to show the mind and feeling of Hartley towards the defendant. Where there is some evidence tending to support a plea of self-defense in a trial for homicide, it is competent, for the purpose of showing that the deceased was the aggressor, to introduce evidence reasonably tending to show that deceased had hostile feelings towards defendant at the time of the encounter such as former threats to injure, quarrels or difficulties, assaults, and the like. State v. Emerson, 78 S. C. 90, 58 S. E. 974. The trial court may well have supposed that the particular matter under consideration could not reasonably tend to show such a hostile state of mind as would prompt or explain a personal assault upon the deceased. Generally and naturally, a feeling of superiority of birth, or social superiority, would tend to produce aloofness rather than a personal encounter. The testimony would at most tend to show that deceased "had a prejudice" against defendant, and falls short of being a threat. State v. Wyse, 33 S. C. 582, 12 S. E. 556.

6. The solicitor having, on cross-examination of the defendant's witness Hair, brought out the fact that the witness had been prosecuted by the deceased for killing his dog, with a view to show bias, defendant's counsel asked the witness whether the deceased sometimes killed dogs. The court correctly ruled the matter irrelevant.

7. It is contended that there was error in refusing to allow the defendant's witness Eugene Stockman to answer the question, "State if your father had not killed him at the time he did, what would have happened?" The question involved the mere opinion of a lad of 16 years upon the vital issue in the case as to what the deceased would have done. This does not fall within the class of cases which allow a nonexpert witness to give his opinion after detailing circumstances, as for example, as to time, distance, and such matters as cannot be made intelligible to the jury, except as interpreted by the impression made on the mind of the witness at the time, as in Jones v. Fuller, 19 S. C. 66, 45 Am. Rep. 761; Wood v. Ry. Co., 19 S. C. 521; Bridger v. Ry. Co., 25 S. C. 24; Harmon v. Ry. Co., 32 S. C. 127, 10 S. E. 877, 17 Am. St. Rep. 843; Easler v. Ry. Co., 59 S. C. 311, 37 S. E. 938. What the deceased was doing, or threatening to do, when he was slain was an issue, and the witness testified fully as to all the circumstances, the meaning of which could not be made plainer by his opinion, and the inference to be drawn from the circumstances was peculiarly for the jury.

8. The court allowed state witness T. S. Nichols to state in reply that he met the deceased and Wingard in the road in a buggy on the road from Lexington to Summit the day of the homicide, and that they appeared to be sober. It was objected (1) that this was not in reply; and (2) that it involved the opinion of the witness. The ruling was correct. The testimony was in reply to the testimony brought out by the defendant that deceased and Wingard were drunk while traveling that same road that day. Whether one is drunk or sober at a particular time is one of those matters which involve the statement of the impression or belief in the mind of the witness produced by the various circumstances occurring at the time, and falls within the rule of the case of Jones v. Fuller, and other cases cited supra. Questions of identity, handwriting, quantity, value, weight, measure, time, distance, velocity, form, size, age, strength, heat, cold, state of sickness or health, disposition, temper, anger, fear, excitement, intoxication, and generally where it is not practicable to put the jury in possession of all the facts as they appeared at the time upon which the opinion is grounded, may be subject-matter of nonexpert opinion. Elliott on Evidence, §§ 676, 678, citing, among cases as to intoxication, Edwards v. City of Worcester, 172 Mass. 104, 51 N. E. 447; West Chicago Ry. Co. v. Fishman, 169 Ill. 186, 48 N. E. 447. Similar testimony was allowed on behalf of defendant, and the ruling was fair, and consistent with the ruling discussed under the seventh exception.

9. The court allowed Sarah Wingard, witness for the state, to testify in reply that Pick Sullivan was not at her house on Sunday after Hartley was killed; Pick Sullivan having testified as to a conversation with J. W. Wingard at that house on that day. It was objected that no foundation had been laid for a contradiction. The court correctly ruled that the question was not of that class of contradictions, by previous statements of a witness, as required the laying of a foundation. It was a mere contradiction of Sullivan's testimony at the trial by the statement of a fact which, if true, would make it impossible that Sullivan's testimony could be true. Sullivan, having testified that he was at the house at the time mentioned, did not need to be advised that such statement would be contradicted.

10. Charles Howard testified for the defense that he heard deceased, Hartley, in August, 1905, in the afternoon, before the arrival of the train from Columbia, and about 2½ miles from Summit, in Lexington county, declare that he would kill the defendant. Witness fixed the day of the declaration as the time, in August, 1905, when he purchased some goods at Hartley's store from Socrates Keisler, the clerk and bookkeeper, and had them charged. The solicitor was allowed to show in reply by Keisler that he sold and charged goods to Howard on August 31, 1905, and on no other day in that month, with the purpose of showing that Hartley was in Columbia, S. C., at the time mentioned. There was no error in this. The testimony was strictly in reply.

11. For the same reason there was no error in allowing witness O. M. Asbill to testify in reply that Hartley was in Columbia, S. C., on the afternoon of August 31, 1905.

12. The testimony of J. W. Taylor was taken at a former trial of this case, and, he having afterwards died the same was introduced on this last trial. Taylor having testified that Hartley was some feet from him after knocking him between the wheels of a buggy and was pointing his pistol at Stockman when Stockman shot him, the solicitor sought to contradict Taylor by showing that he had made a different statement to F. D. Shealy on Saturday after the killing, in the road close to the place of the difficulty. Taylor admitted meeting a man that day who was driving two mules and a wagon, but stated that he did not know whether it was Shealy or not, and denied that he said to the man on that occasion that when Stockman fired Hartley was striking him (Taylor), and that it was a wonder Stockman had not hit him (Taylor). Shealy testified that such statement was made to him by Taylor at the time and place named. It is objected that the foundation for contradiction was not sufficiently laid. We think the witness was sufficiently advised as to time, place, person, and subject-matter of the proposed contradiction. The fact that he did not know the name of the party as F. D. Shealy did not render the question incompetent, if the court was satisfied that the witness was sufficiently advised as to the identity of the conversation with another as to give him a fair opportunity to recollect, so as to deny or explain. State v. Hampton, 79 S. C. 182, 60 S. E. 669. It appears that Taylor was also indicted in this case, and, in that view, on the former trial it was not necessary to advise him of the purpose to contradict by previous statements. State v. Emerson, 78 S. C. 92, 58 S. E. 974; but, as Taylor was not on trial in this case, being dead, we have treated the question as if Taylor was a mere witness.

13. There was some testimony that Hartley, at the time of encounter with Taylor, struck Taylor with his pistol, or a pair of knucks, or the butt of his whip, breaking his nose, P. A. Corley, who was the sheriff of Lexington county, was put upon the stand by the state in reply and testified that when Taylor got to the jail that night after the killing he had a bruise on each side of his nose, and that the skin was not broken. The witness, after describing the wound, and stating that he had seen bruises made by a man's fist, was asked whether or not in his judgment the bruises appeared to have been made with a man's fist. Upon objection the court ruled that, if the witness was familiar with wounds made by the fist, he could answer. Thereupon he gave his opinion that the bruises on the nose must have been made with the fist. It is charged that this ruling was erroneous, as it appeared by the testimony of the witness that he was not an expert, and not sufficiently acquainted with wounds and bruises as to express an opinion. As the ruling of the court required that the witness should be familiar with wounds made by the fist, we must assume that it was understood that the witness had such special knowledge on the subject as would result from such familiarity. As such he might be considered an expert, and entitled to express an opinion as to what agency was capable of producing such wound. State v. Senn, 32 S. C. 400, 11 S. E. 292. No objection was made on the trial that the form of the question and answer was in the concrete instead of the abstract, and the only point of objection raised in the exception is that the witness was not such an expert as to express an opinion. This is not a case in which an expert was allowed to give an opinion on the very point in issue, as it was a collateral matter, and practically immaterial whether Hartley struck Taylor with fist, whip, or pistol. Defendant does not claim to have shot Hartley because of the character of his assault on Taylor, but that he shot in defense of his own person.

14. The court did not err in charging the jury that self-defense is an affirmative defense, and must be established by the preponderance of the testimony, when the jury was also instructed that, in order to convict, the state must establish the guilt of the defendant beyond a reasonable doubt. State v. Welsh, 29 S. C. 4, 6 S. E. 894; State v. Bodie, 33 S. C. 132, 11 S. E. 624; State v. Way, 38 S. C. 346, 17 S. E. 39; State v. Way, 76 S. C. 94, 56 S. E. 653.

15. In behalf of the defendant the court was requested to instruct the jury: "(10) The law, recognizing the imperfections of human nature, does not require that one charged with homicide should show that there was no other possible means for escape when he struck the fatal blow, but he is only called upon to satisfy the jury that, under all circumstances by which he was surrounded, he really believed there was a necessity for taking the life of his adversary in order to preserve his own, or to save him from serious bodily harm, and that, in the opinion of the jury, those circumstances were such as would justify such a belief." In response to which the court said: "That will not do as it stands. This is right to a certain extent, but it does not go far enough. Now, for instance, 'that, in the opinion of the jury, those circumstances were such as would justify such a belief'; that is, such belief in the mind of a person possessed of ordinary firmness and reason, that the accused at the time of the killing actually believed that he was in such immediate, imminent danger of losing his life, or sustaining serious bodily harm, that it was necessary for his own protection to take the life of his assailant, and that the circumstances in which the accused was placed were such as would justify such belief in the mind of a person possessed of ordinary firmness and reason. With that modification I charge you that request." The modification was correct. State v. McGreer, 13 S. C. 464; State v. Thompson, 68 S. C. 137, 46 S. E. 941.

16. The court was requested to charge as follows: "In a case where the testimony shows that the deceased assaulted the defendant with a gun or pistol in such a way or manner as to cause a defendant to believe that such deceased was about to take defendant's life, or inflict some great bodily harm upon him, at the time he fired the fatal shot, and that a man of ordinary reason would have so believed, it would make no difference whether the deceased intended to take the life of such defendant, or to do him some serious bodily harm; for, under such circumstances, the shooting would be justifiable, the killing excusable, and such defendant should be acquitted." Responding to this request, the court said: "There is one essential element of excusable homicide lacking in that request, and that is he must have been without fault in bringing about the diffculty. I charge you that proposition in the light of my general charge to you, and as modified." The modification was in accordance with the well-settled law as to self-defense. State v. Dean, 72 S. C. 84, 51 S. E. 524.

17, 18 and 19. These exceptions complain of error in charging the law as to defense of one's dwelling. The court was requested to instruct the jury: "(16) That the dwelling house where a man lives is his home or castle, and that he may repel force by force in the defense of his person, habitation, or property, against one who manifestly intends and endeavors by violence to commit a felony on either, and in such case is not bound to retreat, but may pursue his adversary until he has secured himself from all danger; and, if he kill his adversary in so doing, it is justifiable defense, and the jury should acquit him." In response to this the court said: "Very true, Mr. Foreman, as I charged you before; no one has the right to take the life of another if the danger is passed, but he has the right, where the danger is immediate, to take the life of another to protect his home and family." In the general charge the court, said: "Now, a man's house is his castle. He has the right to protect every member occupying it, or there with him, and he may take life, if it is necessary to do so, in order for such protection; but the danger must be imminent, must be immediate. When the danger has passed, one has no right to follow up another who has invaded his home for the purpose of taking his life. He has no right to do that under the law; no such law anywhere making the taking of human life excusable, unless there be a necessity for it. But one when danger is passed, is over, is not allowed, under the law, to follow up another and take his life. The danger must be imminent; it must be immediate." The modification was correct. The deceased, when killed, was in the public road near the gate of defendant's yard, and defendant had left his yard, and come into his yard armed with his shotgun. The theory of the defense was that deceased, after knocking Taylor down, started to enter the gate with pistol pointed at defendant, and threatening to kill him. The theory of the state was that deceased left the house when ordered out, and was in the road striking Taylor with a whip in his right hand, and with no pistol drawn, when Stockman shot him from the rear. The issues thus presented made it very proper for the court, in charging the law as to defense of one's dwelling, to point out that the danger should not be passed, but should be imminent. The charge was in harmony with the law as declared in State v. Rochester, 72 S. C. 199, 51 S. E. 685, and State v. Brooks, 79 S. C. 149, 60 S. E. 518, 17 L. R. A. (N. S.) 483.

20 and 21. These exceptions allege that the charge as a whole conveyed to the jury that, in the opinion of the court, the defendant was guilty. These exceptions are without foundation. The charge was fair and impartial.

The judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

On Rehearing.

PER CURIAM. After careful consideration for rehearing in this case the court is unable to discover that any material question involved in the appeal has been overlooked or disregarded. It may be concluded that the court was in error in supposing that the deceased was killed while within the limits of the public road in front of defendant's dwelling, and that deceased was really shot when he was some 18 feet in front of defendant's gate and between defendant's inclosed yard and the public road, still such mistake does not materially affect the correctness of the conclusions reached by the court.

It is therefore ordered that the petition for rehearing be dismissed, and the order staying remittitur herein revoked.

STEPHENS v. SOUTHERN RY. CO.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. May 11, 1909.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 245*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—FELLOW SERVANTS.

A railroad company is liable for injuries to a fireman caused by the engineer's negligence in giving orders within the scope of his authority to control the fireman's services.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 779; Dec. Dig. § 245.*]

2. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 286*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—ACTIONS—QUESTION FOR JURY.

The question whether it is negligence for an engineer to order a fireman to jump from a train moving six or seven miles an hour is one of fact for the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 1041; Dec. Dig. § 286.*]

3. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 284*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—ACTIONS—QUESTION FOR JURY.

The question whether an injured employé was acting in the course of his employment is for the jury, where different inferences may be drawn from the testimony.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 1005; Dec. Dig. § 284.*]

4. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 284*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—ACTIONS—QUESTION FOR JURY.

The question whether an engineer's order is within the scope of his authority to control a fireman's services is one of law for the court, where the order requires the performance of a personal service which cannot reasonably be supposed to be essential to the prosecution of the engineer's services.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 1005; Dec. Dig. § 284.*]

5. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 145*)—INJURIES TO SERVANTS—RULES.

A rule requiring an employé of a railroad company to refuse to obey orders exposing him to danger means that he must refuse to obey orders known to be dangerous beyond the peril which is reasonably incident to the work.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 288; Dec. Dig. § 145.*]

6. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 289*)—LIABILITY FOR INJURIES—ACTIONS—QUESTION FOR JURY.

The question whether an injured employé knew the rules of caution in a book given to him, or should have known them by the exercise of reasonable diligence, is one of fact, where more than one inference can be drawn from the evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 1127; Dec. Dig. § 289.*]

7. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 289*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—ACTIONS—QUESTION FOR JURY.

Whether it is negligence for an employé to jump from a moving train is a question for the jury, unless it appears that the train was going at such a speed that it would have been obvious to a reasonable man that injury would probably result.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 11, 23; Dec. Dig. § 289.*]

8. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 245*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—ACTIONS—QUESTION FOR JURY.

An experienced fireman, who obeys an order of the engineer requiring him to jump from a train moving six miles an hour, when he knows the act is dangerous and there is no emergency, is guilty, as a matter of law, of contributory negligence warranting a nonsuit.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 781; Dec. Dig. § 245.*]

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Dorchester County; R. W. Menninger, Judge.

Action by Thomas Stephens against the Southern Railway Company. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

E. J. Dennis and J. P. K. Bryan, for appellant. J. W. Barnwell, for respondent.

WOODS, J. This action was brought for damages on account of personal injuries suffered by the plaintiff while in defendant's employment as a fireman. The appeal is from an order of nonsuit made on the ground that the evidence admitted of no other inference than that the injury was due to plaintiff's own negligence, or that his negligence contributed to it as a proximate cause. The facts may be shortly stated: Charles Alphonse was engineer, and the plaintiff fireman, on defendant's freight train which left Columbia about 7 o'clock on the morning of August 11, 1904. The claim of the plaintiff is that his injury resulted from the negligence of the engineer in requiring him to jump from a moving train. His account of the order of the engineer and his own conduct and the resulting injury is best given in his own language: "A. Just before we got to the block, and while the train was running, he told me, 'Stephens, I am not going to eat any breakfast this morning, but I want you to get down and go back to the cab and get me a cup of coffee.' Q.

peared from the evidence that the rule book was given to the plaintiff some time in 1904, but it does not appear how long he had it before the accident in August of that year. The court could not say as a matter of law that the time was long enough to justify the inference that the plaintiff should have known the rules. His ignorance of them, and consequent failure to obey them, cannot as a matter of law be imputed to him as negligence. If he knew those rules of caution, or would have known them by the exercise of reasonable diligence, then he could not recover, because his act was in direct violation of them; but the court could not decide this issue, because the evidence left room for more than one inference.

But aside from the company's rules of caution above mentioned, the plaintiff could not stupidly, recklessly, or even carelessly obey an order of the engineer requiring him to do an obviously dangerous act, and hold the defendant responsible for a resulting injury. For in doing so he would be guilty of contributory negligence. The remaining inquiry is whether the plaintiff's act was of this character. To show contributory negligence, it is not sufficient that the employé receiving the order should have misgivings and believe the act required to be hazardous, unless the danger is so imminent and obvious that a man of ordinary prudence would not incur it. If there is ground for reasonable difference of opinion as to the danger, the servant is not bound to set up his judgment against that of his superior, whose orders he is required to obey; but he may rely on the judgment of such superior. The matter is thus well stated by Mr. Justice Holmes in McKee v. Tourtellotte, 167 Mass. 69, 44 N. E. 1071, 48 L. R. A. 542: "When we say that a man appreciates a danger, we mean to say that he forms a judgment as to the future, and that his judgment is right; but if against this judgment is set the judgment of a superior, one to whom, from the nature of the callings of the two men and of the superior's duty, seems likely to make the more accurate forecast, and if to this be added a command to go on with the work and to run the risk, it becomes a complex question of the particular circumstances whether the inferior is not justified as a prudent man in surrendering his own opinion and obeying the command. The nature and degree of the danger, the extent of plaintiff's appreciation of it, and the exigency of the work, all enter into consideration, and no universal rule can be laid down." The numerous authorities sustaining this statement of the law are collated in the note in Houston, etc., Ry. Co. v. De Walt, 97 Am. St. Rep. 877.

Whether it is negligence to jump from a slowly moving train is a question for the jury, and the court will not hold it to be contributory negligence as a matter of law. To take the case from the jury it must clearly appear that the train was going at such a high rate of speed that it was in fact obvious to the plaintiff, or would have been obvious to any reasonable man, that injury would probably result from jumping. Creech v. Railway Co., 66 S. C. 533, 45 S. E. 86; Gyles v. Railway Co., 79 S. C. 176, 60 S. E. 433; Northern Pac. R. R. Co. v. Egeland, 163 U. S. 93, 16 Sup. Ct. 975, 41 L. Ed. 82. In the last case, and in others decided on its authority, the fact that the plaintiff jumped at the direction of his superior was held to be an important consideration. Here, it is true, the order was given by the engineer; but, even regarding it within the scope of the engineer's authority, there was no emergency, and nothing of consequence to be accomplished, and the plaintiff testified that he regarded the jump from the train so dangerous that he twice refused to take the risk. There was in fact great peril in making the jump, full appreciation of the danger by the plaintiff, who had been in the railroad business a long time, and no exigency or emergency of any kind. On this point the case falls under the case of Smith v. Railway Co., 80 S. C. 1, 61 S. E. 205, where a demurrer was sustained on the ground that the plaintiff had alleged in the complaint that he jumped from a moving train when he knew the act was dangerous.

There is no view of the law under which a verdict for the plaintiff could be sustained, and the nonsuit was properly granted.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

BREEDEN et al. v. MOORE et al.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. May 10, 1909.)

1. TRUSTS (§ 168*) — SUCCESSION OF NEW TRUSTEE.

On the death of a trustee, his eldest son succeeds him by operation of law.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trusts, Cent. Dig. § 221; Dec. Dig. § 168.*]

2. PERPETUITIES (§ 4*)—FUTURE ESTATES—RE-MOTENESS.

Testator devised land in trust for his son for life, to be conveyed to his son's children on his death, or, if he should die without surviving children, testator directed that his trustee should permit testator's daughter to occupy the land for life and convey the same to her children, or, if she should die without surviving children, to divide the same equally among testator's children and the issue of any deceased child. Held, that limitation over to testator's surviving children after his daughter's death without children her surviving was not too remote.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Perpetuities, Cent. Dig. § 4; Dec. Dig. § 4.*]

3. ADVERSE POSSESSION (§ 4*) — AGAINST WHOM PRESCRIPTION MAY BE CLAIMED.

To support title by adverse possession, it must be shown that the person against whom asserted was not prevented by law from asserting his right during the period of the possession alleged to be adverse.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Adverse Possession, Cent. Dig. § 15; Dec. Dig. § 4.*]

4. LIFE ESTATES (§ 8*)—AGAINST WHOM PRESCRIPTION MAY BE CLAIMED—REMAINDERMEN.

Testator directed that, if his son should die without children him surviving, his trustees should permit testator's daughter to occupy land for life, and at her death, convey the same to her children, and, if she should die without children her surviving, should divide the same equally among testator's surviving children and the issue of any deceased child. Held that, under the rule that a trustee takes no larger estate than necessary to perform the duty imposed, testator's daughter took a life estate free from the trust, and her grantee could not set up adverse possession against the trustee or remaindermen, as testator's daughter had a right to convey the land for life, and neither the trustee nor the remaindermen had any right of action for possession until her death.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Life Estates, Cent. Dig. §§ 24-28; Dec. Dig. § 8.*]

5. TRUSTS (§ 131*)—CONSTRUCTION—ESTATES CREATED—STATUTE OF USES.

That testator directed his trustee to "permit" testator's daughter to use and occupy land does not indicate that any duty is to be performed by the trustee so as to preclude the operation of the statute of uses, and prevent the vesting of the legal title to the life estate in testator's daughter.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trusts, Cent. Dig. § 175½; Dec. Dig. § 131.*]

6. LIFE ESTATES (§ 8*)—AGAINST WHOM PRESCRIPTION MAY BE CLAIMED.

Where a life tenant undertook to convey only her interest in land and it does not appear that her grantees did anything to bring home to the trustee under the will creating the life estate notice that they claimed by any higher claim than the life tenant could or did confer, and the land was agricultural and cultivated and rented as other land of the grantees was and their possession was entirely consistent with the claim of the trustee and remaindermen, and there was nothing with which either could interfere, there is nothing to support title by adverse possession in such grantees.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Life Estates, Cent. Dig. §§ 24-28; Dec. Dig. § 8.*]

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Marlboro County; Chas. G. Dantzler, Judge.

Partition by Lucy Breedon and others against Alice G. Moore and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

Knox Livingston and Newton & Owens, for appellants. J. H. Hudson, McColl & McColl, and Townsend & Rogers, for respondents.

WOODS, J. Thomas Stubbs, Sr., of Marlboro county, died on 18th June, 1847, leaving a will, by the fifth clause of which he made this devise: "I give and devise to my friend Holden W. Liles, one hundred acres of land whereon my son, Thomas Stubbs, Jr., now lives, composed partly of the Bowyer tract and partly of the Terrel tract, in trust nevertheless, to permit my said son, Thomas Stubbs, Jr., to use and enjoy the same to his sole and separate use, without rendering an account of the rents and profits, during the term of his natural life, and after his death to convey the same to the children of the said Thomas Stubbs, Jr., lawfully begotten that may be living at the time of his death, to them and their heirs forever, and should he die leaving no heirs lawfully begotten, surviving him, I give the said tract of land to the said Holden W. Liles in trust to permit my daughter Lucy Ann Goodwin to use, occupy and enjoy the same during her natural life and after her death to convey the same to the heirs of her body, to them and their heirs forever, should she die leaving no such heirs, then the said trustee to divide the same equally among my surviving children, the issue of any deceased child taking the share of any of my children who may then be dead." Thomas Stubbs, Jr., held possession of the land as devisee until 1856, when he died without having had issue of his body. Immediately after his death Lucy Ann Goodwin went into possession and held until 1881, when she made a deed of conveyance to Milton A. J. Moore and his wife, Alice Moore. This deed purported to convey nothing more than the interest of the grantor; the words used being, "all my interest and estate in and to" the premises described, and it contained no warranty clause. Mrs. Goodwin, the life tenant, died in June, 1898, without ever having any issue of her body. Soon after her death, the plaintiffs, claiming as heirs of children of Thomas Stubbs, Sr., who survived him, brought this action, alleging that, the life estate having fallen in, they were entitled as remaindermen to a partition of the land. M. A. J. Moore and his wife, Alice Moore, having been made parties to the suit, by their answer set up these defenses: First, that the deed from Lucy Ann Goodwin conveyed to them a good fee-simple estate; and, second, that they had held the land adversely to the plaintiffs and all other persons since their entry under the deed in 1881; and, third, that they had acquired by deeds of conveyance whatever interest in the land existed in favor of certain of the persons named in the complaint as holding an interest in common with the plaintiffs and by the same right. During the pendency of the action M. A. J. Moore died, and his executors and executrix and his devisees and legatees were substituted for him as defendants. From the date of the deed in 1881 M. A. J. Moore and his wife and his devisees have been in possession of the land. The original trustee, Holden J. Liles, died about the year 1881, and his eldest son, James E. Liles, became his successor by operation of law (Reynolds v. Reynolds, 61 S. C. 243, 39 S. E. 391; Cone v. Cone, 61 S. C. 512, 39 S. E. 748), and, as trustee, was made a party to the suit. He testified, however, that he never heard of the trust until this action was commenced, and, of course, had nothing to do with the land.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. & Am. Digs. 1907 to date, & Reporter Indexes

The circuit judge held the limitation over after the death of Lucy Ann Goodwin to be too remote, and that she, therefore, took a fee-simple title which passed by her conveyance to M. A. J. Moore and Alice Moore. This conclusion would be correct but for the fact that the limitation over is to the testator's "surviving children." Such a limitation was held not too remote in Selman v. Robertson, 46 S. C. 262, 24 S. E. 187, where the subject is fully discussed and the authorities cited.

The circuit court held, further, that the grantees of Mrs. Goodwin had acquired title by adverse possession. We think this conclusion also was erroneous, for two reasons: First, the grantees of Mrs. Goodwin could not hold adversely against the remaindermen or the trustee for them until the termination of the life estate of Mrs. Goodwin; and, second, there was not a scintilla of evidence of adverse possession. To support the plea of adverse possession, it is necessary to show that the claimant against whom it is asserted was not prevented by law from asserting his right during the period of the possession alleged to be adverse. In the effort to meet this requirement, the respondents maintain that, assuming the remainder over to be valid, yet the legal title was in the trustee during the life of Mrs. Goodwin, that she had no right to convey, and that, when they took a deed from her and entered under it, their adverse possession began. The question then is whether the trustee or Mrs. Goodwin held the legal title to the life estate; for it will not be doubted, if Mrs. Goodwin held the legal estate for her life, no act of hers could defeat the remaindermen, and no possession during her life could be adverse to the trustee or the remaindermen. In Howard v. Henderson, 18 S. C. 184, the conveyance was to a trustee "for the use, benefit, and behoof of the said William S. Howard, Sr., during the term of his natural life, with remainder at his death to the said Georgia V. Howard, during the term of her natural life, and upon her death to such child or children of the said William S. Howard, Jr., and the said Georgia V. Howard, as may be living." It was held that the statute executed the use as to the life estate; the court saying: "So that, whatever may be the proper construction of this deed in reference to the application of the statute of uses on the estates of Mrs. Howard and the children in remainder, there is no reason why it should not execute the estate of W. S. Howard, Sr., the plaintiff, vesting in him a legal estate for life, the fee possibly remaining in the trustee for the benefit of the married woman and for the preservation of the contingent remainders to the children." The same principle was applied conversely in Willman v. Holmes, 4 Rich. Eq. 475, and Wleters v. Timmons, 25 S. C. 488, 1 S. E. 1. In these cases it was held the trustee retained the legal title as to the life estate, while as to the remainder the statute executed the use, and vested the legal title in the remaindermen freed from the trust. These adjudications rest on the rule of universal application that a trustee will not be held to take any larger estate than is necessary to enable him to perform the duty imposed by the instrument creating the trust. This principle and the authority of the cases above cited are recognized and restated in Ayer v. Ritter, 29 S. C. 137, 7 S. E. 53, Young v. McNeill, 78 S. C. 150, 59 S. E. 986, and Moseley v. Hankinson, 25 S. C. 519.

There is difficulty, it is true, in reconciling the case of Bristow v. McCall, 16 S. C. 545, which preceded Howard v. Henderson, supra, with the principle just stated. There the trustees were required to make division of the land between D. and E. "and permit each to use, possess, and enjoy his or her half in severalty during his or her natural life, and after the death of either to divide the share of each among his or her children equally." The trustees divided the lands between D. and E., but it was held that the legal title to the life estates, as well as the remainders, remained in the trustees, because the duty devolved on them to make division among the remaindermen after the termination of the life estate of D. or E. We can perceive no difference between Bristow v. McCall, 16 S. C. 545, and Howard v. Henderson, 18 S. C. 184, except that in the latter case the statute executed the use automatically immediately upon the execution of the deed, while in the former the trustee completely performed the duties devolving upon him under the will with respect to the life interests; and this difference seems to be too unsubstantial for judicial recognition. While the case of Bristow v. McCall has been often cited, its doctrine on this point has never been restated nor recognized. On the other hand, the rule followed in Howard v. Henderson, 18 S. C. 184, is, as we have pointed out, but an application of the principle before laid down in Willman v. Holmes, supra, and reaffirmed in the later cases cited. This principle is too well supported by reason and authority to be rejected, and the case of Bristow v. McCall must be overruled so far as it is inconsistent with it. If it is followed, clearly Mrs. Goodwin held the life estate freed from the trustee, and no one holding under her could set up adverse possession against the trustee or the remaindermen, for whom he held, for the obvious reason that Mrs. Goodwin had a right to convey the land for her life, and neither the trustee nor the remaindermen could have any right of action for the possession until the death of Mrs. Goodwin. Moseley v. Hankinson, 25 S. C. 519; Rawls v. Johns, 54 S. C. 395, 32 S. E. 451; Rice v. Bamberg, 59 S. C. 507, 38 S. E. 209; Mitchell v. Cleveland, 76 S. C. 432, 57 S. E. 83. The fact that in this case the trustee was to permit Mrs. Goodwin "to use, occupy and enjoy" the land did not indicate that any duty was to be performed by the trustee, and did not take the case out of the statute of uses. McNish v.

Guerard, 4 Strob. Eq. 74; Holmes v. Pickett, 51 S. C. 280, 29 S. E. 82. But, even if it be assumed the trustee retained the legal title of the life estate of Mrs. Goodwin, the result would be the same. In Benbow v. Levi, 50 S. C. 120, 27 S. E. 655, it was held in accordance with a rule of general acceptance, that, if the legal title is in the trustee, the cestui que trust may be defeated by possession adverse to the trustee; but that case went no farther than to hold that a cestui que trust would be barred by such adverse possession when her right to possession might have been asserted by the trustee during the period of the adverse holding. Even if the case of Young v. McNeill, 78 S. C. 143, 59 S. E. 986, be considered to extend the principle of Benbow v. Levi to the rule that a cestui que trust in remainder will be barred by an adverse holding against the trustee during the time that he might have asserted the life tenant's right of possession and before the accrual of the right of the remaindermen to possession, still this case does not fall within the rule; for the reason that there was no evidence whatever of adverse possession against the trustee or the remaindermen.

Mrs. Goodwin had the right "to use, occupy, and enjoy" the land during her life. This right, whether legal or equitable, she could convey or assign to another, and the trustee had no right to interfere. Far from asserting an adverse right, Mrs. Goodwin undertook to convey only her interest and estate. Under this conveyance or assignment her grantees or assignees had the right "to use, occupy and enjoy" the land during Mrs. Goodwin's life without interference from the trustee. There is not a particle of evidence that they did anything to bring home to the trustees notice that they claimed to hold the land by any higher claim than Mrs. Goodwin could and did confer. The lands were agricultural, and the evidence shows that they were cultivated and rented out just as the other lands of the grantees were, and just as any one having the right "to use, occupy and enjoy" would have cultivated or rented them. Not a single fact or condition appears in the testimony inconsistent with the occupation and use which the life tenant and those claiming under her were entitled to have for the life of Mrs. Goodwin, with which use and occupation neither the trustee nor the remaindermen could interfere. On the contrary, the possession was entirely consistent with the claim of the remaindermen or of the trustee for them.

The circuit decree is without support in the evidence and must be reversed, and it is adjudged the lands be partitioned in accordance with the rights of the parties.

JONES, C. J., and GARY, A. J., concur on the ground that the remainder over was good, that the statute executed the use in Mrs. Goodwin, and therefore adverse possession of her grantees could not commence until her death.

(83 S. C. 34)

STATE v. GIBSON.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. May 11, 1909.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 450*) — OPINION EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

On a trial for receiving stolen bonds, objection to a question asked a witness by defendant as to whether cancellation marks on a bond would affect its negotiability, was properly sustained; the construction of a written instrument being for the court, and not the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 1036; Dec. Dig. § 450.*]

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1028*)—APPEAL—PRESENTATION OF QUESTIONS BELOW.

A conviction for receiving stolen bonds will not be reversed because the court failed to construe the bonds, where it was not requested to do so.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 2619; Dec. Dig. § 1028.*]

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1165*)—APPEAL—HARMLESS ERROR.

A conviction for receiving stolen bonds will not be reversed because the court failed to construe the bonds, where it is not made to appear that such failure was prejudicial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 3085; Dec. Dig. § 1165.*]

4. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1170*)—APPEAL—HARMLESS ERROR—EXCLUSION OF EVIDENCE.

Where on a criminal trial accused was allowed to introduce evidence, which was uncontradicted, that his reputation for honesty and integrity was good, a refusal to permit such witnesses to state whether from his reputation they would believe him under oath was not prejudicial to accused; for, if he was a man of integrity, that reasonably tended to show that he was worthy of belief under oath.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 3145; Dec. Dig. § 1170.*]

5. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1038*)—APPEAL—PRESENTATION OF GROUNDS OF REVIEW—REQUEST FOR INSTRUCTIONS.

An assignment that the court erred in failing to give an instruction cannot be sustained, where there was no request therefor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 2646; Dec. Dig. § 1038.*]

6. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 756*) — INSTRUCTIONS — CHARGE ON FACTS.

A statement by the court, in response to an inquiry by the jury on a trial for receiving stolen bonds, that "My recollection is—but the jury must go by their own recollection of the testimony—my recollection of the testimony is (if I state it wrongly you gentlemen can correct me; and if there is any dispute I will have it read) that Z. said that [accused] handled all those $12,000 bonds, except one $500, which was sent to Washington, and he did not say when he took that $500 bond," and that "the only testimony as to the Washington bond is from Z., and that is what he said about it, and that is all that he did say as to that bond," was not prejudicial to accused as being in violation of Const. 1895, art. 5, § 26, forbidding a judge to charge on matters of fact.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 1766; Dec. Dig. § 756.*]

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Richland County; Geo. E. Prince, Judge.

Thomas J. Gibson was convicted of receiving stolen goods, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Clark & Clark and Logan & Edmunds, for appellant. Christie Benet, for the State.

GARY, A. J. The defendant was tried under an indictment charging him with receiving stolen goods knowing them to be stolen; and the jury rendered a verdict of guilty, with a recommendation to mercy, whereupon he was sentenced to imprisonment in the penitentiary for six months. He appealed upon exceptions, the first of which assigns error, on the part of his honor the presiding judge, in ruling that the defendant's question to the witness J. F. Lyon, "If these cancellation marks were not on it, would it be a negotiable bond or not," was incompetent, and in not permitting the witness to answer the same. The circuit judge properly ruled that the construction of the written instrument presented a question to be determined by the court, and not by the jury.

The second question raised by the exceptions is whether the presiding judge erred in failing to construe the said bond. In the first place the record does not disclose the fact that he was requested to construe the bond; and, in the second place, it has not been made to appear that such failure was prejudicial to the rights of the appellant.

The third exception raises the question whether the presiding judge erred in refusing to permit the defendant's witnesses, after they had testified that they knew his general reputation for honesty and integrity, and that it was good, to answer the following interrogatory: "From that reputation would you believe him on oath?" The reason assigned by the circuit judge for this ruling was that the reputation of the defendant for veracity was not attacked. The case of Sweet v. Gilmore, 52 S. C. 530, 30 S. E. 395, shows that when it is sought to impeach the credibility of a witness, the impeaching witness may be asked, "What is the general character of the witness, good or bad?" and, if he answers that the character is bad, then he may be asked, "Would you believe him on his oath?" And the case of Chapman v. Cooley, 12 Rich. Law, 654, decides that the character of a witness can be defended by evidence only, when it is directly assailed by evidence. Even, however, if it should be conceded that the character of a defendant is attacked, when he is charged with a crime involving moral turpitude, and that ordinarily he should be allowed to introduce testimony as to his reputation for veracity, nevertheless, we fail to discover in what respect the ruling of the presiding judge was prejudicial to the appellant, when he was allowed to offer testimony (which was uncontradicted) that his reputation for honesty and integrity was good. If he was a man of integrity, that fact reasonably tends to show that he was worthy of belief under oath. This ruling also disposes of the fourth exception.

The fifth assignment of error is because the presiding judge failed to instruct the jury that it was not safe to convict the defendant on the uncorroborated evidence of an accomplice. This ground cannot be sustained, for the reason, if for no other, that the presiding judge was not requested to make such a ruling.

The sixth exception is as follows: "Because his honor erred, it is respectfully submitted, in response to a question by the foreman: 'The Foreman: One of the jurors desires to know if the bond sent to Washington is the last bond that was stolen'—in charging as follows: 'The Court: I cannot tell you. There is nothing in the evidence to show, unless counsel can agree about that. Solicitor Davis: The question is that these two were the last that were stolen. Mr. Crawford: There is no evidence on that, as to that Washington bond. The Court: My recollection is—but the jury must go by their own recollection of the testimony—my recollection of the testimony is (if I state it wrongly, you gentlemen can correct me; and if there is any dispute I will have it read) that Mr. Zimmerman said that Mr. Gibson handled all those $12,000 bonds, except one $500, which was sent to Washington, and he did not say when he took that $500 bond. Mr. Crawford: Mr. Gibson says in answer that he bought only six bonds from him. The Court: The only testimony as to the Washington bond is from Mr. Zimmerman, and that is what he said about it, and that is all that he did say as to that bond.' Error being (a) that such charge constituted a charge on the facts, in violation of the provisions of the Constitution of the state of South Carolina (article 5, § 28, Const. 1895); (b) that in so doing his honor undertook to, and did, state to the jury the testimony, in violation of the provisions of the Constitution of the state of South Carolina, above referred to." We fail to see wherein the remarks of the circuit judge were prejudicial to the rights of the defendant.

The seventh and eighth exceptions are too general for consideration.

The ninth exception assigns error, on the part of the presiding judge, in refusing to grant the motion for a new trial on the ground that "It is nowhere proven that those were the bonds that were stolen [referring to the bonds described in the indictment]." The appellant's attorneys did not argue this exception, and we deem it only necessary to state that it is without merit.

The tenth exception assigns error in failing to charge the jury as to the effect of the defendant's good character. The presiding judge says: "I recall that counsel did, in arguing the case to the jury, turn to me and call my attention to that law, but I forgot it when I was charging the jury." A request should have been presented in accordance with the requirement of the rule of court.

The eleventh exception assigns error on the part of the presiding judge in refusing to grant the motion for a new trial, on the ground that he failed to charge the jury that the uncorroborated statement of a confessed accomplice should be received with caution. This question is disposed of by what was said in considering the tenth exception.

The twelfth exception assigns error on the part of the circuit judge in refusing to grant the motion for a new trial, on the ground that there was no evidence that the defendant knew the bonds had been stolen. The reasons assigned by the presiding judge in overruling this ground for a new trial are satisfactory to this court.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

LOHR v. GEORGE et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
March 2, 1909. Rehearing Denied
May 12, 1909.)

1. TAXATION (§ 677*)—SALES—COMBINATION AMONG BIDDERS.

Combination among bidders at a tax sale for the purpose of eliminating or restraining competition in the bidding may be shown by parol evidence, and, if established, will invalidate the purchase of, and deed for, any tract of land, purchased by any of the confederates in pursuance thereof and to which the improper conduct extended.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Taxation, Cent. Dig. § 1356; Dec. Dig. § 677.*]

2. TAXATION (§ 677*)—SALES—COMBINATION AMONG BIDDERS.

A prima facie case of such combination and restraint of competition, made out by facts and circumstances giving rise to a strong inference thereof, is aided by the failure of the purchasers to deny the inculpatory facts, and calls for relief.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Taxation, Cent. Dig. § 1356; Dec. Dig. § 677.*]

3. TAXATION (§ 743*)—SALES—COMBINATION AMONG BIDDERS—SUBSEQUENT GRANTEE.

A deed so acquired will not be set aside as to a grantee of the purchaser, if he establishes the fact that he is a bona fide purchaser for a valuable consideration; but the burden is upon him to show that he is a good-faith purchaser for a valuable consideration.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Taxation, Cent. Dig. §§ 1485-1488; Dec. Dig. § 743.*]

4. TAXATION (§ 743*)—SALES—COMBINATION AMONG BIDDERS—BURDEN OF PROOF.

Such subsequent purchaser must deny notice of the misconduct of his grantor, whether it be alleged or not, and the burden of proof thereof is on the party seeking relief against him; but he must both plead and prove the payment of consideration.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Taxation, Cent. Dig. § 1487; Dec. Dig. § 743.*]

5. TAXATION (§ 689*)—SETTING ASIDE DEED—REPAYMENT OF TAXES.

Equity will not set aside a tax deed without providing for repayment of the taxes, interest, and costs paid by the purchaser, except in those cases in which the taxation itself is illegal, or the taxes have been paid, and the bill should tender payment thereof, or aver willingness on the part of the plaintiff to pay the same; but, if such offer to do equity be omitted, the defect may be cured by a tender or offer of the money in court before, or on, the entry of the decree.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Taxation, Cent. Dig. § 1385; Dec. Dig. § 689.*]

6. TAXATION (§ 689*)—SETTING ASIDE DEED—WRIT OF POSSESSION.

On setting aside a tax deed, the court may award the plaintiff a writ for the possession of the land, if the purchaser is in possession thereof at the time of the rendition of the decree.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Taxation, Cent. Dig. § 1385; Dec. Dig. § 689.*]

7. TAXATION (§ 689*)—SETTING ASIDE DEED—INJUNCTION.

In such case an injunction should not be awarded to restrain the defendant from acts of dominion over the land, since the plaintiff, on being restored to his possession, will be able to invoke proper remedies for his protection, and there is no presumption that further acts of molestation will be done by the defendant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Taxation, Cent. Dig. § 1385; Dec. Dig. § 689.*]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from Circuit Court, Barbour County.

Action by Isaac J. Lohr against William T. George and others to set aside a tax deed. Decree for defendants, and complainant appeals. Reversed and remanded, with directions.

Fred O. Blue, for appellant. J. Hop Woods, for appellees.

POFFENBARGER, J. Isaac J. Lohr and wife owned a 16-acre tract of land in Barbour county, which was charged with taxes in the name of Isaac J. Lohr for the years 1898 and 1899, as a tract of 11 acres and 30 poles, and for the years 1900, 1901, 1902, and 1903, as a tract of 16 acres. It was returned as delinquent for nonpayment of the taxes for the year 1899, in the name of D. J. Lohr, and sold for such delinquency in December, 1901, in the name of B. J. Lohr; William T. George being the purchaser. A surveyor's report, subsequently made, describes it as land conveyed to Isaac J. Lohr and Mary V. Lohr, and as having become delinquent in the name of D. J. Lohr. The clerk of the county court later executed a deed, based on this report, by which he conveyed the land to S. L. Reger, trustee, assignee of George, and in which he recited that it had been charged with taxes for the year 1899 as a tract of 11 acres and 30 poles in the name of I. J. Lohr. Reger and his cestuis que trustent conveyed it to Chas. W. Rosler, reserving to themselves the coal under it, and Rosler conveyed it to S. L. Wolfe. Lohr had previously conveyed the coal to J. M. Guffey. This suit was brought by Lohr to set aside the tax deed on the ground of irregularities in the tax sale proceedings, and for fraud on the part of George and his associates in effecting the purchase, and the court dismissed the bill.

Want of necessary parties is relied upon as justifying the decree; it appearing from the bill that Mary V. Lohr had died intestate in the year 1898, supposedly leaving heirs, who are not made parties. On her death the plaintiff became seised of an estate by the curtesy in her interest, and so entitled to a freehold in severalty estate in the entire tract. Independently of this he had a right of redemption as a former owner, and his right to set aside this deed, if it is void, is coextensive with his right of redemption. The defect in the proceedings is a mere irregularity in the return of delinquency and sale, clearly cured, after deed made, by the provisions of section 25, c. 31, Code 1899 (Code 1906, § 884). There was a proper and valid assessment, and this statute declares that no mere mistake, irregularity, or defect in the return, delinquent list, or affidavit shall constitute ground for setting aside a deed. Hogan, Adm'r, v. Pig-gott, 60 W. Va. 541, 56 S. E. 189; Hornage v. Imboden, 57 W. Va. 206, 49 S. E. 1036. The distinction between curable and incurable infirmities in tax deeds must be regarded. If there is no delinquent list, no valid sale or deed can be made. Mosser v. Moore, 56 W. Va. 478, 49 S. E. 537; Metz v. Starcher, 60 W. Va. 657, 56 S. E. 196, 116 Am. St. Rep. 925. Some errors in assessments are not cured. Collins v. Reger, 62 W. Va. 196, 57 S. E. 743; Toothman v. Courtney, 62 W. Va. 167, 58 S. E. 915. Here there was a sufficient assessment, a return of delinquency, sale, and return of sales. The defects are simple mistakes in the list, sale, and return of sales. These are expressly cured.

The charge of fraud in the sale is predicated on the testimony of the sheriff who made it. The hypothesis, the plaintiff attempted to establish by this testimony, was that certain persons, including George, the purchaser of this tract, made a pretense of bidding against each other for the purpose of preventing bids in good faith by others, and, having reduced the quantity of land to be taken for the taxes by competitive bidding, they refused to accept it, withdrew all the bids but the first for the whole tract, and so obtained undue advantages. The witness admitted that in some instances the bidders refused to take the land in accordance with their bids, and claimed that he (the sheriff) could then declare it sold to preceding bidders, but said that they had finally taken all the tracts as they had bid them off. He then named some of the persons who had made such contentions. He thought the parties had bidden against each other. Refusals to comply with the bids occurred after the sale, some time in the evening after the crowd attending the sale had dispersed and gone away, and after the sale had been completed; but he protested throughout the examination the contracts were closed as they had been made. These parties had bought nine tracts at less than the quantity charged. Of the 71 tracts sold, they bought 47. He thought they had bid against each other, and, before the sale was closed, withdrew their bids so as to permit bidders for larger quantities to take the land, and said it was a very common occurrence among the parties named. On cross-examination he said he had no recollection that more than one bid was made on the tract of land in question. He made out receipts to the purchasers as it was sold. When speaking of withdrawals of bids, he meant they had occurred prior to the declaration of the sale. Each party got what he bought. He had not reported any sale to any person of more land than he had actually purchased. Only one bid was made on the tract of land involved here, but the answer admits that all the defendants except Rosier and Wolfe "had a joint interest" in "some purchases made by the defendant George, among others the land in controversy." It will be remembered that George had the sheriff convey to S. L. Reger, trustee. George, S. A. Moore, Samuel R. Woods, and R. E. Talbot, joined Reger in the deed to Rosier, and so disclosed their interest. These are the parties as to whom the sheriff said it was "a very common occurrence for them" to bid against each other and then withdraw bids before sale, and permit one of their number to take a greater quantity than that specified in the final bid or lowest bid made. It further appears that they bought 47 of the 71 tracts sold.

Duerr v. Snodgrass, 58 W. Va. 472, 52 S. E. 531, seems to assert that a tax sale may be set aside for fraud, perpetrated by the officer who made it, or the bidders. That such frauds afford ground for setting them aside is undoubted. Cooley on Taxation (3d Ed.) pp. 941, 945, inclusive; Black on Tax Titles (2d Ed.) §§ 246, 247; Blackwell on Tax Titles (5th Ed.) § 557. The text in these works is fully sustained by numerous well-considered decisions, including Slater v. Maxwell, 6 Wall. 263, 18 L. Ed. 790; Dudley v. Little, 2 Ohio, 509, 15 Am. Dec. 575; Eldridge v. Kuehl, 27 Iowa, 161; McCready v. Sexton, 29 Iowa, 356, 4 Am. Rep. 214; Kerwer v. Allen, 31 Iowa, 578; Springer v. Battle, 46 Iowa, 688; Beeson v. Johns, 59 Iowa, 166, 13 N. W. 97; Frank & Darrow v. Arnold, 73 Iowa, 370, 35 N. W. 453; Gallaher v. Head, 108 Iowa, 598, 79 N. W. 387; Merritt v. Poulter, 96 Mo. 237, 9 S. W. 586; Stephens v. Williams, 70 Ind. 536; Brown v. Hogle, 30 Ill. 119. In some of the cases cited, the sales were invalidated because the purchasers prevented competition in bidding by representing that the owners would redeem the land. In others, it appeared that all the bidders had, by agreement, arranged to bid by turn and not against each other. In some others, the officers had virtually made private sales by allowing the purchasers to go through the lists and select, in advance of the sales, the lands they wanted. We think it may be clearly deduced from all the decisions that the fraud, in order to give relief, must have extended to the land as to which relief is asked. In other words, it does not suffice that somebody perpetrated a fraud at the sale in respect to land other than that conveyed by the deed the plaintiff seeks to impeach. This was expressly decided in Eldridge v. Kuehl, cited; the court holding as follows: "Evidence that the purchaser at the tax sale, by his conduct, prevented competition with him by the bidders present in reference to many pieces of land bid for by him, is not admissible to impeach the validity of the sale, where it is not shown that such conduct extended to, or was in some way connected with, the tract in controversy." In Frank & Darrow v. Arnold there was a combination among the bidders which, owing to a disagreement, was interrupted for a time. The evidence showed, however, that the purchase made by Arnold occurred before the bidding by turn ceased. This, the court was particular to note, from which fact it may be inferred the sale would have been upheld if it had been made after the collusive bidding stopped. It has been held that a partnership for the purchase of delinquent lands is contrary to the policy of the law (Dudley v. Little, 2 Ohio, 509, 15 Am. Dec. 575), but a number of well-considered cases are to the contrary (Dawson v. Ward, 71 Tex. 72, 9 S. W. 106; Morrison v. Bank, 81 Ind. 335; Pearson v. Robinson, 44 Iowa, 413). See Black, Tax Titles, § 246, and Blackwell, Tax Titles, § 559. As circumstances, other than mere association in the purchases, are involved here, which, in our opinion, taken together with the fact of association, fully establish the charge that competition was stifled or restrained by the conduct of the purchasers and the combination extended to, and included, the land as to which the bill seeks relief, we are not called upon to say what effect proof of partnership alone among them in the purchases they made would have.

The sheriff says he thinks they resorted to by-bidding. He made the sale. This amounts to saying they did, according to his recollection. They admit that some purchases were made for all in the name of one. This tract was so purchased. Hence the combination extended to it. This makes a prima facie case to which they have not responded. In our opinion the facts disclosed amply justify the inference of a combination in restraint of competition, and there is no evidence whatever tending in the opposite direction. The verdict of a jury predicated upon it could not be disturbed by this court. The charge cannot be presumed and must be proved, but the inference is strengthened by the silence of the defendants. None of them testified. Any of them could have taken the witness stand and denied the charge and contradicted the inculpatory testimony, if they were false. They are not justified by any rule of law or principle of equity in remaining silent with the expectation that the law affords some means of establishing in their favor what they themselves were under a duty to make out by their own testimony. Stout v. Sands, 56 W. Va. 663, 49 S. E. 428; Webb v. Bailey, 41 W. Va. 463, 23 S. E. 644; Union Trust Co. v. McClellan, 40 W. Va. 405, 21 S. E. 1025; Bindley v. Martin, 28 W. Va. 775. Clear proof is required, but the requisite of clearness as well as the degree is fixed by the rules of evidence. These say a prima facie case must prevail unless overcome by opposing evidence, and that failure to meet it by one having evidence at his command gives rise to a strengthening or supporting presumption or inference.

As to the allegations of fraud, we have carefully examined the bill and concluded that they are sufficient. The combination and mode of bidding is charged substantially as above set forth. The bill further alleges that Rosier and Wolfe colluded and conspired with the other defendants, and that they paid no consideration for the successive conveyances made to them. There is no specific or direct averment of notice to them of the circumstances under which, and the method by which, the other defendants acquired the deed, but, as stated, their complicity in the conspiracy is positively and directly charged. The joint and separate answer of all the defendants denies the fraud, collusion, and conspiracy, and also that the consideration expressed in the deeds to Rosier and Wolfe are fictitious; but there is no averment in the answer that any consideration was paid by either Rosier or Wolfe. Aside from the admissions of the answer, it is negative in character all the way through.

From what has been said, it is plain that the deed must be set aside as to all of the defendants except Rosier and Wolfe. Whether their title must fall also depends upon whether their status is the same as that of ordinary purchasers from fraudulent grantees. We think it is. The defect in this conveyance from the sheriff to Reger is not a defect of record. Defects apparent upon the record of tax sales are generally treated as rendering the deeds, not merely voidable, but void. However this may be, the ground of relief here is not such a defect. It is one established by parol evidence, and does not pertain to the record. It makes out, not a legal defect, but a ground of equitable relief. It is a mere equity which may be waived, and therefore makes the deed not void, but voidable. There is authority for the position that a purchaser for value without notice is protected against such a defect. Van Shaach v. Robins, 36 Iowa, 203; Martin v. Ragsdale, 49 Iowa, 589.

Such being the principle by which the rights of Rosler and Wolfe are to be determined, the next inquiry is whether they have made out a case of bona fide purchasers. This is an affirmative defense, except as to the matter of notice, which they must deny, whether averred in the bill or not. Downman v. Rust, 6 Rand. (Va.) 587; Tompkins v. Mitchell, 2 Rand. (Va.) 430; Bowlby v. Dewitt, 47 W. Va. 323, 327, 34 S. E. 919. Notice having been denied, the burden of proof as to it is on the plaintiff or the party who alleges the fraud. 2 Min. Ins. 887; Carter v. Allen, 21 Grat. (Va.) 241; Vest v. Michie, 31 Grat. (Va.) 149, 31 Am. Rep. 722; Farley v. Bateman, 40 W. Va. 540, 22 S. E. 72. This last case says the fact of notice may be inferred from circumstances, as well as proved by direct evidence, and that facts and circumstances may raise the presumption of notice, so as to shift the burden of proof; but it asserts that the burden in the first instance is upon the party seeking relief. As the answer denies collusion, conspiracy, and fraud, alleged against all of the defendants, we are of the opinion that it sufficiently denies notice; but it is deficient in that it does not aver payment of any consideration. Essential elements of this defense are the payment of a valuable consideration and a fair price for the property, and these must be averred in the answer or plea. Bowlby v. Dewitt, 47 W. Va. 323, 34 S. E. 919; Speldel Grocery Co. v. Stark, 62 W. Va. 512, 59 S. E. 498; Poling v. Flanagan, 41 W. Va. 191, 23 S. E. 635; Curtin v. Isaacs, 36 W. Va. 391, 15 S. E. 171; Bindley v. Martin, 28 W. Va. 773; Colston v. Miller, 55 W. Va. 490, 47 S. E. 268; Doswell v. Buchanan, 3 Leigh (Va.) 365, 381, 23 Am. Dec. 280; Mutual Assur. Soc. v. Stone, 3 Leigh (Va.) 218; Hoover v. Donally, 3 Hen. & M. 316. Rosler testified that he had paid the amount specified in his deed as the consideration for the conveyance, but this avails him nothing in view of his failure to plead such payment. As to him and Wolfe both, the basis for such evidence should have been laid in the answer.

From the conclusions above stated, it results that the court below should have set aside these deeds, unless there is something in the objection that the bill fails to tender, or allege a tender of, the taxes and cost paid by the purchasers. There is no such allegation in the bill; but it appears from a memorandum, appended to the final decree dismissing it, that the plaintiff, after the announcement of the decree, offered to pay to the defendants in open court the amount to which they were entitled. At the time of this offer, the court still had control of the case. The bill is complete in everything except the offer to do equity. It sufficiently alleges the fraud, but fails to bring the plaintiff within a condition imposed by the rules of equity procedure. This condition applies, not before suit brought, but merely before the relief is granted. A tender in court, on or before the entry of the decree, places the plaintiff within the rule. The offer to do equity may be incorporated in the bill, and generally is, and its omission is a ground of demurrer; but, since a tender of the taxes, interest, and costs is not a condition precedent to the right of action, we perceive no reason why the tender or offer to pay in open court, though not alleged in the bill, does not cure the defect. The imposition of this duty upon the plaintiff concerns his conduct in court as a supplicant for relief, rather than his cause of action against the defendant. We think, therefore, his submission, in any form, to the rule requiring him to do equity, suffices, and from this conclusion it follows that the court below should have ascertained the amount due the defendants, and, on payment thereof, set aside the deeds complained of. It has been suggested in some of our decisions that a decree might be entered setting aside a void tax deed conditionally; that is, on the payment of the purchase money. While this may be proper, it seems to us the court should make a finality of the cause by requiring the money to be paid to the defendant or into court, or by setting aside the deeds and decreeing a lien on the land in favor of the defendant for the taxes, interest, and costs.

After the execution of the deed to Wolfe, he took possession of the land, and the other defendants aided him in maintaining it. The bill prays an injunction inhibiting and restraining them from the exercise of dominion over it, but no preliminary injunction was awarded. As the court has jurisdiction, and the pretensions of the defendants rest solely on the tax deed, it may, on setting aside the deed, give full and complete relief in the premises, by awarding the plaintiff a writ for the possession of the land. We do not think an injunction is necessary. On the adjudication of the invalidity of the tax deed, nothing will remain as the basis of a claim of title, on the part of the defendants, and it is not to be presumed that they will continue their efforts to hold the land. If they should, the plaintiff will be in possession and able to invoke such remedies for his protection as are afforded other owners of real estate who are in possession thereof.

For the reasons stated, the decree complained of will be reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to ascertain the amount due the defendants, and, on payment thereof by the plaintiff, to cancel and set aside the three deeds complained of in the bill and award the plaintiff a writ for the possession of the land.

Reversed and remanded.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Putnam County.

Bill by H. C. Brown and others against Philip Click, administrator, and others. Decree for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

J. W. English and Null & Higgins, for appellants. Rankin Wiley, for appellees.

WILLIAMS, J. This is an appeal from a decree of the circuit court of Putnam county made on the 17th day of August, 1907, directing Rankin Wiley, substituted trustee, to sell certain real estate under a deed of trust given by H. C. Brown and E. R. Brown, his wife, to secure a debt to defendant's intestate, C. Click, deceased.

W. L. Higgins was the original trustee, and was required by Click's administrator to give bond under the provision of section 3053 of the Code of 1906, and, failing to do so, notice was given to Brown and wife and said Higgins, trustee, by said administrator, that he would apply to the circuit court in term on the 14th day of November, 1906, to appoint a trustee in his place. The court appointed said Wiley in his stead, and Wiley thereupon gave bond as substituted trustee and published notice in a newspaper that he would sell the property publicly in front of the courthouse on the 30th day of January, 1907. There appears to have been two adjournments of the sale, first, to the 12th of February, 1907, and again to the 27th of February, 1907, by a continuation of the original notice in the paper and subjoining thereto notices of the adjournments of the sale. Plaintiffs presented to the circuit judge, in vacation, their bill praying for an injunction against the sale on the grounds: (1) That the original trustee had been improperly removed; (2) that notice of sale had not been served on the grantors as required by section 3056 of the Code of 1906; (3) that proper notices of the adjournments of sale had not been given. These points are also assigned as errors committed by the lower court in dissolving the injunction and directing a sale, and as an additional error it is assigned (4) that it was improper to direct a sale without ascertaining the amount of the debt. On the 21st of February, 1907, the judge, in vacation, granted a temporary injunction, and on the 15th of May, in term, the defendant demurred to and answered the bill. Plaintiffs excepted to the answer and objected to its filing, which were overruled. No written exceptions were filed. The case was heard at the August term, 1907, on bill and exhibits and answer, and the decree appealed from was entered. This decree does not expressly dissolve the injunction, but does so, in effect, by directing the trustee to make sale according to the terms and conditions of the deed of trust.

Some affidavits appear in the record, but as they are not identified by the pleadings, or by any order of the court, they cannot be considered as being any part of the record. Trump v. Tidewater C. & C. Co., 46 W. Va. 238, 32 S. E. 1035; Bias v. C. & O. Ry. Co., 46 W. Va. 349, 33 S. E. 240; Washington National B. & L. Ass'n v. Westfall, 55 W. Va. 305, 47 S. E. 74; Bloss v. Hull, 27 W. Va. 503. No replication was made, and no proof taken. Consequently under the well-established rule of equity practice, the allegations of the answer must be taken as true. Wilt v. Huffman, 46 W. Va. 473, 33 S. E. 279, and Bierne v. Ray, 37 W. Va. 571, 16 S. E. 804.

As to the errors assigned: The first is not good, because the removal of the original trustee and the appointment of Wiley in his stead is collateral to this proceeding and cannot be reviewed upon this appeal. That proceeding is not void. The order therein made is final, and if erroneous must be corrected by writ of error. The answer denies plaintiff's allegation that notice of the sale was not served upon the grantors, and under the rule of pleading above stated we are bound to hold that notice was served upon them. This disposes of the second point relied on. A copy of the notice of sale published in some newspaper is made an exhibit with the bill, from which it appears that the notice of the two adjournments of sale was given by continuing the publication of the original notice, and inserting just below it this notice of postponement. This is usual, and we see no objection to it. We therefore hold the third point not good. The fourth point relied on is that it was error to decree a sale without ascertaining the debt. Plaintiffs do not controvert the debt, nor allege payments. There are no facts alleged which would tend to render the amount of the debt uncertain. The trust deed makes it certain as to the amount and the time it bears interest, and so this assignment we hold also to be groundless. Watterson v. Miller. 42 W. Va. 108, 24 S. E. 578.

We find no error in the decree appealed from, and affirm it.

KEYSTONE LUMBER & MINING CO. v. BROOKS.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
April 20, 1909.)

LOGS AND LOGGING (§ 3*)—SALE OF TIMBER—FAILURE TO REMOVE.

In case of a deed conveying legal title to timber, though the deed contemplates removal of timber, there being no limit of time for removal and no clause of forfeiture for failure to remove, title to the timber is not lost to the purchaser for such failure.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Logs and Logging, Cent. Dig. § 11; Dec. Dig. § 3.*]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error to Circuit Court, Webster County.

Action by the Keystone Lumber & Mining Company against Arthur Brooks. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Haymond & Fox, for plaintiff in error.
Morrison & Talbott, Morton & Woddell, and Brown, Jackson & Knight, for defendant in error.

BRANNON, J. By deed June 16, 1900, in consideration of $23,000, half in cash, the Keystone Lumber & Mining Company conveyed to George W. Barricklow certain timber by the language: "Does grant unto the party of the second part all kinds of timber standing or being on all that certain tract of land lying and being in the county of Webster in the state of West Virginia on the waters of Laurel creek and Birch river, and bounded and described as follows," containing 3,986 acres, more or less. Next comes the clause: "Together with the right to second party to enter upon and use the land so far as is necessary or required in manufacturing and removing said timber, free of any rental or charge whatsoever for a period of six (6) years for that part of said land drained by Birch river and Beaver creek and tributaries thereof and for a period of two (2) years for that part drained by Glade Run and Laurel creek and tributaries with the right to construct road and tramways and place mills thereon and to remove the same at any time during, at or after the periods of time above mentioned." The deed closes with the clause: "The party of the first part covenants that it will warrant generally the title to the timber and other property hereby conveyed." Barricklow conveyed to the Union Lumber Company all that part of the timber on the Birch river and Beaver creek side, and later the Union Lumber Company conveyed same to Arthur Brooks. Brooks put on the land a costly mill, constructed an incline with steam hoisting engines, tramroads, houses for employes, and means of removing timber and converting it into lumber, employing many men and teams, and pursuing the work actively. Shortly before the expiration of the six years specified in the deed from the Keystone Company to Barricklow, Brooks learned that the company considered that deed as one giving a time limit of six years, so that all rights of Brooks to cut or remove timber and hold possession of the land would then expire, and all timber remaining then unfelled and that felled lying on the land not converted into lumber would revert to the company, and he felled all the timber on the land, and refusing to acknowledge this claim of the company, and refusing to quit possession of the land, but proceeding in the work of converting the timber into lumber, the Keystone Company brought an action of unlawful entry and detainer, and a jury having found Brooks not guilty of unlawfully withholding the possession of the land, and judgment having been rendered for the defendant, the Keystone Company obtained a writ of error from this court.

The case turns on the construction of the deed. The Keystone Company says that it gives a limit of six years' time for the severance and removal of the timber from the land, after which rights of Brooks end, and timber standing or in felled trees or logs not yet converted into lumber would revert to the Keystone Company and be lost to Brooks, not by forfeiture, as the Keystone Company contends, but because the deed only conveys so much timber as in a bona fide intent to manufacture into lumber could be so cut and manufactured within that time. In case of a conveyance of timber, with a time limit requiring its removal from the land in a given time, the weight of authority is that the conveyance is conditional; the purchaser taking only what timber shall be removed within that time, and the balance reverting to the owner of the land, or rather remaining his. Null v. Elliott, 52 W. Va. 229, 43 S. E. 173; Adkins v. Huff, 58 W. Va. 645, 52 S. E. 773, 3 L. R. A. (N. S.) 649; 28 Am. & Eng. Ency. L. 541. We cannot concur in such a construction of the deed. Look at it. There is at the outset the separate, distinct, vital clause found in deeds of grant, prescribed in our Code as a form "to convey the grantor's whole interest" in the thing granted, having the operative words "does grant." That vests full legal title in the grantee to the timber. Where do we find in this granting clause any words to tell us that only so much of the timber as may be removed within six years is granted? To the reverse, the grant is "all and all kinds of timber," without limitation of time for removal. This important section of the deed contains no limit of time, no forfeiture clause for nonremoval. If timber is conveyed, and no limit of time as to removal, the title vests absolutely in the grantee, and it is not lost or forfeited by reason of the fact that it is not removed in a reasonable time. Magnetic Ore Co. v. Markbury L. Co., 104 Ala. 465, 16 South. 632, 27 L. R. A. 433, 53 Am. St. Rep. 73; Holt v. Stratton Mills, 54 N. H. 109, 20 Am. Rep. 119. In the latter case the court says: "In such a sale there is no foundation for an exception to the general rules of land or to make that a conditional conveyance of trees which would be an absolute conveyance of other property." In the Magnetic Ore Case the court asserted the same. The Keystone Company would in effect insert a condition subsequent defeating the title or right of Barricklow. Conditions are not to be raised by inference or argument. 2 Devlin on Deeds, § 970. Conditions subsequent are not favored in law, "because they tend to destroy estates, and a vigorous exaction of them is a species of summum jus, and in many cases not reconcilable with conscience." 4 Kent, 129. Rawson v. Inhabitants, 7 Allen (Mass.) 125, 83 Am. Dec. 670, and other authorities in Zimmerman v. Daffin, 149 Ala. 380, 42 South. 858, 9 L. R. A. (N. S.) 663, 123 Am. St. Rep. 65, where there was a time limit, the court said that if the intent was that, at the close of the limit, the failure to remove should work a reverter, it would have been easy to have said so; but that on the face of the instrument it was, at least, a question of doubt whether the limitation was a condition subsequent, or a covenant, not operating as a clause of forfeiture, citing cases so holding. There we see that, "if it be doubtful whether a clause imports a condition or a covenant, the latter construction will be adopted." If such the case where there is a time limit, how much more so where there is none, and the only covenant is one to be implied? It is a mere covenant. So the construction of the deed does not give it a time limit for removal of the timber, so as to give the Keystone Company any timber, whether standing, or in felled trees or logs. Without such limit, or some forfeiture clause, the title thereto remains in Brooks. The law does not imply such limit or condition. Ludwick L. Co. v. Taylor, 100 Tex. 270, 98 S. W. 238, 123 Am. St. Rep. 805.

But that granting clause alone does not, as contended by counsel, solve the case, though we think it does being a grant without condition. It is claimed that the clause beginning, "together with," fixes a time limit of six years for removal of the timber. It gives right to enter upon the land and use it for removing and manufacturing the timber, "free of any rental or charge for six years." That period, in its connection in the sentence, only applies to fix the term or limit of freedom from rental. In its place in the deed it has no reference to time fixed for removal of timber. It is immediate in place after, or is a very part of, the clause giving right to use the land for removing and manufacturing timber. Why take it from that clause and carry the six years' provision back over that clause, and connect it with the granting clause, and qualify the latter clause by saying that the grant must be used within six years? In place and in sense it belongs to the clause giving right to occupy the land. It has a function to perform in that clause. It is needed there. It serves only to limit the period during which no charge was to be made for the use of the land. It is no covenant by Barricklow. There is no express covenant by Barricklow to remove the timber at any time. The most we could say as to this is that the deed contemplates a removal, and that thus a covenant to remove is implied. Likely so. But it is only a covenant, not a time limit, not a condition operating as a forfeiture. It would only demand removal in a reasonable time. Delay unreasonable might be the subject of action for breach, or the cause of some legal procedure. We say not as to this; but we do say it does not work a loss of Barricklow's vested title. In Zimmerman v. Daffin, 149 Ala. 380, 42 South. 858, 9 L. R. A. (N. S.) 663, 123 Am. St. Rep. 65, where there was a time limit, the court said that if the intent was that, at the close of the limit, the failure to remove should work a reverter, it would have been easy to have said so; but that on the face of the instrument it was, at least, a question of doubt whether the limitation was a condition subsequent, or a covenant, not operating as a clause of forfeiture, citing cases so holding. There we see that, "if it be doubtful whether a clause imports a condition or a covenant, the latter construction will be adopted." If such the case where there is a time limit, how much more so where there is none, and the only covenant is one to be implied? It is a mere covenant. So the construction of the deed does not give it a time limit for removal of the timber, so as to give the Keystone Company any timber, whether standing, or in felled trees or logs. Without such limit, or some forfeiture clause, the title thereto remains in Brooks. The law does not imply such limit or condition. Ludwick L. Co. v. Taylor, 100 Tex. 270, 98 S. W. 238, 123 Am. St. Rep. 805.

The Keystone Company asserts that the timber not removed within six years became or remained its property, as according to its theory that the deed passed only so much timber as should be so removed. The above authorities deny this. There is no time limit; but, even if there were, the timber, having been severed from the land, and thus made personalty, would be the property of Brooks. Null v. Elliott, 52 W. Va. 231, 43 S. E. 173; Adkins v. Huff, 58 W. Va. 645, 52 S. E. 773, 3 L. R. A. (N. S.) 649. The courts say that severance is removal within the meaning of time-limit deeds. Williams v. Flood, 63 Mich. 493, 30 N. W. 93; Hicks v. Smith, 77 Wis. 146, 46 N. W. 133.

This is not an action to recover trees down, or logs, or damages. It is unlawful entry and detainer; the plaintiff expecting, likely, if Brooks should be put out, to take possession of the trees and logs. The question here is: Has Brooks right to retain such partial possession as is necessary to work up the timber? Recurring to the deed, we find it in words to give Barricklow right "to enter upon and use the land so far as is necessary or required in manufacturing and removing said timber." As we hold that the deed passed unconditional title to the timber, and that there is no time limit or condition of forfeiture to destroy his right, it follows, under the clause just quoted, that Brooks has right to hold possession until the work closes. This right comes from the deed. If Brooks still holds title to the timber, what avails that right without continued possession? When an owner grants coal away, the law, without any provision in the deed, implies and confers right to enter and hold such possession and use of the land as are necessary to remove the coal. Otherwise the coal would have no value. 27 Cyc. 688; Snyder on Mines, § 1007; Marvin v. Brewster, 55 N. Y. 538, 14 Am. Rep. 322. So with timber granted away. Judge Dent, in Null v. Elliott, 52 W. Va. 229, 43 S. E. 173, said that in a time-limit contract there is an implied right after the limit to enter and remove timber cut before the end of the limit. This expression is challenged as not good law, but we think the cases cited by Judge Dent sustain his statement. We now refer to Ludwick v. Taylor, 100 Tex. 270, 98 S. W. 238, 123 Am. St. Rep. 803, holding that a conveyance of all the timber on a tract "is a conveyance of the timber with an interest in the land, with the right to cut it any time without importing into such grant that it must be cut within a reasonable time." The court says: "There goes with the title to the timber right to use the soil for its sustenance and of entry upon the land for its enjoyment." It does seem to me that there is force in the view that the mere grant of timber does carry right of entry and possession to remove the timber. It would as to coal. See 104 Ala. 465, 16 South. 632, 27 L. R. A. 434, 53 Am. St. Rep. 73. The opinion by Judge Poffenbarger, 58 W. Va. 650, 52 S. E. 775 (3 L. R. A. [N. S.] 649), asserts the position that, when timber is conveyed with warranty, "it conveys an interest in the land, though there be a time limit; but it vests either a defeasible title to the timber or a leasehold estate for the time limited, with a right of appropriation during the term." That is where there is a time limit. In this case there is none. There is a qualified interest in the land, right of partial possession to enable the owner of the timber to remove it. So the Keystone Company could not maintain this action against Brooks.

In view of the construction which we give the deed, it is unnecessary to discuss other questions, since they turn on it, and would not be ground of reversal.

Judgment affirmed.

STATE v. MARKS.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
March 12, 1907. On Rehearing, April 20, 1909.)

INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 147*) — PLACE OF SALE.

One who as agent for a retail liquor dealer licensed in one county solicits and receives orders for his principal in another county for liquors, to be forwarded to his principal at the licensed place of business, and there filled and shipped C. O. D. to the customer, and who does not deliver the goods or receive the money for his principal, is not guilty of the offense of selling, offering, or exposing for sale, or soliciting and receiving orders for, spirituous liquors, etc., as provided in section 1, c. 32, Code 1899 (Code 1906, § 913).

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error to Circuit Court, Raleigh County.

J. L. Marks was convicted of a violation of the local option law, and brings error. Reversed.

J. Lewis Bumgardner, Osenton & McPeak, Holt & Duncan, and McGinnis & Hatcher, for plaintiff in error. C. W. May, Atty. Gen., Wm. G. Conley, and A. A. Lilly, for the State.

MILLER, J. The defendant, J. L. Marks, was indicted in the circuit court of Raleigh county at the July term, 1905, thereof, charged with unlawfully, without a state license therefor, selling, offering, and exposing for sale and soliciting and receiving orders for spirituous liquors, wines, porter, ale, beer, and drinks of like nature. The case was tried by agreement of parties before the court in lieu of a jury upon the following agreed state of facts: "That the Fayette Liquor Company, a copartnership, the members of which are J. P. Chapman and W. E. Deegans, trading under the firm name and style of the Fayette Liquor Company, has both wholesale and retail liquor dealers license, issued by the county court of Fayette county, to carry on its business as wholesale and retail liquor dealers at Beury, Fayette county, W. Va., for the license year 1905. That the said firm employed the defendant, J. L. Marks, as its agent and traveling salesman to represent both the wholesale and retail branches of its business, and to travel through Fayette, Raleigh, Nicholas, Logan, and Wyoming counties, and solicit and receive orders for the sale of spirituous liquors, wines, porter, ale, beer, and drinks of like nature, at wholesale and retail, to be shipped by express from the place of business of the said firm at Beury, Fayette county, W. Va. That the defendant, J. L. Marks, acting as such agent and traveling salesman of said firm, the Fayette Liquor Company, did in the county of Raleigh on the 1st day of June, 1905, and during the period covered by the retail license aforesaid, in the course of his employment solicit and receive from James Cousins an order for one gallon of whisky, to be shipped in a jug by express C. O. D. from the Fayette Liquor Company at Beury, Fayette county, W. Va., to the Adams Express office at Stanaford, in Raleigh county, W. Va., in the name of said James Cousins; that the said Fayette Liquor Company received the order, and filled a gallon jug with whisky, and delivered the same to the Adams Express Company at Beury, Fayette County, W. Va., addressed to the said James Cousins at Stanaford, Raleigh county, W. Va. That the said James Cousins received from the express office at Stanaford, Raleigh county, W. Va., the jug of whisky aforesaid, and paid to the express agent the sum of $3, the price therefor and the express charges, and that the express agent at said place transmitted the sum of $2.50, the price of said liquor, to the Fayette Liquor Company at Beury, W. Va. That the said J. L. Marks had no authority from said company except to solicit and receive orders as aforesaid, which were sent to the said company by said Marks for their final ratification and approval, and to be shipped to the consignee as aforesaid. That the said Marks had no authority to collect any money or to deliver whisky except in the manner aforesaid, and that he did not collect any money or deliver whisky. That Raleigh county is a 'dry' county; that is, no licenses were issued in said county for the license years of 1904 and 1905 for the sale of spirituous liquors, etc."

There was a demurrer to the indictment, which was overruled; no grounds being assigned. The indictment was in the usual form in such cases. The point made here by the plaintiff in error is that the indictment was bad for charging defendant with two separate and distinct offenses, namely: (a) Selling liquor without a license; (b) soliciting and receiving orders for the sale of liquors without a license. The indictment is founded on section 1, c. 32, Code 1906, which makes it unlawful for any person without a state license therefor to sell, offer, or expose for sale and solicit or receive orders for the sale of spirituous liquors, wines, porter, ale, beer, and drinks of like nature. By its disjunctive provisions it would seem to make selling, offering, and exposing for sale, and soliciting and receiving orders for, spirituous liquors, each separate and distinct subjects for a state license. The law makes no such provision. The license imposed is for selling spirituous liquors, by section 87 at retail and by section 88 at wholesale. How would one acquire a license under this law, for instance, to offer or expose for sale? Is it not plain that the provision of section 1 referred to must be interpreted as if it read: "No person shall sell or offer or expose for sale, or solicit or receive orders for spirituous liquors, wines, porter, ale, beer and drinks of like nature, without a state license to sell the same"? If the person offending is armed with a state license to sell at wholesale or retail as provided by sections 87 and 88, may he not offer or expose for sale or solicit or receive orders for spirituous liquors without offending against the law? We can see no escape from the conclusion that he can do so. The selling of the liquor is the thing which the statute intended to provide against; but one can neither offer or expose for sale nor solicit or receive orders without a license to sell. Such sale, it is true, cannot be effectuated without a violation of the law, unless it is made to be executed at the place where the sale is authorized. We think the indictment good, therefore, and that two separate offenses are not charged. State v. Hall, 26 W. Va. 236; State v. Swift, 35 W. Va. 543, 14 S. E. 135.

The only remaining question for consideration upon the agreed state of facts is: Is the defendant Marks guilty of any offense under the indictment for having solicited and received an order for one gallon of whisky from James Cousins in Raleigh county as agent and travelling salesman for the Fayette Liquor Company? It is agreed that this firm has a retail and a wholesale liquor license in Fayette county. These license laws are not prohibitory laws. They are revenue laws, enacted for the purpose of raising revenue for the support of the state. While it is permitted to the several counties and municipalities in which liquor may be sold to say whether or not they will suffer persons to establish licensed places of business therein, yet we must interpret these laws looking through the eye of a Legislature at the purpose in view. We must read them in light of the fact, which was patent to the Legislature when adopting these laws, that the federal Constitution, as interpreted by the Supreme Court of the United States, protects nonresident wholesale and retail dealers in sending their soliciting agents into all parts of the state to solicit and receive orders for spirituous liquors; and that, if we should interpret our laws so as to exclude, for example, a wholesale liquor dealer of this state from sending his agents from his place of business in one county into other counties to solicit and receive orders for goods in the same way, we would defeat the revenue object of the statute; for no resident wholesale dealer could pay the license and compete with a nonresident dealer.

Such being the reason of the law, let us look at the case at bar from this standpoint and in the light of the prior decisions of this court on the points involved. In State v. Hughes, 22 W. Va. 743, decided in 1883, before the words "solicit and receive orders" were inserted in the statute by the act of 1887, it was held that a partner of a licensed liquor firm in Wood county, who solicited and received orders for his firm in Taylor county, which he forwarded to his firm in Wood county to fill, and who subsequently collected the price, could not be indicted in Taylor county for selling without license, because the sale and transfer of property were made in Wood county on acceptance of the order and delivery to the express agent; there being until then only an executory contract. In State v. Lichtenstein, 44 W. Va. 99, 28 S. E. 753, the defendant was held not guilty for selling and soliciting and receiving orders for liquors in Mineral county without a license, to be shipped to the purchaser from his house in Cumberland, Md., for the reason that no sale took place in Mineral county, as decided in State v. Hughes. In this case section 1 of chapter 32 of the Code was held void so far as it affected interstate commerce. In State v. Wheat, 48 W. Va. 259, 37 S. E. 544, it was held "immaterial that the law confines the license to business at a particular place or one county, since the solicitation and receipt of orders are not for sale and delivery in other counties, but for sale to be executed as consummated contracts at the place and in the county designated in the license; that is, the place of sale." In this case a liquor dealer in Ohio county solicited orders by means of circulars addressed to persons in Brooke county, and was indicted for a sale in Brooke county. Judge Brannon said in this case: "A wholesale business, for success, requires solicitation for orders, and it is usual for wholesale dealers to send out agents and circulars asking custom; * * * the privilege of soliciting and receiving orders being incident to the sale license, and it may be exercised as an attendant upon such wholesale license anywhere either in person or by agent. If this is not so, the wholesale dealer, though he has paid for his license, would be deprived of rights essential to his business, and would be in soliciting confined to his county; indeed, he would be confined to his place of business." In distinguishing this case from State v. Swift, supra, Judge Brannon says: "That case did not involve the rights of one having a wholesale liquor license, but involved the rights of a druggist who can sell only for specific purposes, and it was not shown in that case that the sale was for the purpose authorized by the druggist license. This case involves the rights of one having a lawful wholesale liquor license." The only real difference between the case at bar and the case of State v. Wheat is that in the Wheat Case the wholesale dealer solicited by means of circular letters addressed to the customer in another county, and in this case the liquor company sent its agent to solicit the order. But Judge Brannon says in State v. Wheat that the dealer may solicit orders anywhere, either in person or by agent. The Attorney General in his brief in this case admits that the decision in the Wheat Case is very nearly a decision of the case at bar, and the only difference he claims is the one just noted. We think the distinction is without difference. If it be true, as was held in State v. Hughes, that a partner of a licensed house might without violating the law solicit orders in another county without being liable in the county of solicitation, and, as was held in State v. Flanagan, 38 W. Va. 53, 17 S. E. 792, 22 L. R. A. 430, 45 Am. St. Rep. 836, that a licensed dealer in one county might accept an order from a customer in another county and ship the same by the agency of the express company C. O. D. and collect the money through that agency, and, as was held in State v. Wheat, might send his circular letter and in that way solicit and receive orders from persons in other counties without rendering himself amenable to law—there is no escape from the conclusion which we now reach, that the defendant in this case was not guilty of the charge in the indictment, and we so hold.

In our opinion, therefore, the circuit court erred in finding the defendant Marks guilty of the offense charged. We therefore reverse, set aside, and annul the judgment of the circuit court of Raleigh county entered on the 18th day of July, 1905, finding the defendant guilty and adjudging and ordering that he be confined in the county jail of said county for the period of two months, and that the state recover of him the sum of $25, for a fine assessed against him, and the costs of the prosecution. And this court, proceeding to make such finding and enter such judgment as the circuit court of Raleigh county should have found and entered, do find that the prisoner is not guilty upon the agreed state of facts of the offense charged against him, and it is therefore considered by the court that he go thereof without day, and be discharged from further prosecution in this behalf.

On Rehearing.

MILLER, P. We are asked in the light of Delamater v. South Dakota, 205 U. S. 93, 27 Sup. Ct. 447, 51 L. Ed. 724, decided March 11, 1907, to give a different construction to our statute than that given in the opinion filed. The Delamater Case was decided March 11, 1907, the day before we handed down our original opinion in this case, and, of course, that decision was not before us, nor did we know of it until afterwards. The effect of the Delamater decision was to bring within the purview and scope of the so-called Wilson Act (Act Aug. 8, 1890, c. 728, 26 Stat. 313 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3177]) the business of soliciting orders for intoxicating liquors, although such orders might only contemplate a contract resulting from final acceptance in another state, where, as in South Dakota the highest court of the state has held that the act imposing a license on traveling salesmen soliciting orders for intoxicating liquors is a police regulation, and not a taxing act. As formerly construed by the Supreme Court, the provisions of that act were supposed to extend only to intoxicating liquors after they had been brought within the state, and before they became commingled with the mass of other property of the state by a sale in original packages. That act is as follows: "That all fermented, distilled, or other intoxicating liquors or liquids transported into any state or territory or remaining therein for use, consumption, sale or storage therein, shall upon arrival in such state or territory be subject to the operation and effect of the laws of such state or territory enacted in the exercise of its police powers, to the same extent and in the same manner as though such liquids or liquors had been produced in such state or territory, and shall not be exempt therefrom by reason of being introduced therein in original packages or otherwise." With respect thereto, the court says: "The proposition relied upon, therefore, when considered in the light of the Wilson act, reduces itself to this: Albeit the state of South Dakota had power within its territory to prevent the sale of intoxicating liquors, even when shipped into that state from other states, yet South Dakota was wanting in authority to prevent or regulate the carrying on within its borders of the business of soliciting proposals for the purchase of liquors, because the proposals were to be consummated outside of the state, and the liquors to which they related were also outside the state. This, however, but comes to this: That the power existed to prevent sales of liquor, even when brought in from without the state, and yet there was no authority to prevent or regulate the carrying on the accessory business of soliciting orders within the state. Aside, however, from the anomalous situation to which the proposition thus conduces, we think to maintain it would be repugnant to the plain spirit of the Wilson act. That act, as we have seen, manifested the conviction of Congress that control by the states over the traffic of dealing in liquor within their borders was of such importance that it was wise to adopt a special regulation of interstate commerce on the subject. When, then, for the carrying out of this purpose, the regulation expressly provided that intoxicating liquors coming into a state should be as completely under the control of a state as if the liquor had been manufactured therein, it would be, we think, a disregard of the purposes of Congress to hold that the owner of intoxicating liquors in one state can by virtue of the commerce clause go himself or send his agent into such other state, there in defiance of the law of the state, to carry on the business of soliciting proposals for the purchase of intoxicating liquors."

But we do not see what particular bearing the Delamater Case can have on the case in hand. No question of interstate commerce is here involved. We perceive, however, that that case may have a very material bearing thereon when we shall come again to consider a case involving an interstate transaction, such as was involved in State v. Lichtenstein, 44 W. Va. 99, 28 S. E. 753. We have held in this case that an agent of a licensed dealer in one county who solicits orders for his principal in another county is not guilty of the offense provided against by the statute. But our law is designed to regulate within the state the business of selling, offering, or exposing for sale or soliciting and receiving orders for spirituous liquors, and no one within the state without a state license can, by himself or his agent, engage therein. If, then, by virtue of the Wilson act a nonresident dealer is no longer protected by the federal Constitution, why should he without a state license to sell in this state be permitted to carry on by himself or his agents the business of selling or soliciting or receiving orders for spirituous liquors, a privilege not accorded our own citizens? Of course, this is not the question before us in this case, and it is not decided. It will be time to decide this question when such a case shall be presented.

The Legislature is perfectly competent to prohibit the business of soliciting and receiving orders for spirituous liquors without a state license therefor, and make a violation thereof a separate and distinct offense; but we do not think our present statute can be construed to have done so. The Delamater Case furnishes a guide whenever in its wisdom the Legislature shall see fit to act; but, until it has acted, we feel bound by well-recognized canons of construction to adhere to our former conclusions in this case.

ELKINS v. MICHAEL.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
April 29, 1909.)

1. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE (§ 166*)—APPEAL—DISMISSAL.

A defendant, in an action before a justice appealing from a judgment against him, cannot dismiss his appeal, and thus deprive the plaintiff from trying the case and getting judgment against the appellant and his sureties.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Justices of the Peace, Dec. Dig. § 166.*]

2. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE (§ 162*)—APPEAL—EFFECT.

An appeal from a justice's judgment vacates and annuls the judgment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Justices of the Peace, Cent. Dig. § 603; Dec. Dig. § 162.*]

2. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE (§ 166*)—APPEAL—DISMISSAL—PROOF OF CASE BY PLAINTIFF.

When a defendant takes an appeal from the judgment of a justice, and abandons his appeal by asking its dismissal, the court cannot allow the motion, and render the same judgment for the plaintiff as the justice rendered without proof. The plaintiff must prove his case. The former judgment cannot be used as proof.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Justices of the Peace, Dec. Dig. § 166.*]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error to Circuit Court, Preston County.

Action by S. B. Elkins against P. B. Michael. From a judgment of the circuit court dismissing the appeal, plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

Nell J. Fortney, for plaintiff in error. Wm. G. Conley, for defendant in error.

BRANNON, J. S. B. Elkins sued P. B. Michael before a justice of Preston county to recover money due on contract, and, having recovered before the justice, Michael took an appeal to the circuit court, and that court entered an order saying that, on Michael's motion, "and for reasons appearing to the court, this appeal is dismissed." Elkins sued out a writ of error from this judgment.

In this case comes up the question, What is the effect of the dismissal by the court of the appeal? Does it restore the judgment rendered by the justice? The question is material because, if the dismissal restores the judgment of the justice, that dismissal does not harm Elkins, but gives him back his judgment, and thus favors him, and he cannot sustain a writ of error. On the other hand, if the judgment is not restored, it was Elkins' right to have the appeal tried, so that he might get judgment, and he is aggrieved by dismissal. This court has often said that an appeal vacates the judgment of the justice, and calls for a new trial, without regard to the judgment of the justice. Evans v. Taylor, 28 W. Va. 184; Hopkins v. Railroad, 42 W. Va. 537, 28 S. E. 187; De Armit v. Town, 63 W. Va. 300, 60 S. E. 136; Pickenpaugh v. Keenan, 63 W. Va. 304, 60 S. E. 137. It is so stated in Chenoweth v. Keenan, 61 W. Va. 108, 55 S. E. 991, and there is a discussion of matters pertinent to this question. We conclude that, as the appeal vacates the justice's judgment, and is the grant of a new trial, like the grant of a new trial in a circuit court, and as the papers go out of the justice's court into the circuit court, and as bond is given to answer such judgment as the circuit court may render, and as the Code says the appeal—that is, the action—shall be tried without regard to the judgment of the justice, the dismissal of the appeal does not restore the judgment. Will the justice issue execution? He would say that the case had left his forum. There is no law by which, when the appeal has been dismissed, the dismissal shall be certified to this court to tell him that he should execute his judgment; no statute provision of that kind. Proceedings in justices' courts are only those allowed by statute. I think that De Armit v. Town, supra, virtually so decides. Taking the dismissal of the appeal as a dismissal of the action, without good ground, the action of the court is error of which Elkins may complain. The dismissal of the appeal is a dismissal of the action. The one cannot be expelled from the court and the other remain. The appeal is not in itself an action. It is only a name given to removal. It is a removal of the suit from one court to another for retrial. When we had the county court with jurisdiction as prescribed by the Constitution of 1872, we had a statute allowing a removal of a suit before trial from that court to the circuit court. Acts 1875, p. 127, c. 56. Nothing was left in the county court. An appeal leaves nothing, except the justice's docket, in the justice's court. The action has left his court forever. I am of opinion that when a judgment is given by a justice against a defendant, and he appeals, he cannot dismiss the appeal. Why? Because his appeal has only set aside the judgment, and removed the action into the circuit court for retrial, and what right has he to dismiss that action? The plaintiff's judgment has been vacated by the defendant's appeal, and the case transferred for retrial. He is entitled to get judgment again. The appeal has performed its function, only the action is left. By dismissing the appeal the court has dismissed the action. There is nothing else to dismiss.

The question arises: When a defendant dismisses or abandons his appeal, what judgment should be given? As he has abandoned his defense, should he be treated as withdrawing a plea and admitting the plaintiff's claim, or making a confession of judgment, and should the court render the same judgment as did the justice, or, taking the action as confessed, render judgment? We conclude that, as the justice's judgment has been annulled by the appeal, it cannot operate as proof for its re-entry, but the plaintiff must prove his case. The fact is the defendant cannot dismiss his appeal. He can confess judgment; but he cannot dismiss the action. He has simply by appeal removed the case into another court. His appeal has done its work of removal; but the action is yet alive, and is still the plaintiff's action. He is entitled to retry his case, and have judgment against the defendant and his sureties in the appeal bond. Pickenpaugh v. Keenan, 63 W. Va. 304, 60 S. E. 137; Chenoweth v. Keenan, 61 W. Va. 108, 55 S. E. 991. So Elkins can complain that he has been sent out of court without being given a trial. Final judgment dismissing his case, with costs against him, has been given. The judgment of dismissal was intended to end Elkins' action. It gave costs of his action to Michael.

No reason for the dismissal of the action is shown. From the justice's docket we see that Michael moved the justice to dismiss the action for want of jurisdiction, as title to real estate would come in question. If that was the ground of dismissal, that ground is not shown. There is not a particle of evidence in the record to show this. The Code demands, in chapter 50, § 50, cl. 12 (Code 1906, § 2001), that if the defendant wishes to make that defense, he must file a written answer, stating, not his mere opinion, but the facts showing that title to real estate will come in question, and swear to the answer, and further says that, if such answer be not filed the justice shall entertain the case, and the defendant shall not dispute the plaintiff's title to the premises. No such answer was filed; no showing that title to realty would come in question.

We reverse the judgment, and overrule the motion of Michael to dismiss his appeal, and we reinstate the appeal upon the docket of the circuit court, and remand the case to that court to be tried according to law.

CICERELLO v. CHESAPEAKE & O. RY. CO.
(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
March 30, 1909. Rehearing Denied
May 14, 1909.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 966*)—DISCRETION OF LOWER COURT—CONTINUANCE.

Refusal to continue a case called for trial because of the absence of leading counsel detained by an engagement in another court, where other competent counsel of record are present, will not be good cause for reversal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 3837; Dec. Dig. § 966.*]

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 966*)—DISCRETION OF LOWER COURT—CONTINUANCE.

Refusal to continue a case because of the absence of a material witness, not shown to have been served with process, and where proper diligence is not shown to have been used to secure the presence of the witness, will not be good cause for reversal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 3837; Dec. Dig. § 966.*]

3. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 29*)—APPOINTMENT—COLLATERAL ATTACK.

The appointment of a nonresident administrator by a county court, though voidable, is not void in this state, and cannot be questioned collaterally; and a special plea tendered, setting up such appointment as a defense, or for the purpose of defeating an action brought by such representative, is properly rejected.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. §§ 178-182; Dec. Dig. § 29.*]

4. RAILROADS (§ 369*)—INJURIES TO PERSONS ON OR NEAR TRACK—EMPLOYÉS OF INDEPENDENT CONTRACTOR.

While it is the duty of employes of an independent contractor employed on or along a railroad to use reasonable care for their safety, yet as between them and the railroad company this duty is reciprocal, and in such cases the law does not require of such employes at work on or along the tracks to maintain a constant lookout for approaching trains, and at the same time pursue their labors, but does require of the operatives of trains an active vigilance, and to give reasonable danger signals to attract the attention of the persons so employed, to avoid doing injury to them, and to enable them to get out of the way of moving trains. Instructions to the jury to the contrary were rightfully rejected.

Brannon, J., dissenting.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error to Circuit Court, Putnam County.

Action by Bruno Cicerello, administrator of the estate of Frank Olivino, deceased, against the Chesapeake & Ohio Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Ferguson & Ellison, Null & Higgins, and C. J. Van Fleet, for defendant in error. Simms, Enslow, Fitzpatrick & Baker, for plaintiff in error.

MILLER, P. The plaintiff, as personal representative of Frank Olivino, deceased, seeks recovery of damages from defendant for negligently causing the death of decedent on February 8, 1907, while employed by Rinehart & Dennis, independent contractors, near Scott station, in Putnam county, in excavating and widening a hill side cut for another track along defendant's main line. Olivino's duty, as alleged, was to keep defendant's main track cleared of the dirt and rock which fell from the steam shovel employed in making the excavation. The negligence charged is that defendant's servants and employes so carelessly and negligently, and with such great force and violence, drove and struck against the said Frank Olivino a certain locomotive with cars attached, thereby inflicting upon him such severe and fatal wounds and injuries, that he then and there died. On the trial there was a verdict and judgment for plaintiff for $1,500, and for errors alleged to have been committed preliminary to and during the progress of the trial, and for refusal of the court below to set aside the verdict and award defendant a new trial, the defendant seeks a reversal of the judgment below.

Of the preliminary rulings complained of the first is that the court refused to continue the case on motion of defendant when called for trial, because of the absence of F. B. Enslow, defendant's leading counsel, and because of the absence of J. B. Thomas, one of its witnesses; and the second is the rejection of defendant's special plea No. 2 tendered. The motion to continue was supported by the affidavits of said Enslow and R. M. Baker, another attorney for the defendant. Baker was also cross-examined on the matter of his affidavit, and the clerk of the court was also examined in relation to the issuance of subpoenas for the witnesses, and the want of service and return thereof. This evidence shows that Enslow was necessarily absent in attendance upon the United States Circuit Court of Appeals at Richmond on the day this case was set for trial, but that Baker, who assisted in the conduct of the trial on behalf of the defendant, was present. The record of the trial shows that Enslow was a member of the well-known firm of Simms & Enslow, or Simms, Enslow, Fitzpatrick & Baker; that defendant's special plea No. 2 was signed by Alexander & Barnhart and R. M. Baker, attorneys, and not by either of the other firms of which Enslow was a member; and that Mr. Alexander was also present and assisted in the trial, and that the defense was conducted with skill and ability. In the case of Rossett v. Gardner, 3 W. Va. 531, relied upon, upon the question of the absence of counsel, it was shown that appellant had used due diligence to be prepared for trial; that one of his counsel was unavoidably absent; and that the other, though present on a preceding day, was for some cause, not explained in the record, absent when the cause was heard, and the appellant was left without the aid of any counsel. In the present case defendant had able counsel present to conduct the trial. In the case of Myers & Axtell, Receivers, v. Trice, 86 Va. 835, 841, 842, 11 S. E. 428, the absence of leading counsel on account of sickness, in connection with the absence of an important witness, not summoned by reason of mistake in name, was held good cause for continuance, and denial of the continuance was on writ of error held sufficient cause for a reversal of the judgment. Several cases are cited by the Virginia court in support of its ruling, two from Georgia, one United States Circuit Court decision, and the case of Rhode Island v. Massachusetts, 11 Pet. 228, 9 L. Ed. 697. In the latter case, says the Virginia court, a continuance was granted by the Supreme Court of the United States upon the ground that the leading attorney for the state of Rhode Island was ill, although the Attorney General of that state was present. The case was of exceptional importance says the court, and that the inference was that the court was influenced more by the deep concern and the high importance of the case than by any purpose to exemplify the rule in such cases. "In all such cases, however," says the Virginia court, "the application should be watched with jealousy, and the discretionary power of the court exercised with caution; but, if there is no sufficient reason to induce the belief that the alleged ground of the motion is feigned, a continuance should be granted, rather than to seriously imperil the just determination of the cause by refusing it." This court further says: "Under the peculiar circumstances of the present case, and especially in view of the very harsh ruling on the preceding motion, we are clearly of opinion that the circuit court erred in refusing to continue the case on the ground of the absence of the leading counsel of the defendants by reason of sickness."

With respect to the absence of the witness Thomas, the evidence shows that he was or had been in the employ of the defendant company, was, in fact, the fireman on the engine at the time of the killing of Olivino; that a subpoena for him and another witness was secured from the clerk only six days before the case was called for trial and sent to the company's counsel at Huntington; that no return of service thereof on Thomas was made, and the testimony of Baker, counsel for defendant on cross-examination, shows that he sent the subpoena for Thomas to the company's superintendent requesting him to secure the presence of Thomas, who, he was told, was at Hinton, and gave directions that an order be given him on the ticket agent there for transportation. He did not know whether Thomas had been served or provided with transportation. We do not think the record shows due diligence on the part of defendant to secure the presence of Thomas. Besides, he was only one of the numerous witnesses present at the time of the killing of the deceased, including the engineer, and who were present and examined as witnesses on the trial and gave testimony. Motions for continuance are generally addressed to the sound discretion of the trial court; the judgment of the court thereon not being reviewable on writ of error and appeal unless there has been manifest abuse of such discretion. Mullinax v. Waybright, 33 W. Va. 84, 10 S. E. 25; Halstead v. Horton, 38 W. Va. 727, 18 S. E. 953; State v. Lane, 44 W. Va. 730, 29 S. E. 1020. It was not shown what was proposed to be proven by the witness. Where the motion to continue is based on the absence of a witness, it must be shown that proper diligence to secure his presence has been used; and, if there is any ground to suspect that the continuance is for delay, it must appear what evidence the absent witness is expected to give. State v. Brown, 62 W. Va. 546, 59 S. E. 508. In Tompkins v. Burgess, 2 W. Va. 187, and Dimmey v. Wheeling, etc., R. Co., 27 W. Va. 83, 55 Am. Rep. 292, it is said that on such motion it must be shown that the same facts cannot be proved by any other witness in attendance, and that the party whose witness is absent cannot proceed in the absence of such witness. The affidavit of Baker is that the witness is material, and that defendant cannot prove the same facts by any one else as he is informed; but on cross-examination it is shown that he does not know what Thomas will swear, except from his report. It is not shown what this report was. It is suggested in brief of counsel, however, that, as Thomas was fireman on the engine that killed deceased, he would be a material witness; he and the engineer being the only two persons on the engine, and that, each seeing what occurred from different points of view, this rendered Thomas a most important witness. But other witnesses were present and gave testimony as to what was seen and heard by them from their several view points, including the ringing of the bell and the blowing of the whistle, and we cannot see that the defendant was greatly prejudiced by the absence of Thomas. We cannot say from this record that there was any abuse of the discretion of the court on the motion to continue. We do not think this a parallel case to the Virginia case. Evidently the court there was more influenced by the arbitrary ruling of the trial court in refusing to continue on the ground of the absence of an important witness than because of the absence of counsel.

Was there error in rejecting special plea No. 2? By this plea defendant challenged the right of plaintiff to maintain this suit upon the ground of nonresidence, being an alien and a subject of the king of Italy, and thereby disqualified and prohibited by sections 3258, 3259, Code 1906, from acting as administrator. One is not disqualified, however, to act as administrator because a citizen of another state or country. Nonresidence would disqualify plaintiff. Butcher v. Kunst (decided at the present term) 64 S. E. 967. The plea by reference to the citizenship of plaintiff seems to imply that citizenship is the equivalent of residency. But can the appointment of the plaintiff be collaterally attacked on the ground of nonresidence? This depends upon whether such appointment would be void or voidable only. It is argued that the appointment of a nonresident administrator is absolutely void, and we are cited to the following cases for this proposition: Scobey v. Gano, 35 Ohio St. 551; Sherman v. Bailou, 8 Cow. (N. Y.) 304; Shipman v. Butterfield, 47 Mich. 487, 11 N. W. 283; and also Bell v. Love, 72 Ga. 125; Dooley v. Bell, 87 Ga. 74, 13 S. E. 284; Grande v. Chaves, 15 Tex. 550; Perry v. St. J. & W. R. R. Co., 29 Kan. 420; Jeffersonville R. R. Co. v. Swayne's Adm'r, 26 Ind. 477; Illinois Cent. R. R. Co. v. C. Cragin, 71 Ill. 177. Some of these cases do seem to support the proposition, the others we do not think do, to the extent claimed. Shipman v. Butterfield, Perry v. St. J. & W. R. R. Co., and Jeffersonville R. R. Co. v. Swayne's Adm'r seem to hold that, where the statute does not authorize or inhibit the appointment of a nonresident administrator, the question is jurisdictional, rendering the appointment of a nonresident void. In Bell v. Love the appointment of the guardian made at chambers, when the statute provided that such appointment could only be made at a regular term of the court, was held absolutely void. In one or two of the cases where the law required a petition setting forth the jurisdictional facts, and the jurisdictional facts not being shown, the appointment was held void. But, whatever be the law of other states on the principal proposition involved here, it is certainly not the law of Virginia or of this state that the appointment by the county court of a nonresident administrator disqualified by the statute is absolutely void, and may be collaterally attacked. Whether one applying for administration be a resident within the meaning of the statute is often a question of law and fact, to be determined by the county court, a court of general and exclusive original jurisdiction of all matters of probate; and, having such jurisdiction, its orders are generally not void, but only voidable on appeal, writ of error, or some other process of review provided by law, and cannot be questioned collaterally. Andrews v. Avory, 14 Grat. (Va.) 229, 73 Am. Dec. 855, and other cases cited in monographic note. However, there may be cases where the appointment would be absolutely void and subject to collateral attack, as, for example, where letters of administration previously granted are still in force, or where there is a will naming an executor who is still alive, or where the granting of administration was made on the estate of a person not dead, or, as in Bell v. Love, supra, where the appointment is made at a special term of the county court held without notice, or where the notice does not cover the subject of appointment of a personal representative. In all such cases there is absolute want of jurisdiction of the subject-matter or of the parties, and the rule respecting collateral attack does not apply. In Van Fleet on Collateral Attack, § 590, the writer says: "The appointment of a wrong person, such as a nonresident, or a stranger before the widow had renounced her right, or an alien, as administrator, is not void, and his acts are binding after his removal." We are therefore of opinion that the court did not err in rejecting defendant's special plea number two.

We are left to dispose of the case on its merits. To do so rightly we must first determine what rules and principles govern cases of this character. Counsel for defendant would have us apply rules and principles generally applied in the case of travelers, and watchmen at street and road crossings, and to trackmen and yardmen, and to trespassers, or persons using the tracks and side tracks of a railroad company by license. We have numerous cases in this state, and there are many decisions in other states, holding it to be the duty of travelers in crossing a railroad to stop, look, and listen, and that their failure to do so will excuse a railroad company from liability, although there be also negligence of trainmen in failing to give the usual signals at such points; that, in the case of licensees or trespassers upon its track, a railroad company owes them no duty except not to wantonly and willfully run upon them without signal or warning; and that in the case of trackmen and yardmen, servants of the company, and presumed to be experts in the places of their employment, the law imposes upon them the duty to keep a lookout, and to know how to avoid danger, and a railroad company is not liable for injuries due to the negligence of trainmen, fellow servants of such employes, in failing to give the usual warning and signals in the movement of trains. It is unnecessary for us to refer to this class of cases or to discuss them in this connection, for in our opinion this case belongs to a class which is sui generis, and must be disposed of on the rules and principles applicable to it. As we have said, Olivino was the servant of an independent contractor, and in no sense a servant of the railroad company, or a fellow servant of the engineer and fireman or of the other trainmen to whose negligence his death is imputed. He was not a trespasser on the track, not a trackman or a yardman employed by the defendant, nor was he using the track by mere leave or license of the railroad company. He was at the place of his death in the discharge of duties assigned him by his immediate employer, a place where he had the right to be, performing the very necessary and important duty of keeping the track clear of obstructions continually occurring in the work being conducted there by the independent contractor, that its property and lives of defendant's trainmen and the passengers on its trains might be protected and preserved. The place where Olivino was at work was in a deep side cut, within a few feet of where the steam shovel, engaged in making the excavations, was at work, and which the evidence shows made loud and distracting noises when in operation. About 300 feet west was a curve around the hillside, beyond which a train approaching from that direction could not be seen, and, when the steam shovel was in operation, the blowing of the whistle and the ringing of the bell, as the evidence shows, could be heard only with difficulty by those in charge of or in close proximity to the steam shovel. The defendant must be charged with full notice of these facts and circumstances surrounding the deceased, and the question is: What were the reciprocal duties and obligations of the deceased and the defendant under the circumstances?

The authorities hold that while the duty to use reasonable care in this relation is reciprocal, and the servant of a contractor cannot recover for injuries resulting from his own negligence, nevertheless the law does not require such persons at work on the track to maintain a constant lookout for approaching trains and at the same time pursue their labor, but it does require of the operatives of trains the exercise of an active vigilance to avoid injuring such persons, and that they should give reasonable danger signals to attract the attention of men so employed so as to enable them to get out of the way before it is too late. 3 Elliott on Railroads (2d Ed.) §§ 1265b, 1265c, 1265d, citing under § 1265b Haley v. New York, etc., R. Co., 7 Hun (N. Y.) 84; Goodfellow v. Boston, etc., R. Co., 106 Mass. 461; Baltimore, etc., R. Co. v. State, 33 Md. 542; McWilliams v. Detroit Mills Co., 31 Mich. 274; Barton v. New York, etc., R. Co., 1 N. Y. Super. Ct. 297, affirmed in 56 N. Y. 660; Stinson v. New York, etc., R. Co., 32 N. Y. 333, 88 Am. Dec. 332; O'Leary v. Chicago, etc., R. Co. (Iowa) 103 N. W. 362. Some authorities even hold that persons thus employed have a right to become engrossed in their employment, and to expect that care and pains will be taken as to them. Schultz v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 44 Wis. 638; Goodfellow v. Boston, etc., R. Co., supra. We think the true doctrine is, as laid down in Elliott, that the duty to use reasonable care in such relation is a reciprocal duty, and that the servant of a contractor cannot recover for injuries due to his own negligence. The duty of a railroad company on the other hand in cases like the one we have in hand would seem to require of it such reasonable provisions and precautions, and the giving of such proper and adequate warnings and signals, as will be reasonably adequate to avoid injury to persons thus employed. Here important work was going on in the building of a second track, and many men, including the deceased, were engaged about the work. The conductor says he had no orders to slow down at this point; the engineer that he was driving the train at the rate of 30 miles per hour around this curve when he struck Olivino. But the engineer says he blew the whistle on the curve below Scott station, and also as he came around the curve on the straight line; that, when he saw Olivino, he was standing there some eight feet from the track, with his shovel resting in his hands, facing the track and with his head turned towards the approaching engine, and that, as he guesses, when within 20 or 30 feet of Olivino he just stepped upon the track, and that, as he did so, he pulled the brake and emergency, and by the time he had done that the engine struck him that quick; that nothing he could have done at that moment could have prevented the accident. Another witness Rouser, employed by defendant to attend "to the interlocking and switches at Scott and the lamps also," says he was standing on the same side of the track about 210 feet from Olivino, and that, when the train had pulled past him, he saw Olivino walk right up across the track in front of the train, but he did not know whether he had gone across or not until after he had been killed and the alarm given. Jones, superintendent for Rinehart & Dennis, a witness for defendant, who was present, says: "At the time he was struck I was 50 or 60 feet from him, and looking right at him. He was working on the main line, * * * shoveling dirt from a ditch on the north side of track, and carrying it across and depositing it on the south side. * * * I heard No. 8 coming, and, when it was 550 or 600 feet away, Olivino walked across the track to the south side and dumped a shovel full of dirt * * * about 6 feet from the rail. After he had dumped this dirt, he stood there probably 6 feet from the end of the ties for about four or five seconds, looking in the direction of approaching train, which was in plain sight of him, and coming along at about 40 miles an hour. When the train was about 180 feet from him, he slowly walked upon the track, and was struck about the time he got in the center of it." He says that Olivino where he was standing on the south side of the track was in a safe place; that about 350 yards west of the point of the accident the engineer sounded the whistle and no other signal was given. The conductor of the train, the only other witness for defendant, throws little light on the subject. His train, he says, was 50 minutes late that day; composed of 7 coaches, each about 70 feet in length, making the length of the train some 700 or 800 feet, including the engine. He is not questioned by either side as to whether or not the whistle was blown or the bell rung.

On the part of plaintiff, it was proven by Cicerello that he was foreman in charge of the steam shovel, and of the men at work there with Olivino, and by several other witnesses employed there that they heard no whistle or bell for the cut. A school boy 13 years of age on his way home from school with his brother crossed the track between Scott station and the place where Olivino was hit, and saw the train coming and heard the whistle blow for the station, but heard no whistle blown or bell rung to give warning to the men at work in the cut. Griffith in the employ of the contractors, a witness examined by both sides, who was engaged, with another man, in laying track some 400 feet from Olivino, and where he could see the station and the train approaching, says he heard no whistle or bell rung for the cut; that he and his fellow workman spoke of the subject immediately after the train passed, the latter remarking that the whistle was not blown, he replying he had not heard it. He admitted that the whistle might have blown and he not have heard it. The witnesses for the plaintiff also contradict flatly the evidence of Jones and of the engineer that Olivino stood looking at the approaching train, but, on the contrary, say that just before he was struck by the engine he was crossing the track diagonally with his back rather towards the approaching train, and evidently did not see it coming; that the steam shovel made a loud noise. The plaintiff, who was at work on the steam shovel, testified that he did not hear the whistle nor see the train approaching or he would himself have called or warned Olivino. This is substantially all the material evidence bearing on the question of the negligence of defendant and contributory negligence on the part of Olivino.

The defense of the defendant is want of negligence on its part and contributory negligence on the part of Olivino. In the case in hand these were questions of fact under the evidence solely within the province of the jury. There is such a conflict therein, both in respect to the blowing of the whistle and the ringing of the bell, and as to whether or not Olivino saw the train approaching and deliberately walked upon the track in front of the engine, that we are not permitted to say as a matter of law that defendant was without negligence, or that Olivino was guilty of contributory negligence, resulting in his death. We need only refer to the authorities already cited in support of this proposition.

The defendant complains of the rejection of its instructions numbered 5 and 7. No. 5 would have told the jury that, if they believed from the evidence that the whistle was blown or bell rung for the last crossing west of where the accident occurred, such fact was immaterial, and that they might nevertheless find for the defendant if they should further find from the evidence that the defendant was not otherwise negligent. The crossing evidently referred to is the one crossed by the school boy between Scott station and the place where Olivino was killed, and near where the engine came in sight of Olivino, and the place where the whistle was usually blown to warn the workmen at work in the cut. This being so, the effect of the instruction would have been to tell the jury that, although the defendant might have been negligent in failing to give the usual signals of warning to the men at work there, yet, if the defendant was not otherwise negligent, they might find a verdict in its favor. As thus interpreted, it would have been contrary to the rules and principles governing the class of cases to which this belongs. The seventh instruction would have told the jury that, if they believed from the evidence that Olivino stepped upon the company's track in front of the approaching train so suddenly that the train could not have been stopped before striking him, they should find for the defendant. This instruction wholly ignores the question of negligence of the defendant in failing to give the usual warning signals, and whether under all circumstances he was guilty of contributory negligence in crossing the track in the manner prescribed. Both instructions we think were properly rejected.

These conclusions require an affirmance of the judgment below.

BRANNON, J. (dissenting). Very clear it is that the deceased knew well that trains might pass any time, and likely knew when this regular train was due, as he had been working at this spot two months. Very certain it is that he could have seen the train,

If he had looked, and likely have heard it. And, if the noise prevented hearing, that was still greater the demand to look out. Elliott on Railroads, § 1285. And very probable that he stepped on the track when the train was close and visible—a rash act. If he did not step on the track when train was close, then he committed the rash act of standing on the track not looking or listening. In any view careless. It seems to me that the court excuses him from all measure of care and prudence, and leaves out of the case contributory negligence of the most signal character. It requires a train to whistle at every party of men repairing track, building bridges, or doing other work. I thought that the law required of them care and watchfulness. In this case the danger was ever present and obvious, easily avoided—the negligence of the deceased great.

I hold that to hold the company liable in such a case its negligence must be wanton, and of this there is no proof. It was lawfully using its track and the deceased upon it.

W. F. BLACK & SONS v. B. JOHNSON & SON.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
April 20, 1909.)

1. SALES (§ 61*)—EXECUTORY SALE.

Whether a sale of personal property is complete or only executory is to be determined from the intent of the parties, as gathered from the contract, the situation of the thing sold, and the circumstances surrounding the sale.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sales, Cent. Dig. §§ 162-170; Dec. Dig. § 61.*]

2. PRINCIPAL AND AGENT (§ 179*)—NOTICE TO AGENT—EFFECT.

A principal is affected by notice to his agent respecting any matter distinctly within the scope of his agency when the notice is given before the transaction begins, or before it is so far completed as to render the notice nugatory.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Principal and Agent, Cent. Dig. §§ 685-688; Dec. Dig. § 179.*]

3. PRINCIPAL AND AGENT (§ 178*)—NOTICE TO AGENT—SCOPE OF AGENCY.

The agent of a railroad company to inspect and take up railroad cross-ties, and to whom the vendor thereof has also intrusted the duty of measuring, inspecting, and taking up for and reporting said ties to him, is so far the agent also of such vendor as to make notice to him, obtained while engaged in measuring, inspecting, and taking up such cross-ties, of the rights and claims of the true owner thereof, notice also to such vendor.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error to Circuit Court, Lincoln County.

Action by W. F. Black & Sons against B. Johnson & Son. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Williams, Scott & Lovett, for plaintiff in error. C. E. Burns and D. E. Wilkinson, for defendant in error.

MILLER, P. This is a civil action begun by plaintiffs against defendants, before a justice of Lincoln county, to recover the price of a lot of railroad cross-ties. The judgment of the justice was for defendants, but upon appeal to the circuit court the plaintiffs obtained a verdict and judgment there against defendants for $235.59, and the defendants have brought the case here upon a writ of error.

It is conceded: That the ties were gotten out and delivered by plaintiffs at Six Mile, a way station on the Guyandotte Valley Railroad, pursuant to an order given by defendants to I. J. Swann and by the latter turned over to plaintiffs in August, 1904. That in February, 1905, some three or four months after the ties had been delivered at the railroad, and plaintiffs had notified them of Swann's failure to take up and pay for the ties, and after considerable correspondence with them, defendants sent J. W. Jorden, an inspector for the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, to inspect, measure, and take up the ties. Along with Jorden came T. J. Bowlen, representing J. W. Johnson & Co., to inspect, measure, and take up some other ties purchased by the latter firm from plaintiffs. That, after these ties had been partially inspected and loaded, W. F. Black, a member of the plaintiff's firm, appeared, and, Swann having failed in business, without having taken up and paid for the ties, he notified Bowlen and Jorden of this fact, that the ties belonged to his firm, and that he would not allow them to be billed out unless either J. W. Johnson & Co. or the defendants would agree to pay for them. So much is conceded, but what agreement was made before the ties were finally billed out the following day, if any, is controverted. Black, corroborated by his witnesses, says that Bowlen and Jorden promised they would write J. W. Johnson & Co., and, if either this firm or defendants would pay for the ties, they would bill them out the following day, and that upon this promise he permitted the ties to go. Bowlen and Jorden deny making any such promise, and defendants deny the agency of either to make such promise; in fact, they deny that either Jorden or Bowlen were their agents for any purpose. They admit, however, that they sent Jorden to measure, inspect, and take up and bill out the ties to the railroad company for their account, and to report to them, and that they had sent no other representative for that purpose. Black claims not to have known at the time exactly whom Bowlen and Jorden represented, but says he supposed Jorden represented defendants. Defendants place much stress on the fact that the day after the ties were shipped Black wrote J. W. Johnson & Co. demanding pay from them, and that afterwards, on the suggestion of this firm that Swann was the man to pay, Black wrote him requesting him, if he was to pay for the ties, to send him a check for the amounts. Defendants also rely on the fact that plaintiffs never replied to their letter of October 18, 1904, saying, "We * * * presume you are getting these ties out for Mr. Swann," and that in their letter to defendants, December 7, 1904, they refer to the ties as the "switch ties I sold to I. J. Swann"; and that in their letter to defendants of October 25, 1905, plaintiffs substantially admit that they allowed the ties to be billed out and shipped without any agreement that defendants were to pay for them.

We do not see anything, however, in these admissions or transactions of plaintiffs materially inconsistent with their present claims. Swann, as a witness for defendants, admits, in corroboration of the testimony of plaintiffs: That he never measured, inspected, received, accepted, or paid the plaintiffs for the ties, or authorized or directed any one to do so for him; that, after being notified by plaintiffs of Swann's failure to take up the ties, defendants sent Jorden to take them up and bill them out to the railroad; that before completing the work of measuring, inspecting, and billing them out, Jorden was given notice that the ties were the property of plaintiffs, had never been delivered to Swann or paid for by him, and that they would not take Swann or look to him for their pay; that defendants have never paid or settled with Swann for the ties in any other way except to credit him on an old prior account, existing when the order for the ties was given Swann and by him turned over to plaintiffs. We must regard the controverted facts depending on the conflicting oral evidence as settled by the verdict of the jury in favor of plaintiffs.

Three questions are presented: First, had the title to the ties passed to Swann at the time they were inspected and taken up by defendants? Second, if the title had not passed to Swann, are plaintiffs estopped by their acts, conduct, or admissions as against defendants from controverting this fact? Third, was Jorden so far the agent of defendants in taking up the ties as to make notice to him of plaintiffs' claims and rights notice to his principals? The answer to these questions will dispose of all the material points of error presented by the record.

Whether a sale of personal property is complete or only executory is to be determined from the intent of the parties as gathered from the contract, the situation of the thing sold, and the circumstances surrounding the sale. Morgan v. King, 28 W. Va. 1, 14, 57 Am. Rep. 633; Hood v. Bloch, 29 W. Va. 244, 11 S. E. 910; Osborne v. Francis, 38 W. Va. 312, 18 S. E. 591, 45 Am. St. Rep. 859;

Bank v. Napier, 41 W. Va. 481, 23 S. E. 800. Although we must say from the evidence in this case that the ties involved had been delivered at the place where they were to be measured, inspected, and taken up either by Swann, or by the defendants on whose order they had been gotten out, yet Swann, though notified, as he admits, had never appeared to measure, inspect, receive, or take up the ties, and so as to ascertain the amount to be paid plaintiffs, and had not in fact received or accepted them; and the plaintiffs' evidence is that they had never parted with either the title or possession thereof at the time the ties were loaded and billed out by defendants. While these claims of plaintiffs and admissions by Swann might not be binding on an innocent purchaser without notice, we think, under the circumstances of the case, they are conclusive as between plaintiffs and Swann. Nor do we think there was anything in the location of the ties or the situation or circumstances of the parties to warrant defendants in assuming that the ties belonged to Swann. Plaintiffs had notified them of Swann's failure to take up the ties, and this notice seems to have been sufficient to put them on inquiry, for in a letter to Swann of October 14, 1904, and his reply thereto of October 16, 1904, properly rejected by the court below as against plaintiffs, they claim that in giving the order they had figured the amount of Swann's indebtedness to them, refer to plaintiffs' letter of notification, and say to him, if it was not his intention to pay plaintiffs and turn the ties over to them, in settlement of his account, they did not expect to take the ties. But plaintiffs had no notice of this correspondence, and defendants had actual notice from Swann's letter that, although he expressed his intention to do so, he had not in fact paid for the ties up to that time; and when defendants sent Jorden to take up and bill out the ties, if the notice to him was notice to them, they were given notice at the time that Swann had not taken up and paid for the ties, that the ties were not his, and that they should be billed out only on condition that defendants or J. W. Johnson & Co. would pay for them. Notwithstanding this notice, defendants took plaintiffs' ties, sold them as purchased from Swann, and credited the proceeds on Swann's old indebtedness to them. Nothing that plaintiffs said or did beforehand therefore caused loss or damage to defendants, and we do not think anything done or written by plaintiffs conclude them from now asserting their legal rights against defendants.

Was notice to Jorden notice to defendants of plaintiffs' rights? If he was their agent to inspect, measure, receive, take up, and report to them the ties billed out to the railroad company, as defendants admit, although he was also the agent for the railroad company about the same matter, we think that notice to him of plaintiffs' claims was notice to them and that it was his duty to have reported to them the facts. The defendants had no other agent present for that purpose. They relied on Jordan, and, if they had not had the notice directly from plaintiffs, notice to Jordan was sufficient to bind them. The law on this question as laid down in 1 Parsons on Contracts, and approved and followed by this court in Hart v. Sandy, 39 W. Va. 646, 655, 20 S. E. 669, is that: "A principal is affected by notice to his agent respecting any matter distinctly within the scope of his agency when the notice is given, before the transaction begins, or before it is so far completed as to render the notice nugatory." And this writer says in the same connection: "Knowledge obtained by the agent in the course of that very transaction is notice; and it has been said that knowledge obtained in another transaction, but so short a time previous that the agent must be presumed to recollect it, is also notice affecting the principal." In the footnote, at page 78, it is said in the same book: "The reason generally for charging the principal with notice is that it is the duty of the agent to communicate to his principal the knowledge he has of the subject-matter of the agency." Lewis v. Arnold, 13 Grat. (Va.) 454, relied on by defendants, we do not think in conflict with this doctrine. The only question decided in that case, and sought to be applied here, was that A.'s boatman sent to get the salt delivered to him by N., and, after it was delivered on the boat, was not competent as A.'s agent to abandon the salt and relinquish his legal rights—a point inapplicable here, for no such question is presented. If the question in that case had been whether notice then given the boatman of the claims of L. to the salt in question was notice to A., the exact point we have here would have been presented. In the case of Hart v. Sandy, supra, this court quotes from Story on Agency, § 140, as follows: "Notice of facts to an agent is constructive notice thereof to the principal himself, where it arises from or is at the time connected with the subject-matter of his agency; for, upon general principles of public policy, it is presumed that the agent has communicated such facts to the principal, and, if he does not, still, the principal having intrusted the agent with the particular business, the other party has the right to deem his acts and knowledge obligatory upon the principal; otherwise the neglect of the agent might operate most injuriously to the rights and interests of such party."

We perceive no errors in the judgment or ruling of the court below of a nature prejudicial to the defendants, and the judgment below is therefore affirmed.

EARLE et al. v. COBERLY et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Feb. 16, 1909. Rehearing Denied
May 13, 1909.)

1. WILLS (§ 478*)—CONSTRUCTION—DISPOSITION BY IMPLICATION.

A will may operate to bequeath property by necessary implication from the will taken as a whole, even though there is no formal disposition thereof. Such implication, however, must be so strong as to preclude the idea of any other intention on the part of the testator.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. § 999; Dec. Dig. § 478.*]

2. WILLS (§ 610*)—CONSTRUCTION—INTEREST CREATED—ABSOLUTE GIFT—PERSONALTY.

Testator makes use of the following language in his will in relation to his personal property, viz.: "And she, the said L. E., is to sell and dispose of my personal property and after paying her for her trouble she can dispose as she thinks best." In the former part of his will he had directed the payment of his debts and had given some pecuniary legacies, but did not direct how they were to be paid. He had also devised to L. E., who was his daughter, a specific lot of land and had made her his executrix. He failed to make any disposition of a large part of his real estate. No other mention is made of his personal property than what is contained in the above quotation.

Held to constitute an absolute gift of his personal property to L. E.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. §§ 1379-1385; Dec. Dig. § 610.*]

3. WILLS (§ 820*)—LEGACY—CHARGE ON LAND.

The right of a pecuniary legatee to have his legacy charged upon the undivided land is superior to the right of the heir.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Dec. Dig. § 820.*]

4. SUBROGATION (§ 10*)—PAYMENT OUT OF OWN FUNDS.

An executor who uses his own funds to pay debts and pecuniary legacies is entitled to be subrogated to the rights of the creditors and legatees.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Subrogation, Cent. Dig. §§ 30-34; Dec. Dig. § 10.*]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from Circuit Court, Randolph County.

Bill by Pearl Earle and others against Jesse C. Coberly and others. Decree for defendants, and complainants appeal. Reversed and remanded.

See, also, 60 W. Va. 295, 54 S. E. 336.

W. B. Maxwell, for appellants. Harding & Harding and Dailey & Bowers, for appellees.

WILLIAMS, J. This case is here on appeal from a final decree made on the 28th day of January, 1907, by the circuit court of Randolph county, and involves the construction of a will.

Wm. H. Coberly died in January, 1904, leaving a will by which he disposed of all his personal property, but only a portion of his real estate. He left a widow, Ruth Ann Coberly, to whom he gave nothing by his will. His widow survived him about one month and died, also leaving a will, by which she gave all her property to a married daughter, Lummie Earle, whom she named as her executrix. Wm. H. Coberly left only two children as his heirs, the aforesaid Lummie Earle, a married daughter, and a son, Jesse C. Coberly. In his will he first directs the payment of his debts, but does not make them a charge on any particular fund. Next he devises, by specific description, a lot of land in the city of Elkins to his daughter, Lummie Earle, and appoints her his executrix. He then gives to four of his grandchildren, viz., Charley H., Della A., Pearl and Ruth Earle, children of Mrs. Lummie Earle, $1,000 each, but does not specify how these legacies are to be paid. The will then concludes as follows, viz.: "And she the said Lummie Earle is to sell and dispose of my personal property and after paying her for her trouble she can dispose as she thinks best. I have payed my son Jesse C. Coberly his portion to him and his children in money and land." There is no residuary devise, and no mention made of other lands of testator. The will is dated January, 7, 1903. Lummie Earle administered on the estate. The personal property amounted to $2,824.75, all of which went into her hands.

One of the principal questions presented is: Did the will give Lummie Earle the personal property absolutely, or was it charged with payments of debts and legacies? The will of the testator is supreme so long as it does not conflict with the general law, and is to be determined from the language used, taking it as a whole, and from the necessary implications arising therefrom. Testator did not expressly give Lummie Earle the personalty, but he gave her unqualified power to dispose of the proceeds by this language: "She can dispose as she thinks best." Unqualified dominion necessarily imports absolute ownership. Consequently, by necessary implication, she was given the absolute title to all of the testator's personal property, and we hold that this was testator's intention. Underhill on Law of Wills, § 463; Page on Wills, § 468. "When executors are given uncontrolled powers of appointment, they may appoint for themselves." Page on Wills, § 691; Graham v. Graham, 23 W. Va. 36, 48 Am. Rep. 364. The testator's intention that his debts and these four pecuniary legacies should be paid out of his estate was clearly expressed. He explicitly directs his "just debts" to be paid, and he just as certainly gives these four pecuniary legacies to his grandchildren above named; but he does not state how, or out of what particular property belonging to his estate, he desires either to be paid. Shall the expressed wish of the testator be defeated because he did not designate the particular part of his estate out of which these legacies and his debts should be paid? Certainly not, so long as there are sufficient assets belonging to his estate with which to effectuate his will.

He left undevised lands worth about $7,000.

This was more than enough to pay both debts and legacies. Undevised real estate was liable, even under the common law, for the payment of legacies, and also for the payment of general debts when charged on the land. Underhill on Law of Wills, § 371; 2 Jarman on Wills, side page 1387. And, a fortiori, is it liable under the statute which makes real estate belonging to the estate of a decedent assets for the payment of all debts. It is true that the personalty is the fund primarily liable for the payment of debts and legacies where both land and personal property are willed generally, and the personalty is not expressly, or by necessary implication, exempted; but, in this case, we have seen that the personalty was exempted by being given to Lummie Earle by necessary implication. The undevised lands was therefore the fund primarily liable in this case to the payment of both debts and legacies. "General legacies are not applicable to the payment of debts until after the residuary personal estate, real estate devised in trust expressly for the payment of debts, or which is charged with their payment and land descended to the heir, are all exhausted." 1 Underhill on Wills, § 890; Bank v. Beverly, 1 How. 134, 11 L. Ed. 75; Thomas v. Rector, 23 W. Va. 26; 2 Jarman on Wills, side page 1430; Elliott v. Carter, 9 Grat. (Va.) 548; Cranmer v. McSwords, 24 W. Va. 599; Downman v. Rust, 6 Rand. (Va.) 587; Hershey's Estate, 21 Pa. Super. Ct. 651; Trent v. Trent's Ex'r, Gilmer (Va.) 174, 9 Am. Dec. 594. It is true that the executrix was not expressly directed to sell any land to pay debts and legacies; but it is not necessary that she should have been given such power, in order to charge the debts and legacies on the land. The law gave her a right to apply to the court to have it sold in order to carry out the purposes of the will.

The decree appealed from is erroneous, in that it releases the undevised lands of Wm. H. Coberly from the payment of the aforesaid legacies, and decrees that the personal property was primarily liable for the payment of testator's debts. The debts and legacies should both have been charged upon the undevised land; first the debts, then the four pecuniary legacies, and, if the land proved to be insufficient to pay both debts and legacies, then the legacies would have to be abated ratably. It appears from the commissioner's report in this cause that the executrix paid out of her own fund debts owing by her testator to the amount of $1,338.72, and also paid two of the aforesaid legacies of $1,000 each. She is therefore entitled to be subrogated to the rights of the creditors, and to the rights of the two legatees whom she paid, as against the aforesaid undevised real estate, with interest on said sums from the time of their payment. Gaw v. Huffman, 12 Grat. (Va.) 628; Hope v. Wilkinson, 14 Lea (Tenn.) 21, 52 Am. Rep. 149; Sheldon on Subrogation, §§ 202, 208; 2 Woerner on Administrators, side page 1109, § 496. The two infant plaintiffs to this suit are entitled to be paid their legacies out of the proceeds of said undevised lands, with interest on said legacies from the time that they were due. Mrs. Lummie Earle took possession of the undevised real estate and collected the rents therefrom, the net amount of which, after allowing credit for taxes and needed repairing is $782.48; and after her death Charles H. Earle collected rents, the net amount of which is $141. The unpaid debts of W. H. Coberly, deceased, amounting to $98.40, should be paid out of these sums, and one-half the remainder paid to Jesse C. Coberly.

In 1904 Jesse C. Coberly brought a suit against Lummie Earle for partition of the aforesaid undevised lands, and on the 1st day of February, 1905, a decree was made giving him one-half of said lands "unincumbered." This decree was appealed from to this court and was modified to the extent that it was not proper upon the state of the pleadings in that suit to hold that his moiety was unincumbered with the aforesaid legacies; but in so far as said decree held that Jesse C. Coberly took the undivided half of said lands by inheritance from his father, Wm. H. Coberly, it was affirmed. See the case reported in 60 W. Va. 295, 54 S. E. 336. Plaintiffs thereupon brought this suit, and the two were heard together, and on the 28th day of January, 1907, the final decree now under review was made. This decree held that the personal property of W. H. Coberly was liable first to the payment of testator's debts, and, second, to the payment of the aforesaid pecuniary legacies, pro tanto, and that the undevised real estate was not in any manner liable for their payment. It also decided that the estate of Lummie Earle, deceased, was not entitled to be subrogated to the rights of the creditors and legatees whom she had paid as against said undevised real estate, and that plaintiffs, the two unpaid legatees, had no right to charge their legacies upon said land.

In these respects, and for the reasons set out in this opinion, the decree is erroneous, and must be reversed, and the case remanded to the circuit court of Randolph county for further proceeding according to law as herein expressed.

STATE ex rel. MT. HOPE COAL CO. v.
WHITE OAK RY. CO. et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Jan. 19, 1909. Rehearing Denied
May 14, 1909.)

1. MANDAMUS (§ 160*)—RECITALS OF ALTERNATIVE WRIT—SUFFICIENCY.

In mandamus by a coal operator commanding a railroad company, as required by section 2364, Code 1906, to make "reasonable provision" for the transportation of all coal offered it for shipment by him, the recitals in the alternative writ showing that the things commanded thereby were substantially those which in prior negotiations between the parties the railroad company had regarded as reasonable and proper, will on a motion to quash the writ be regarded as equivalent to the recital of other facts and circumstances necessary to show the reasonableness of such demand, and as making a prima facie case entitling relator to the relief demanded.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mandamus, Cent. Dig. §§ 326-335; Dec. Dig. § 160.*]

2. CARRIERS (§ 40*)—CARRIAGE OF FREIGHT—REASONABLE PROVISION FOR TRANSPORTATION.

What will constitute such "reasonable provision" for the transportation of coal will depend on the facts and circumstances of each individual case.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. §§ 120-122; Dec. Dig. § 40.*]

3. CARRIERS (§ 40*)—CARRIAGE OF FREIGHT—REASONABLE PROVISION FOR TRANSPORTATION.

Provisions which a railroad company had determined before the alternative writ issued were proper to be made for the transportation of relator's coal offered it for shipment the court will assume on final hearing may reasonably be required by its mandate; at least, until a different showing be made.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Dec. Dig. § 40.*]

4. CARRIERS (§ 40*)—CARRIAGE OF FREIGHT—REASONABLE PROVISION FOR TRANSPORTATION.

Where, in order that "reasonable provision" be made by it for the transportation of coal and coke offered it for shipment, as required by said section 2364, Code 1906, the facts and circumstances demand it, a railroad company may be compelled by mandamus to construct and operate upon its right of way a side track and switch for that purpose.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Dec. Dig. § 40.*]

5. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§§ 276, 297*)—DUE PROCESS OF LAW—CARRIERS—SIDE TRACKS.

Requiring such "reasonable provision" to be made does not amount to a command to enter into a contract therefor with relator, or to build and maintain a permanent structure on such right of way, to be continued indefinitely, nor to the taking of the private property of such railroad company for private use without due process of law inhibited by article 14 of the amendment to the Constitution of the United States. It is a mere command of the temporary use by such company of a part of its right of way for the purpose of performing a duty imposed upon it by law.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Constitutional Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 832-834, 845, 846; Dec. Dig. §§ 276, 297.*]

6. MANDAMUS (§ 160*)—ALTERNATIVE WRIT—AMENDMENT.

The alternative writ of mandamus, though regarded as a pleading—the declaration or complaint—is nevertheless the writ of the court; and, where the substantive matter thereof is sufficient to justify a part, but not all that is commanded by the writ, this court may in a case of original jurisdiction so amend the alternative writ as to make it conform to the mandate of the peremptory writ awarded, and that may properly be commanded thereby.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mandamus, Dec. Dig. § 160.*]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Mandamus by the State, on the relation of the Mt. Hope Coal Company, against the White Oak Railway Company and others. Alternative writ amended, and peremptory writ awarded.

Price, Smith, Spilman & Clay and C. R. Summerfield, for petitioner. Dillon & Nuckolls, for respondents.

MILLER, P. The defendant owns and operates a railroad in Fayette county from Macdonald Station on the Loup Creek branch of the Chesapeake & Ohio Railway Company to Price-Hill Station, a distance of about three miles. The relator, the Mt. Hope Coal & Coke Company, has opened up a coal mine on the line of defendant's railway near Mt. Hope Station, where it has built a substantial tipple, and is ready to mine and ship coal. The defendant owns its right of way in fee of the width of 100 feet. It is impossible for relator to reach the main track of defendant, as now located, for shipping its coal, except by side track and switch connection therewith constructed, in part at least, upon defendant's right of way. In June, 1907, negotiations were begun between relator and defendant for side track privileges, and on June 25, 1907, the defendant's general manager wrote the relator's attorney, referring to the negotiations begun, saying: "I at that time advised you the freight rate was ten cents per ton. This I beg to confirm. Since looking over the records, I find the rate is ten cents per ton from the mines operating on this line, and, as the Mt. Hope Coal Co. have such a small area and the shipments from that area will be limited, we could not agree to furnish them a side track at our expense. We will, however, if they are willing to do the grading, pay for rails, ties, fastenings and switch connections, and labor in laying track, permit them to tap our main line and we will handle the coal from their operation on the basis of ten cents per ton of coal, distributing the cars on the branch in proportion to the capacity of the mine. It being also understood that this switch connection is made for the purpose of shipping coal and in default of at any time shipping less than one carload of freight per annum for every lineal foot of track the White Oak Railway Company reserves to itself the right to remove the switch connection. This for the purpose of preventing dead switches on their main line." After this letter was received, the relator began and completed the building of its tipple, extending the same out over the defendant's right of way, some 50 feet, so as to reach the proposed side track, and also did the work of grading, furnished ties, steel rails, frogs, etc., for switch connection and other material for the purpose of completing said side track and making the proper connection with defendant's main track, expending therein, and in opening its mine, some $17,000. It does not clearly appear under what special contract or agreement with the defendant, if any, relator extended its tipple over on the defendant's right of way, other than such as may be implied from said letter of June 25, 1907, and the negotiations which seem to have led up to it; but it is alleged in the petition, and not denied, that the work of building and completing the tipple and of grading and providing rails, ties, and other materials for the side track was carried on by the relator with the knowledge and acquiescence of defendant, and with no objection thereto by it until in the latter part of December of that year, when defendant refused to connect up the switch with its main track except on condition that relator would enter into a contract with it embodying substantially the terms of the Norfolk & Western Railway Company contract. Pending these negotiations, however, a contract was drawn up by defendant's counsel which relator was willing to execute, but which the defendant refused. Relator also proposed a contract in the form required by the Chesapeake & Ohio Railway Company for operators along its line, but this defendant also refused to accept, and refused to make any contract except that proposed by it. Neither of the agreements proposed contained any provision relating to the relator's occupancy of defendant's right of way with its coal tipple; nor does it appear that any of the negotiations contemplated any special provision therefor. Having failed to come to an agreement for such side track and connections, the relator now seeks to compel defendant by mandamus, and by force of the statute, to make reasonable provision for the transportation of its coal offered for transportation. It conceives that reasonable provision to be, according to its petition and the alternative writ, to require defendant to connect the said side track constructed by relator, Mt. Hope Coal & Coke Company, at its mines, with the defendant's railway line, or to permit said relator to make such connection; to furnish relator its due and proper proportion of the railway cars and equipment available for coal shipments from the region in which petitioner's mine is located; and to place such cars upon said side track and remove the same when loaded in the usual way in which said cars are placed and removed for other shippers along said line; and that it desist from discriminations in favor of other corporations named.

The defendant challenges the sufficiency of the alternative writ, and moves to quash the same, and also files its return in writing thereto. The motion to quash is predicated upon three grounds: First, that the alleged right of relator is not based upon violation of any duty imposed upon defendant by law; second, that the alternative writ does not allege any facts or circumstances upon which it can be determined whether defendant has refused to discharge its legal duty to relator; and, third, because the alleged rights of relator are based wholly upon a duty or obligation arising out of an alleged contract or agreement between relator and railway company, which the court by mandamus has no power to enforce.

The first and third grounds are evidently based upon the erroneous theory that relator rests its right to relief upon its negotiations for a contract, or upon the proposition contained in the defendant's letter of June 25, 1907. We do not so understand relator's position, but, on the contrary, that the right claimed is a statutory right. It is argued for defendant that, where the relator's rights rests wholly on a special contract involving no question of public trust or official duty, the writ will be refused. Merrill on Mandamus, § 16. Without contract a railroad company has a public duty to discharge. Our statute (section 2364, Code 1906) upon which relator especially relies provides that: "Every railroad corporation along whose line of railroad the industries of mining coal and manufacturing coke is carried on, shall without discrimination between or amongst shippers, and without unnecessary delay, make a reasonable provision for the transportation of all such coal and coke offered for transportation over its railroad, and no such railroad corporation shall discriminate in rates, distribution of cars or otherwise against or among shippers of coal or coke offered for shipment on its line or lines." Section 2366 imposes a penalty upon such railroad corporation, its officers, and agents who knowingly and willfully violate any of the provisions of that act. Because the negotiations for a contract failed, has the relator lost any of its statutory rights? We think not. The statute does not contemplate any agreement of the parties. The mandate of the statute is that the railroad company shall without any unnecessary delay make a reasonable provision for the transportation of all coal and coke offered for shipment, a command which the railroad company cannot neglect without incurring the penalty of the statute. What will constitute such reasonable provision will depend, of course, upon the facts and circumstances of each individual case. But the statute makes the industries of mining coal and manufacturing coke the special subject of railroad regulation. The extent and importance of these industries in this state in the judgment of the Legislature required this, and we think the statute should be given a construction broad enough to accomplish the purposes plainly intended. On the second ground of the motion, if we understand the purpose of relator in setting forth the prior negotiations for a contract, it was that they might serve as a substitute in part, at least, for allegations of fact necessary to show the reasonableness of the provision required by it, and we think they do serve such purpose. It might have been better, and but for these recitals of the alternative writ it would have been necessary, no doubt, in order to show the reasonableness of such provisions, for relator to have alleged and proven the probable output of its mine, the number of cars it would likely require per day or per month, or per annum, the probable expense of making such provisions, and any other facts available, this for the purpose of showing the extent and nature of its operations and the reasonableness of its demand, for, as we construe our statute, provision that is reasonable must be made. The alternative writ recites relator's ownership of the mine, the preparation made by it for mining and shipping coal, the expenditures incurred by it therein, and that it is ready to mine and ship coal; also, the acreage owned by it, and its readiness to provide the material and pay for the labor of construction of such side track and switch, in view of which it is alleged defendant was willing to have such side track and switch connection made, if only the relator would agree to the terms of a contract which the relator conceived to be unjust and onerous. These recitals of the alternative writ we think present a prima facie case entitling relator to relief.

On the merits the return of defendant admits all the facts which we deem material; and in the brief of counsel they say that they are ready to admit that under our statute defendant would be required to make a reasonable provision for the transportation of coal and coke, and under certain circumstances such reasonable provision would require the putting in of switch connections, but they say that, before defendant can be required to make switch connections with a private side track for relator, it must be alleged and proven that relator has sufficient product to offer for transportation to justify defendant in maintaining and operating such side track and switch, that they can be made and operated safely on a practicable grade, and that relator has made provisions upon its own property to load the product of its mine. As we have said, we think the alternative writ sufficient in this particular.

The defenses relied upon by defendant in its return are, first, that relator seeks to compel defendant to enter into a contract with it, for the use and occupation by it, of a part of the defendant's right of way, with its coal tipples and a side track; second, that, if the first proposition be not involved, another object of the writ is to compel the defendant against its will and discretion to construct or permit relator to construct on its private right of way a side track for the private use of the relator, and this without showing that such side track can be constructed at the point indicated so as to be safely and profitably operated by the defendant; and, third, that there is no warrant of law therefor, and that the court is without jurisdiction to compel by mandamus performance by the defendant of either of said acts. It is conceded, however, that relator has the right to compel defendant to make suitable provision for shipping of its coal, but that it has not a clear legal right to have this done in the way and manner required, because it involves the taking of its private property for private use, which is not due process of law, and violative of the provisions of article 14 of the amendment of the Constitution of the United States. In its first proposition we think the defendant wholly misconceives the purposes of the writ. While the writ recites the things done and negotiations had between the parties in the vain endeavor to come to an agreement, it contains no command that defendant enter into any agreement with the relator. The issues presented upon the writ and return do not call upon us to decide, and we do not decide, whether as an original proposition the relator could compel defendant by mandamus to permit it to occupy, with its coal tipple, a part of the defendant's right of way. This the relator has already accomplished, if not by express agreement, at least, by the acquiescence and consent of the defendant. The evidence shows that such occupancy by other coal operators has in many instances been permitted in the same coal field by the Chesapeake & Ohio Railway Company. And in its return to the writ in this case defendant makes no real objection to such occupancy of its right of way by relator, either with its coal tipple or with the proposed switch and side track, if only relator will accept the terms of the contract proposed by it in relation thereto, a condition not suggested or required by it in its proposition of June 25, 1907.

The only question of merit presented here is the legal one, covered by the second and third defenses, namely, whether under our statute defendant can be compelled by mandamus, under the facts and circumstances of this case, and upon the conditions proposed by relator, to construct, or permit relator to construct, the side track as proposed. It is conceded that reasonable provision may be commanded. Whether the proposed side track can be operated safely upon a proper grade or with profit to the defendant, and also the question whether the occupancy of a portion of the defendant's right of way therewith as required is reasonable, are questions which it seems to us were practically determined by the parties themselves prior to the issuance of the present writ; for the defendant is shown to have consented thereto, or at least acquiesced therein, and what the parties themselves had determined was such reasonable provision for the transportation of relator's coal we may it seems to us properly assume may reasonably be required by the mandate of the court, at least until a different showing be made. The only way in which reasonable provision could be made for transportation of coal delivered from a tipple into cars would be by building a side track connected by a switch to the main track either upon the right of way of the defendant or upon the private lands of the relator. The parties determined between themselves that the proper place for the location of such switch was on defendant's right of way. The relator claims, and there is evidence to support its claim, that the only feasible and proper place for such side track is on defendant's right of way.

But has the court power by mandamus to compel defendant upon terms to construct and operate the proposed side track and switch connection on its right of way? We think it has. This question we do not conceive to be covered and concluded, as defendant contends, by Missouri Pacific R. Co. v. Nebraska, 164 U. S. 403, 17 Sup. Ct. 130, 41 L. Ed. 489. The question there was whether the railroad company could be compelled by mandamus to enter into a contract with relators, upon like terms and conditions contained in contracts with other private persons, permitting them to build and maintain a private and permanent warehouse upon the defendant's right of way. The state court construing the statute of Nebraska as conforming to the Constitution of the United States had required defendant to enter into such a contract. The Supreme Court conceded the right of the railroad company to permit its grounds to be occupied by others with structures convenient for the receipt and delivery of freight upon its railroad so long as a free and safe passage was left for the carriage of freight and passengers—citing Grand Trunk R. Co. v. Richardson, 91 U. S. 454, 23 L. Ed. 356—but says: "But how far the railroad company can be compelled to do so against its will is a wholly different question." But the court says in that case: "This court, confining itself to what is necessary for the decision of the case before it, is unanimously of opinion that the order in question, so far as it required the railroad corporation to surrender a part of its land to the petitioners for the purpose of building and maintaining their elevator upon it, was, in essence and effect, a taking of private property of the railroad corporation for the private use of the petitioners. The taking by a state of the private property of one person or corporation without the owner's consent for the private use of another is not due process of law, and is a violation of the fourteenth article of amendment of the Constitution of the United States." Many cases are cited for this proposition. This, however, is not the proposition we have before us. Nor do we think Northern Pacific R. Co. v. Washington, 142 U. S. 492, 12 Sup. Ct. 285, 35 L. Ed. 1092, a case in point as defendant contends. The particular point decided in that case was that without legislative action making it the plain duty of the railroad company the court was without jurisdiction to compel by mandamus the railroad company to build and maintain a railway station at the particular point commanded. In that case the court quotes extensively from People v. New York, L. E. & W. R. R. Co., 104 N. Y. 58, 66, 67, 9 N. E. 856, 58 Am. Rep. 484. The question in the New York case was whether without legislative requirement the defendant company could be compelled by mandamus to build a station house at the particular point commanded by the writ. The statutes of New York permitted railway companies for public use in the conveyance of passengers, persons, and property to erect and maintain all necessary and convenient buildings and stations for the accommodation and use of their passengers, freight, and business. But the court said, contrary to the finding of the railroad commissioners, that: "As the duty sought to be imposed upon the defendant is not a specific duty prescribed by statute, either in terms or by reasonable construction, the court cannot, no matter how apparent the necessity, enforce its performance by mandamus. It cannot compel the erection of a station house or the enlargement of one. * * * As to that the statute imports an authority only, not a command, to be availed of at the option of the company in the discretion of its directors, who are empowered by statute to manage its affairs," etc. After that decision in New York the Legislature (Laws 1892, p. 1382, c. 676) amended the statute, giving the railroad commissioners general supervision over all railroads, and empowering them to require additional terminal facilities, and the courts power and authority to enforce their just and reasonable decisions and recommendations by mandamus, subject to appeal. It may be proper to note that Justices Brewer, Field, and Harlan dissented in Northern Pacific R. Co. v. Washington. Justice Brewer says in his dissenting opinion: "A railroad corporation has a public duty to perform, as well as a private interest to subserve, and I never before believed that the courts would permit it to abandon the one to promote the other. Nowhere in its charter is in terms expressed the duty of carrying passengers and freight. Are the courts impotent to compel the performance of this duty? Is the duty of carrying passengers and freight any more of a public duty than that of placing its depots and stopping its trains at those places which will best accommodate the public? If the state of Indiana incorporates a railroad to build a road from New Albany through Indianapolis to South Bend, and that road is built, can it be that the courts may compel the road to receive passengers and transport freight, but, in the absence of a specific direction from the Legislature, are powerless to compel the road to stop its trains and build a depot at Indianapolis? I do not so belittle the power or duty of the courts." As we have said, the purpose of the present writ is not to command a contract for the building of a permanent structure by the relator on the right of way. The writ contemplates no such object. It commands a reasonable provision for the transportation of relator's coal offered for shipment, which the statute authorizes. Such reasonable provision does not involve the permanent maintenance of the proposed switch and side track. Nor does the writ command defendant to continue the same indefinitely as a permanent structure. Jones v. Newport News, etc., Co., 65 Fed. 739, 13 C. C. A. 95, 31 U. S. App. 92; Detroit, etc., Ry. v. Interstate Commerce Commissioners, 43 U. S. App. 308, 74 Fed. 803, 21 C. C. A. 103. In Missouri Pacific R. Co. v. Nebraska, supra, the court emphasizes the fact that the "order in question was not limited to temporary use of tracks, nor to the conduct of the business of the railway company. But it required the railway company to grant to the petitioners the right to build and maintain a permanent structure upon its right of way." In Jones v. Newport News, etc., Co., supra, referring to the latest Illinois case relied upon, says: "The Supreme Court of that state has held that the railroad company has a discretion to say in what particular manner the connection shall be made with its main track, but that this discretion is exhausted after the completion of the switch and its use without objection for a number of years"; but, says the court, "this is very far from holding that there is any common-law liability to maintain a side track forever after it has once been established." And, referring to other Illinois cases, the same court says: "They depended on statutory obligations, and were not based upon the common law." In Missouri Pacific R. Co. v. Nebraska the court says of that case: "Nor does it present any question as to the power of the Legislature to compel the railroad company itself to erect and maintain an elevator for the use of the public, or to compel it to permit to all persons equal facilities of access from their own lands to its tracks, and of the use from time to time of those tracks, for the purpose of shipping or receiving grain or other freight, as in Rhodes v. Northern P. R. Co., 34 Minn. 87, 24 N. W. 347, in Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. People, 56 Ill. 366, 8 Am. Rep. 690, and in Hoyt v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co., 93 Ill. 601." We quote from these decisions for the purpose of showing how differently the courts view the subject where there is a demand for the erection of permanent structures for private use on a railroad right of way, and where, as in this case, the demand relates to a temporary structure to be placed thereon under the direction and control of the railroad company.

We are of opinion, on the authority of these cases, that our statute requiring that reasonable provision to be made justifies in part the writ in this case, and that, unless we give this statute such construction, it will not accomplish the purposes intended by the Legislature, and leave the subject entirely within the control and discretion of railroad companies.

But is relator entitled to all the relief commanded by the mandamus nisi? It commands, first, "that you connect the side track constructed by relator, Mt. Hope Coal & Coke Company, at its mines, with your railway line, or permit said relator to make said connection"; second, "that you furnish to said relator, Mt. Hope Coal & Coke Company, its due and proper proportion of the railroad cars, and equipment available for coal shipments from the region in which the mines of said relator is located, and place such cars upon said side track and remove the same when loaded in the usual way in which such cars are placed and removed for other shippers upon your railroad line"; and, third, "that you cease and desist from discriminating against said relator, Mt. Hope Coal & Coke Company, and in favor of the Sherwood Coal & Coke Company and the Price-Hill Colliery Company, in the matter of switch connections, distribution of cars, and other facilities." We find on the pleadings and proofs the relator entitled to only such relief as is covered by the first command of the writ. It is not alleged or proven that the relator has ever demanded of the defendant or that the defendant has ever refused to furnish a due and proper proportion of the cars; nor do we think it is sufficiently alleged, and it is not proven, that the defendant has discriminated against the relator in favor of the other companies mentioned in the matter of switch connection, distribution of cars, and other facilities. On the contrary, the return and the evidence show that there is no such company as the Sherwood Coal & Coke Company; that the Price-Hill Colliery Company is not a producer of coal at all, but that the Price-Hill Fuel Company, the owner and operator of two coal mines, known as the Sherwood and Price-Hill mines, has tipples and side tracks upon its own land and premises, and that said Price-Hill Fuel Company has entered into a contract embodying the same terms offered relator, and which it refused to accept; and that, in fact, there has been no discrimination against the relator in this respect. What, then, is the proper disposition to make of the case? The old and rigid rule, still adhered to in some jurisdictions, was that the peremptory writ of mandamus must strictly follow the command of the alternative writ; and that, if all that is asked in the alternative writ cannot be granted, nothing that is asked can be granted. This rule is referred to, and recognized, in our own cases of Fisher v. Charleston, 17

W. Va. 628, 640, Doolittle v. County Court, 28 W. Va. 158, and Hebb v. Cayton, 45 W. Va. 578, 32 S. E. 187. See, also, 28 Cyc. 490, 491, and cases cited in notes. But this rule in the later cases has been very much relaxed, and in those states where either by statute or by the prevailing rules of practice the right of amendment of pleadings has been extended to writs of mandamus the practice now is to direct the mandate of the alternative writ to be so amended as to conform to the command of the peremptory writ. In Fisher v. Charleston, supra, the practice followed on writ of error was to set aside the order of judgment awarding the peremptory writ, and remand the case to the lower court with directions to issue a new alternative writ commanding that to be done which was justified by the pleading and proofs, in legal effect an amendment of the original writ. In this state the rules, including the rules relating to amendments of pleadings, are applicable to mandamus, and, if the alternative writ be amended after service, it need not be then served in its amended form. Fisher v. Charleston, 17 W. Va. 628; Town of Mason v. Railroad Co., 51 W. Va. 183, 189, 41 S. E. 418. The mandate of the writ is peculiarly within the control of the court. It need not in the first instance conform to the prayer of the petition. The court may fashion it to suit the case made by the petition. Fisher v. Charleston, supra, 630. If the court may thus control the writ at the time of directing it, there is no good reason why it may not control it afterwards by amendment, so as to make it conform to the mandate of the peremptory writ. This practice is fully justified by modern decisions and text-writers, and we are of opinion it is the proper practice, and should be followed in this state, although resulting in a modification to some extent of the rule heretofore recognized and followed. 2 Dillon, Mun. Corp. (4th Ed.) § 879; High on Extraordinary Legal Rem. (3d Ed.) § 519; State ex rel. v. Crites, 48 Ohio St. 142, 173, 26 N. E. 1052; State ex rel. v. Acting Board of Aldermen, 1 S. C. 30; State ex rel. v. Baggott, 96 Mo. 63, 71, 8 S. W. 737; United States ex rel. v. Union Pac. R. Co., 4 Dillon, 479 (syl. 5), Fed. Cas. No. 16,601; 28 Cyc. 490, 491.

The pleadings and proofs we think entitle the relator to a peremptory writ of mandamus directed to defendant, commanding it, on condition that, before beginning the work, the relator shall pay or secure to be paid to it the cost and expense thereof, to commence forthwith and to complete as soon as practicable a safe and suitable side track, connecting the same by a switch with relator's mines, using the location graded and prepared by the relator, and the ties, rails, and other materials furnished by it, as far as consistent with proper side track and switch construction, or permit relator to do said work in accordance with said specifications. It will therefore be so ordered; and also that the alternative writ be so amended as to conform in all respects to the peremptory writ directed thereby.

BERRY v. COLBORN et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
April 20, 1909.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 987*)—REVIEW—QUESTIONS OF FACT—FINDING BY TRIAL COURT.

The rule giving great weight in the appellate court to the finding of the trial court on a question of fact lays no restraint upon the power of the former to ascertain by full and careful investigation and analysis of the evidence what the facts and circumstances are, and whether the general finding is consistent therewith.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3893-3896; Dec. Dig. § 987.*]

2. EVIDENCE (§ 587*)—SUFFICIENCY—INTENT.

Flat contradiction in oral testimony as to intent and purpose, obscuring the truth and rendering it impossible to ascertain the same from such evidence with reasonable certainty, justifies resort to the circumstances as the safer guide, and their value and weight are determined by their intrinsic character and tendency to produce mental conviction rather than their number.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 2436; Dec. Dig. § 587.*]

3. JOINT ADVENTURES (§ 4*)—MUTUAL RIGHTS AND LIABILITIES—GOOD FAITH.

Two or more persons associated together in a joint enterprise, contemplating pecuniary gain and advantages, under an agreement to combine their energies or means, or both, for the accomplishment thereof, stand in a relation of confidence analogous to that subsisting between partners, and each must observe toward the others the utmost good faith.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Joint Adventures, Dec. Dig. § 4.*]

4. JOINT ADVENTURES (§ 4*)—MUTUAL RIGHTS AND LIABILITIES—SECRET PROFIT.

One of such persons cannot, consistently with equity and conscience, take to himself a secret profit produced by the joint effort or work, and all such gain must be accounted for in the settlement of the social business and distribution of assets if demanded of him.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from Circuit Court, Marshall County.

Bill by J. W. Berry against C. B. Colborn and others. Decree for defendants, and complainant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

J. A. Ewing and C. C. Newman, for appellant. J. B. Sommerville and Hubbard & Hubbard, for appellees.

POFFENBARGER, J. A bill filed in the circuit court of Ohio county by J. W. Berry to obtain a share in a commission of $10,000, which the Mound Coal Company agreed to pay as compensation for the negotiation of a lease of its coal property to one J. E. Hedding, with the privilege of purchasing the same at any time before January 1, 1911, for the sum of $150,000, was dismissed after a hearing on the merits, and Berry has appealed.

One Charles D. Ames was made a defendant as an associate of Hedding in the purchase. J. C. McKinley, president of the Mound Coal Company, was made a defendant in his individual capacity; he having been active in procuring the services of the agents. The real defendant, however, is C. B. Colborn, a real estate broker or agent, who claims the entire commission. Berry's bill proceeds upon the theory of his association as agent with Colborn. The lease was executed on the 19th day of October, 1905, and Colborn, admitting that he had been previously associated with Berry in an effort to sell the property, claims this relationship had ceased at the time of the execution of the lease, and denies the right of Berry to participate in the commission arising therefrom. On the 9th day of May, 1905, the coal company executed and delivered a written instrument by which it authorized Berry, one Simon Kline, and the firm of Colborn and Robinson to present a buyer for its property, and agreed to pay them a commission of $5,000 in case a "sale, trade, or deal or exchange" of the property should be made directly or indirectly through the instrumentality of the parties named. The right thus given was made exclusive until May 30, 1905. Under this arrangement, efforts to sell the property were made, in which Colborn seems to have been more active and influential than any of the others. He conducted the correspondence with parties in Pennsylvania and met them personally, while Berry furnished him information concerning the property, acquired from McKinley, which he calls "data," and stood ready to take prospective purchasers through the mine and show them the qualities and advantages of the property. His claim is founded upon an alleged agreement with Colborn for a share in the commission and the rendition of services of the kind just indicated. While this right of sale was in force the agents consulted one another and were jointly interested. Notwithstanding the expiration, on May 30th, of the exclusive right of sale, this association and combination of effort continued without interruption until the 22d day of September, 1905, when the coal company, by letter, directed to Colborn and Colborn and Robinson, revoked the power given on the 9th day of May, 1905, and directed them to consider "all arrangements, negotiations and options canceled, effective at once." But, according to the testimony of McKinley, Berry, and others, the agents were verbally authorized on the next day, September 23, 1905, to continue their efforts to obtain a purchaser. The object of this seems to have been to place beyond doubt or question the release or expiration of the exclusive right of sale originally given. Berry says he went to Colborn on the 23d day of September, and told him McKinley had authorized them to continue their efforts, and that Colborn agreed to do so. The latter had received the letter of revocation on that morning or the preceding evening, and, considering the matter at an end, had written a letter to some contemplated purchaser telling him so, but said he would destroy it and go on with the enterprise. This Colborn denies, but there was no cessation of his effort to dispose of the property. Admitting that Berry came in and saw him after the notice of revocation had been received, he says the conversation between them was exactly contrary to what Berry says it was. He says Berry expressed the opinion that McKinley would let them go on, and he replied that he would have nothing more to do with it, and says he told Berry he had written a letter to a contemplated purchaser telling him to come and look at the property, and thereupon tore it up. His claim is that subsequently the coal company authorized him to negotiate a lease, not a sale, of it, and that, although Berry had been interested in the original agreement and effort to sell, he had no part or interest in the new agreement for commission to arise from the negotiation of the lease thereof. The verbal authorization to Berry to continue his effort to procure a purchaser was never withdrawn. McKinley says he had personal and telephone communication with him concerning the prospects of sale after the 23d day of September, 1905, and furnished him a revised statement or memorandum of the property, both real and personal, as a means of aiding him in his negotiations or efforts. A copy of this statement is exhibited with McKinley's deposition. He says, however, that about a week after the 23d of September he met Colborn, who stopped him and asked him what was being done about the Mound Coal Company, and, being informed that nothing had been done, asked the privilege of negotiating a lease of it, which was granted. He saw nothing more of Colborn until after October 19th, but had a conversation with him over the telephone on that date. He furnished Colborn no information, but talked with Berry from time to time over the telephone about the property. Even after that date, the date of the agreement of the lease, McKinley conversed with Berry about the property, but gave him no information as to what had been done. He explains this by saying they did not want to make the matter public, as they were in doubt about its consummation, and they had been requested by Colborn not to mention it to Berry or anybody else. Berry was specifically named as one of the parties to whom it was not to be communicated. That McKinley kept Berry interested in the property after September 23d is further shown by the testimony of Harry R. Jungling, an employé. He says McKinley called Berry up frequently and talked to him about the disposition of the property. He also heard conversations between Colborn and McKinley, or rather heard McKinley talk to Colborn over the telephone, and tell the latter Berry knew nothing of the leasing of the property, and ask him if he did not think Berry would be "hot" and ought to have something out of the transaction. Hedding and Ames, accompanied by Colborn, came to look at the property on the 18th or 19th of October, and Berry took them through the mine. Hedding says he had come to Wheeling to look at the Glendale coal property, but Colborn told him it had been sold, and suggested that he go to Moundsville and look at the Mound Coal Company property. He says he did not inform Berry that he contemplated purchasing the property, but admits having asked him about the condition of the mine. He says he had had previous correspondence with Colborn concerning the Glendale property, in which the latter had merely referred to the Mound Coal Company property, and that on the 18th day of October Colborn had shown him the "data" of that property. He thinks it was not the last paper. McKinley had given to Berry; his recollection being that it was not so full and complete as that paper, but he was unable to point out any particular difference between them. Berry says Colborn called him up by telephone some time after September 23d and asked him for the memorandum, and he thereupon called for McKinley, who was not then in, but who on the next morning called him up, and, on being told that Colborn needed the paper, promised to prepare it immediately. On the next morning he received it by mail and mailed it to Colborn, and on the next morning had called him up by telephone to know if he had received it, and he said he had. He heard nothing more from Colborn until the evening of October 17th, when he told him over the telephone he would be there the next day with some parties to examine the mine, and asked him to have everything in good shape. Colborn denies all this, but says he had some conversations and transactions with Berry during the period aforesaid concerning another piece of property lying on the Ohio side of the river and owned by Berry's brother. There is much contradictory evidence in the record concerning what took place between Berry and Colborn on September 23d; the former insisting that Colborn agreed to continue the relation previously subsisting between them and he as emphatically denying it. As to the substance of the conversation had on that day, Berry is sustained by the testimony of his brother and Colborn by one Brown, who occupied the office in which the conversation occurred jointly with Colborn; the latter having desk room in the office of which Brown had charge.

On the issue raised by the pleadings and evidence, largely one of fact, the court below found in favor of the defendant, and he invokes the rule, so well known as to require no citation of authority, giving such finding weight in the appellate court. While this rule is to be respected and observed, no case is governed by it that does not fall within it. The exception to it is as well established as the rule itself, and the appellate court will always scrutinize the evidence and circumstances to enable it to determine whether the finding is contrary to the evidence or against conscience. We said in Hursey v. Hursey, 56 W. Va. 148, 155, 49 S. E. 367, 369, that the rule "lays no restraint upon the power of the court to make a full investigation, and careful analysis of the evidence with the view to ascertaining whether there is conflict and whether the decision rests upon findings of fact supported by substantial proof." Of course, no such finding should stand against the great weight and preponderance of the evidence. The verdict of a jury will be set aside if it is against the plain and unequivocal inferences arising from admitted or established facts. Chapman v. Liverpool, etc., Co., 57 W. Va. 395, 50 S. E. 601; Davidson v. Pittsburg, etc., R. Co., 41 W. Va. 407, 23 S. E. 593; Manss-Bruning Shoe Co. v. Prince, 51 W. Va. 510, 41 S. E. 907; Johnson v. Burns, 39 W. Va. 658, 20 S. E. 686. The court below proceeded upon the theory that an entirely new arrangement and contract was made between Colborn and the coal company after the 23d day of September, 1905, to which Berry was not a party, and its conclusion seems to be based almost wholly upon the deviation of the new arrangement from the old, or the fact that the new agreement was for the negotiation of a lease, while the old one was for the negotiation of a sale. His written opinion, incorporated in one of the briefs, indicates that he gives controlling effect to this circumstance. He says: "No new or different arrangement was ever made by Berry after that, and it is clear that this arrangement was never carried out. The purchaser was never produced, and the $5,000 was never earned. Some time after this McKinley entered into a new agreement with Colborn, under which, if Colborn produced a person who would lease the mine upon certain conditions and pay a stipulated royalty, Colborn should receive a stipulated commission. This was clearly a new contract between Colborn and the coal company. Berry was not a party to it or included in it." He proceeds to point out then that Berry's contract or agreement for sale still subsisted and might be performed by him and the $5,000 commission earned. The lease, however, it will be remembered, gave an option of purchase at a certain price, which put it beyond Berry's power to effect a sale of the property after the lease had been executed. This superseded the whole previous arrangement. Furthermore, the execution of the lease itself put a new face on the whole situation. A piece of property subject to a 20-year lease is quite different from the same property free from lease as a commercial subject. If we could treat the two authorizations as independent, they were clearly not consistent. So regarded, they were contradictory and conflicting. But in our opinion they were not independent. Tested by the terms used, the so-called new arrangement or agreement, except as to the amount of the commission, was included in, and covered by, the authority originally given in writing and later verbally renewed in part—continued as a nonexclusive, instead of an exclusive, right. The original authorization was not limited to the production of a purchaser. Its terms were broader. It provided for the payment of a commission if a sale, trade, deal, or exchange should be directly or indirectly made through the instrumentality of the agents. It would be difficult to conceive a broader, more general power of disposition. The word "deal," used in this connection, seems to us to be amply sufficient in breadth and scope to cover the leasing of the property. The agreement to lease was new in a subsidiary sense only. It amounted to a resolution or decision to select, act upon, or follow one of the several modes of execution of the general plan of disposition included in the first authorization, and a stipulation for increased compensation. In all except the increase of compensation, it was a mere change of procedure or mode of execution, not constituting even a modification of the original agreement. All the circumstances combine in argument to sustain the position of Berry, and condemn that of Colborn. He says he told Berry he had quit, and would have nothing more to do with the property. In contradiction of this he secretly continued and effected the lease. He not only did that, but he used, in his subsequent efforts and operations, the papers and materials furnished him by Berry for the purpose of carrying out the original enterprise. It is strange that, if he decided to quit, he did not return to Berry the memoranda he had furnished him, showing the character and condition of the property; Berry having just told him he thought McKinley would let them go on and expressed a desire to do so. Is it possible he thought this memoranda would be useless to Berry, or that his decision not to prosecute further would necessarily put an end to the latter's efforts? If Colborn told Berry he had quit, the latter would naturally have demanded the papers back. His not having done so and Colborn's failure to offer them are circumstances strongly tending to support Berry. It is not likely that both forgot to mention the papers. It may be said Colborn does not admit having received memoranda from Berry. Where did he get the memorandum he showed Hedding? He does not say McKinley gave him any, and Berry proves acquisition of them from McKinley and says he delivered them to Col-born, who admits that until September 22, 1905, he, in conjunction with Berry, was endeavoring to sell the property. Is it likely he was carrying on negotiations with Stofer and others without being able to give them any information about the property? He showed Hedding a memorandum. McKinley says he furnished him none, but did furnish Berry data. What is the plain inference in view of the previous association of these men? That Berry gave Colborn the data he got from McKinley. The circumstances clearly outweigh Colborn's protestations. That there was a verbal authorization to Berry after September 22d, and that he relied upon it and acted under it down to the moment of the execution of the lease to Hedding and even afterwards, and believed he was acting under it, when he showed Hedding and Ames through the mine and gave them information, are facts overwhelmingly established. They do not depend upon his testimony alone. That of McKinley proves them. It was intended that he should do so, and also that he should be kept in ignorance of the negotiations for a lease. The testimony of McKinley establishes this fact. Colborn does not pretend to have given Berry notice of the new contract or his independent action. He took Hedding and Ames to the mine, and turned them over to Berry precisely as he would have done had he been acting under the original arrangement. He says he asked Dr. Haning, one of the owners, on the morning of October 18th to arrange with Mr. Hubbard, another of them, for his going through the mine that day, and thereby intimates a supposition on his part, when he took Hedding and Ames down, that they had so arranged. Mr. Hubbard says nothing of it in his testimony, and Dr. Haning was not examined. Under such circumstances there is a presumption that the witnesses would not have said such a thing had occurred. An important question was whether Colborn made the arrangement direct with Berry. The latter says he did. He denies it, and says the company did it, and names the man whose testimony would sustain him if he is correct; but fails to put him on the stand. We must assume the witness, if called, would have testified adversely to him in respect to that matter. Garber v. Blatchley, 51 W. Va. 147, 41 S. E. 222; Dewing v. Hutton, 48 W. Va. 576, 37 S. E. 670. The agreement for a larger commission than that originally contemplated may well be regarded as a mere modification of the old arrangement. Colborn wanted more money and the exclusion of Berry. To procure the additional money, he no doubt intimated to McKinley intention to cease his efforts if the commission were not increased. The inducement or consideration for the increase is not explained by either Colborn or McKinley. A lease could have been of no greater value to the company than a sale. Colborn still needed Berry's services, for which reason he was not notified. The coal company's object was to dispose of the property. Who should receive the commission was a matter of little or no consequence to it. It did not feel called upon either to aid or obstruct Colborn's effort to obtain Berry's services, and yet exclude him from participation in the commission. On the whole, the circumstances heavily outweigh the testimony of Colborn; so much, indeed, that we are bound to reverse the finding of the trial court. Deeming it applicable, we quote the following from Hale v. Hale, 62 W. Va. 609, 59 S. E. 1056, 14 L. R. A. (N. S.) 221, concerning the weight to be given to circumstances when oral evidence, as to intent and purpose, is conflicting: "The flat contradiction of the direct and positive oral evidence, pro and con, brings into play the circumstances and necessarily gives them unusual prominence and force. To them the court must appeal for the truth, it having been effectually obscured by the testimony of the parties, and the duty of the court cannot be evaded or excused by the difficulty or painfulness of the task. Nor is its investigation or power to act limited by the mere number of the circumstances to be considered. Their intrinsic character and power to carry mental conviction as to the truth is always allowed to prevail."

Though the court below, denying the right to an accounting has not determined the basis thereof, that question should be settled here. As we have concluded the plaintiff is entitled to participate in the commission, we see no reason why we should not define and indicate the extent of the right of participation. The cause is to be remanded for an accounting, and, as a precaution against another appeal, in respect to a matter now before this court and susceptible of determination, we ought to state the principal governing its final disposition as far as we can safely do so. The relation originally subsisting between Berry and Colborn and never dissolved, as we have concluded, was one of partnership or joint agency. Strictly, it may not have been a partnership in all respects, but it was a joint enterprise, involving a community of interest and combination or union of effort, elements, features, or factors of a copartnership. Naturally, then, their rights ought to be determined by the principles governing copartnership as far as they are applicable. Between copartners, trustees, and cestuis que trustent and principal and agent the utmost good faith must be observed and practiced. One partner cannot speculate for his private interest upon the assets or business of the firm. Secret private advantages cannot be taken by the trustee at the expense of his cestui que trust or private profits directly taken from the trust in any way. The agent cannot use the agency as a means of secret self-aggrandizement. In all these cases the secret profits must be accounted for, if the associate or cestui que trust demands an accounting. As to the application of this principle Among partners, see Tomlinson v. Polsley, 31 W. Va. 108, 5 S. E. 457, and McMahon v. McClernan, 10 W. Va. 419. As to its application between principal and agent, see Dorr v. Camden, 55 W. Va. 228, 48 S. E. 1014, 65 L. R. A. 348. The relation of trustee and cestui que trust being still closer and more confidential in its nature, no authority need be cited for the application of the doctrine between them. Applying it here, we hold that Berry is entitled to one-half of the commission earned after all expenses and proper charges thereon shall have been deducted. What expenses, if any, exist and are chargeable against the fund, is a matter for ascertainment in the court below.

From the principles and conclusions above stated, it results that the decree complained of must be reversed, the temporary injunction reinstated, and the cause remanded for further proceedings.

IGUANO LAND & MINING CO. v. JONES et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Feb. 2, 1909. Rehearing Denied
May 14, 1909.)

1. QUIETING TITLE (§ 8*)—GROUNDS OF RELIEF—CLOUD ON TITLE.

Equity will grant relief, by way of enjoining the commission of such acts as will constitute, when completed, a cloud upon title, in all cases where it would have jurisdiction to remove the cloud created by the completion of the acts which are sought to be enjoined.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Quieting Title, Cent. Dig. §§ 34, 35; Dec. Dig. § 8.*]

2. QUIETING TITLE (§ 10*)—TITLE OF PLAINTIFF.

Before relief will be granted upon a bill to remove cloud from title, plaintiff must be in possession of the land, and must show that he has good title thereto; and, in order to claim successfully the benefit of a deed made to his remote grantor, which operates only as color of title, he must connect himself by proper conveyances with such remote grantor, and must show possession by himself, and those under whom he claims, for such length of time as will operate to ripen his color of title into a good and sufficient title.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Quieting Title, Cent. Dig. §§ 36-42; Dec. Dig. § 10.*]

3. JUDGMENT (§§ 562, 576*)—JUDGMENTS CONCLUSIVE—SERVICE OR APPEARANCE—JUDGMENT ON MERITS.

In order for a former adjudication, made by a court of record, to operate as a bar to another suit, the record of such former suit must show service of process upon, or appearance by, defendant, and judgment or decree upon the merits.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Dec. Dig. §§ 562, 576.*]

4. JUDGMENT (§ 951*)—CONCLUSIVENESS—MATTERS IN ISSUE—PAROL EVIDENCE.

Parol evidence, when not inconsistent with the record, and not impugning its verity, is admissible to prove that a former suit or action, had in a court of record between the same parties or their privies, in which judgment was rendered on the merits, involved matters in issue in the suit or action on trial, and were necessarily determined by the first judgment or decree.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. § 1811; Dec. Dig. § 951.*]

5. CORPORATIONS (§ 514*)—ACTIONS—DENIAL OF CORPORATE EXISTENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

A mere recital, in the answer of a defendant, to a bill filed by a corporation, although the answer is sworn to, referring to plaintiff as "a pretended corporation," is not such a denial of the existence of the corporation, under section 41, c. 125, of the Code of 1899, of West Virginia (Code 1906, § 3861), as puts the matter in issue.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Cent. Dig. § 2058; Dec. Dig. § 514.*]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from Circuit Court, Putnam County.

Bill by the Iguano Land & Mining Company against R. A. Jones, Mary Patton Hudson, and others. Decree for complainant, and Mary Patton Hudson appeals. Reversed and rendered.

Simms, Enslow, Fitzpatrick & Baker, for appellant. J. H. Nash and Brown, Jackson & Knight, for appellee.

WILLIAMS, J. This is a suit in equity, brought in the circuit court of Putnam county by the Iguano Land & Mining Company, a corporation, against R. A. Jones and others for the purpose of removing, as a cloud upon plaintiff's title to a tract of 2,500 acres of land, the claim of title asserted by the defendants to a portion of said 2,500 acres, and for the purpose of enjoining said defendants from asserting title thereto, and from taking further steps to redeem their title, which is admitted to be forfeited, and to enjoin them, their agents, and employees from taking possession of, or cutting timber upon, any part of said 2,500 acres of land claimed by plaintiff. The defendants demurred to the bill, and the demurrer was overruled. Later they filed their answer, practically denying all the material allegations of plaintiff's bill. On the 23d day of August, 1899, a temporary injunction was awarded according to the prayer of the bill. A survey was made under order of court, and the report, accompanied by maps made of such surveying as was done by the surveyor, constitutes a part of the record. The deposition of Jas. L. McLean was taken on behalf of the plaintiff, and the cause came on to be finally heard on the 23d day of February, 1902, when a decree was made perpetuating the injunction. From this decree one of the defendants, Mary Patton Hudson, appealed.

The record discloses the following facts: That the plaintiff claims title mediately from Samuel Hollingsworth, who was the patentee of the commonwealth of Virginia of a tract of 100,000 acres of land situate on Pocatalico river, a tributary of the Kanawha river, in what was then Greenbrier county. This tract passed from Hollingsworth by deed to Mathias Bruen, who devised the same to different persons, among whom were plaintiff's remote grantors. In 1850 this 100,000 acres of land was partitioned among Alexander McWhorter Bruen, Henry Whitehouse, and Frances D. Bruen and Mary S. Bruen, tenants in common, by which partition deed Alexander McWhorter Bruen became the owner in severalty of the 2,500 acres claimed by plaintiff. On the 2d day of March, 1855, Alexander McWhorter Bruen and wife conveyed this 2,500 acres to E. G. Tyler, and on the same date said Tyler executed a mortgage upon the same to the said Alexander McWhorter Bruen to secure the payment of $22,500. On the 1st day of July, 1875, E. B. Knight, special commissioner, made a conveyance of this land to E. W. Bond and J. L. McLean, in the proportion of two-thirds to Bond and one-third to McLean. This deed recites that it was made pursuant to decrees made in the cause of A. M. Bruen against E. G. Tyler and others, in the circuit court of Putnam county, rendered on the 16th day of November, 1866, the 11th day of November, 1868, and the 11th day of June, 1869, the last-named decree confirming the sale, and a decree on the 3d day of April, 1875, appointing said commissioner to make the deed. Witness McLean states in his deposition that he produced for the inspection of the defendants' counsel, at the time of the taking of his deposition, a certified copy of the will of Mathias Bruen, certified copies of deeds to plaintiff, and also one original deed to E. G. Tyler, for the 2,500-acre tract; but this original and these copies do not appear in the record. McLean's deposition also proves that the plaintiff, and those under whom it claims, have been in actual and continuous possession of said 2,500 acres of land since 1865, and have paid all the state and other taxes charged and chargeable thereon since the year 1865.

Concerning the defendants' title to 1,137 acres of land, a small portion of which extends into the boundary of the 2,500 acres claimed by the plaintiff, it appears that in 1865 there was granted to H. O. Middleton by the state of West Virginia, by metes and bounds, a tract of 1,137 acres, all of which lies wholly within the bounds of the 100,000-acre Hollingsworth grant, and a small portion of which extends into plaintiff's 2,500-acre tract. The 100,000-acre Hollingsworth patent is an inclusive and exclusive grant, and from its operation certain small surveys, made by a man by the name of Lockhart, were expressly excepted; one tract being a 500-acre survey, another 400 acres, and still another 300 acres. It appears from the record that there was another small survey of 200 acres made by Lockhart which joins his 300-acre survey on the north, a small portion of which is included in the bounds of plaintiff's 2,500 acres. This survey is older than the patent under which plaintiff claims title, but it is not one of the excepted surveys; it is not mentioned or referred to in the grant to Hollingsworth. These three excepted surveys, viz., 300, 400, and 500 acres, and also the Lockhart survey of 200 acres, were all, on the 22d day of July, 1784, granted by the commonwealth of Virginia to Henry Banks, the remote assignee of Lockhart. The Banks' title is admitted to have been forfeited to the state for nonentry on the land books and nonpayment of taxes before the date of the grant of the 1,137 acres was made to H. O. Middleton. Reference to these several grants to Banks will assist very materially in determining their relative location. It appears from the grant of the 500 acres that it adjoins the 400 acres, and from the grant of the 200 acres that it joins the 300 acres on the north; and the 400 acres is described as lying on the northwest branch of Pocatalico, a branch of the Great Kanawha, about three miles north of the mouth of the Pocatalico, and the 300 acres is described as lying on the northwest fork of the northwest branch of the Pocatalico, a branch of the Great Kanawha. The 500 acres is also described as lying on the northwest branch of the Pocatalico. The entry of the 300 acres recites that it is near his 400 acres. From these descriptions it appears that all four of these surveys lie in the same immediate vicinity, and that the 300 and 200 acre tracts join, and that the 400-acre and 500-acre tracts join, but are not all contiguous. It is claimed by the defendants that H. O. Middleton embraced these excepted surveys within the bounds of the 1,137 acres, for which he obtained a grant in 1865; but it appears, from the survey and map filed in this cause, that the 1,137 acres failed to include about half of the 500-acre survey, and also about half of the 300-acre survey. The 400 acres excepted is not located, nor does it appear from the record whether it is embraced within the bounds of the 1,137 acres or not. Middleton failed to enter his land on the land books of Putnam county, and failed to have the same assessed with taxes until the year 1874, when it first appears on the land books charged to Henry O. Middleton for the taxes of said year, and for the preceding years back to 1869, inclusive. But this back tax does not appear to have been paid. In 1875 and 1876 it appears on the land books in the name of Robert Patton, under whom the defendants to this suit claim, and was returned delinquent for the nonpayment of taxes for those years. On the 5th day of November, 1877, it was sold for such delinquent taxes, and purchased by the state. On the 10th day of November, 1879, it was again sold in the name of Robert Patton, and was again purchased by the state, and does not thereafter appear on the books of said county charged in the name of either Middleton, Patton, or any other person. In 1881 Nancy Patton, assignee of Robert Patton, was permitted to redeem by payment of back taxes between 1875 and 1881, inclusive; but she failed to enter it on the land books, and it again became forfeited.

It is not shown that the defendants, or those under whom they claim, are, or ever have been, in possession of any part of the 1,137 acres involved in this suit. It further appears from the map and surveys in this cause that the entire portion of the 1,137 acres lies within two contiguous tracts of 2,500 acres each, both being parts of the 100,000-acre Hollingsworth grant. About nine-tenths of this 1,137 acres, which is in the form of a triangle, lies within a tract of 2,500 acres now owned by W. F. Whitehouse and others; and, so far as the defendants' title to this much of the 1,137 acres is concerned, it was adjudicated and settled by this court in the suit of W. F. Whitehouse and others against these same defendants, and is reported in 60 W. Va. 680, 55 S. E. 730, 12 L. R. A. (N. S.) 49. And the principles enunciated in that case are applicable, in a large measure, to this case, but do not necessarily control it, because the two suits are similar in many respects, and differ widely in other and material matters. The plaintiffs in that suit claimed under identically the same title, down to and including the partition deed made by Miller, commissioner, as the one under which the plaintiff in this case claims. The evidence in the two causes was nearly the same, and the pleadings in the one case are almost a fac simile of the pleadings in the other. The conclusions of the court were right in the other case; and, if the facts alleged in plaintiff's bill were sufficiently proven, the logic used by Brannon, J., in the Whitehouse Case would apply equally as well to this case. But, as we shall presently point out, there is a wide difference between the two cases on material points.

Proceeding, now, to the consideration of the points relied upon by defendants' counsel as errors committed by the lower court, it is noted that the first point raised is that the court erred in permitting the filing of plaintiff's bill while a proceeding was pending in the same court in the name of the state of West Virginia against the owners of the 1,137 acres, Middleton land, for the purpose of sale or redemption. It is insisted that the plaintiff to this suit should have come into that proceeding by petition. A complete answer, we think, to this objection is given by Brannon, J., in the Whitehouse Case above referred to, which is that said proceeding was instituted at the request of the defendants in the present suit; that it was very irregular; that there was no order of publication, as required by chapter 105, Code 1899 (sections 3513-3535, Code 1906); that the plaintiff to this bill was not made a party to that proceeding, either by name, or by general description as unknown claimants of the land, and that the petition or bill in said case, and the order permitting defendants to redeem, were all had and completed in one day. Consequently there was no opportunity given this plaintiff to come into that suit before the final decree permitting redemption had been entered.

The second point insisted on is that the plaintiff had a plain and adequate remedy at law. This point is also settled by the Whitehouse Case, provided the plaintiff has shown sufficient title to the land claimed in its bill. How can it be said that plaintiff had an adequate remedy at law, if it has valid title and is in actual possession? It might be admitted that the irregular proceedings in the name of the state, had at the instance of the defendants, and for the purpose of permitting them to redeem from the state the forfeited Middleton title, could have no effect to divest the plaintiff of its title, and that such proceeding could not have the effect to disturb them in the peaceable enjoyment of their possession, still it must be admitted that such proceeding had the effect to create a cloud upon plaintiff's title, and very likely to materially affect its market value. Why, therefore, was not a court of equity open to give it relief by way of enjoining the defendants from any further proceedings, the effect of which was undoubtedly to becloud and discredit its title? We think equity clearly has jurisdiction in such a suit. This court has frequently held that, where a party is in possession of land, holding it under a good, legal title, equity will take jurisdiction of a suit by him to remove a cloud from his title. Moore v. McNutt, 41 W. Va. 695, 24 S. E. 682; De Camp v. Carnahan, 26 W. Va. 839; Smith v. O'Keeffe, 43 W. Va. 172, 27 S. E. 353; Hitchcox v. Morrison, 47 W. Va. 206, 34 S. E. 993; Holderby v. Hagan, 57 W. Va. 341, 50 S. E. 437; Whitehouse v. Jones, 60 W. Va. 680, 55 S. E. 730, 12 L. R. A. (N. S.) 49. No principle of equity jurisdiction seems to be any more firmly established by adjudications than this.

Will equity grant relief by means of injunction to stop or prevent acts which, if fully accomplished, would constitute a cloud on title? We think this question has also been answered in the affirmative by former decisions of this court. Holderby v. Hagan, supra, which was a suit to enjoin the prosecution of an ejectment suit, and Moore v. McNutt, supra. This last-named case was a suit by Moore, the owner of land, against McNutt, commissioner of school lands, to enjoin him from further proceeding to sell, as school lands, certain tracts of land that lay within the plaintiff's boundary, and claimed by the school commissioner to have been forfeited in the name of junior grantees, thus presenting a case very similar to the one now under review. The court in the syllabus says: "Equity will exercise jurisdiction in advance to prevent acts which will cast a cloud over title to real estate, on the same principles on which it removes clouds already resting on such title." This doctrine of equity jurisdiction in such cases was again announced in Whitehouse v. Jones, 60 W. Va. 680, 55 S. E. 730, 12 L. R. A. (N. S.) 49. We think it correctly expresses the law. Why should equity withhold relief to prevent a thing which it can be clearly seen will, if accomplished, create a cloud which equity will remove? Why cannot equity be invoked to prevent that which it would certainly undo if allowed to be accomplished? There seems to be no valid reason why equity should not give relief by preventing a wrong in all cases wherein it has power to cancel the wrong if done; and we entertain no doubt on this point.

The defendants claim that the demurrer to the bill should have been sustained because the bill on its face, as counsel contend, shows that plaintiff's original claim to at least a part of the land in dispute was based upon the forfeiture of the senior patents for these small surveys, which were excepted from the 100,000-acre grant, and which forfeiture inured to the benefit of the junior patent, to wit, the Hollingsworth patent. We do not understand the plaintiff to make this claim in its bill. These smaller surveys, having been expressly excepted from the operation of the large grant, of course, did not fall into the lap of the larger grant upon their forfeiture. They were no part of the land granted to Hollingsworth. Consequently, if plaintiff claims title to any of the aforesaid excepted tracts, it will have to show title thereto derived from some source other than the Hollingsworth grant before it can obtain the relief prayed for as to those tracts. But, on the other hand, the defendants make no pretense of a claim to the land embraced in any of those excepted surveys by virtue of the grants therefor issued to said Banks. Their title starts with the grant made by the state of West Virginia to H. O. Middleton in 1865, which grant they supposed was intended to cover the land included in these smaller excepted surveys, although there is nothing in the record to show that such was Middleton's purpose in obtaining the grant. It is shown by the map filed in this cause that this Middleton grant covers only about half of the 500 acres, and about half of the 300 acres and the greater part of the 200 acres, which last-named survey, as before said, is not one of the excepted surveys. The Middleton survey calls for 1,137 acres. Consequently a very large portion of it is laid down upon land granted to Hollingsworth. The defendants' title is admittedly forfeited, and so much of their land as did not cover the excepted Lockhart tracts, and as lay within the bounds of plaintiff's 2,500 acres, was by the forfeiture vested either in the state, or in plaintiff. We have only, so far as concerns the present suit, to inquire into the status of the title to so much of the 1,137 acres as lies within this plaintiff's boundaries. What is the status of defendants as to this part of their land? As before stated, no part of the excepted Lockhart surveys extends into this plaintiff's boundary. But a small portion of the 1,137 acres does extend into it. Then, as to this part, the defendants' title, being a junior title, could not avail them as against plaintiff's older title, even if defendants' title were not forfeited, provided, however, the plaintiff has shown itself to be the rightful owner of the Hollingsworth title. The defendants do not claim ever to have been in possession of any part of the land which they seek to redeem; but, on the other hand, plaintiff proves possession, by itself and those under whom it claims, continuously since 1865, and also that it has paid all taxes on the 2,500 acres since that year. These circumstances are greatly in plaintiff's favor; and, if it had shown sufficient title to the land, they would determine the case in its favor. But has it proved such title as the law in such cases require?

So far we have proceeded upon the theory that plaintiff has established a good paper title, thereby connecting itself with the grant to Hollingsworth. But the defendants deny plaintiff's title, and contend that certain deeds referred to in plaintiff's bill, and relied upon as evidence of its title, do not operate to convey title. It, therefore, becomes the duty of plaintiff to establish title by proof. What, then, is the status of plaintiff in the event it has not shown a good unbroken chain of paper title going back to the commonwealth? The plaintiff presents two deeds in its chain of title made by commissioners of courts, and the only evidence found in the record of the authority of said commissioners to make such conveyances is the recitals contained in the deeds themselves. One is the partition deed made by S. A. Miller, commissioner, bearing date May 16, 1850, partitioning this land among the heirs and devisees of Mathias Bruen. The other is the deed made by E. P. Knight, special commissioner, to E. W. Bond and J. L. McLean, bearing date July 1, 1875. Defendants deny that these deeds conveyed any title. It is true these deeds are not accompanied by any part of the record of the suits in which the deeds recite that authority was conferred by decrees to make them, and their effect as conveyances, being denied by defendants, are therefore not proper evidence of title. Waggoner v. Wolf, 28 W. Va. 820; McDodrill v. Pardee & Curtin Lumber Co., 40 W. Va. 564, 21 S. E. 878. Nevertheless, these deeds serve as color of title. They grant the lands by metes and bounds, and describe it by location. It may be also noted here that neither of these deeds makes any exception from the operation of the conveyance of any land lying within the exterior boundaries of the 2,500 acres claimed by this plaintiff. And even if the plaintiff had no older title than that conferred by the deed of E. B. Knight in 1875, yet, having been in possession of a part of the land described therein, and having paid all the taxes charged and chargeable thereon since that time, these circumstances would put the plaintiff in the first class of persons described in section 3, art. 13, of the Constitution of West Virginia (Code 1906, p. lxxxiv), and would give it the benefit of the defendants' forfeited title. Such conditions would invest it with as good and as indefeasible a title as if its chain had been properly connected up with the grant to Hollingsworth, provided it has connected itself with this color of title. If it has done so, such a title will support its bill. But does plaintiff properly connect with the E. B. Knight deed?

Plaintiff alleges "that it is seised and possessed in fee" of the 2,500 acres; that title passed to it through the deed from Miller, special commissioner, to Alexander McWhorter Bruen, and from him to E. G. Tyler, and that it passed from him by a "regular chain of title to your orator." It does not allege by what deed, or deeds, it passed to plaintiff. The defendants in their answer deny that the deed made by Miller, commissioner, "could or did convey or vest any title in Alexander McWhorter Bruen, or any other person whomsoever, in or to the said 2,500 acres," or that "those pretending to claim under him [E. G. Tyler] or the complainants in this cause have never acquired any title whatsoever under or by virtue of such conveyance, or any other conveyance or means." This denial, while somewhat general, seems to be no more indefinite than plaintiff's allegation concerning its source of title, and is certainly a sufficient denial to put plaintiff upon proof of its title. Has it proved it? It exhibits no deed, or certified copy of deed, conveying title to it, from any person. Plaintiff took the deposition of J. L. McLean, but no deed or certified copy conveying title to plaintiff is filed with his deposition, and none appears in the record. At the taking of this deposition witness was asked to produce for the inspection of counsel, but to be retained by witness "subject to the order of the court," any deeds, or certified copies of deeds, conveying the 2,500 acres of land to the plaintiff. In answer to this request he says, after naming other papers produced: "I have produced * * * certified copies of deeds conveying title to another 2,500 acres, part of said 100,000 acres, to the Iguano Land & Mining Company." Witness does not so much as name the grantors in said deeds, nor does it anywhere appear in the record who were the grantors to plaintiff. These deeds were only certified copies. Presumably they were from the records of Putnam county, where the land lies, and where witness was at the time he was testifying. Why, then, did not plaintiff have witness to file them and make them a part of the record? If afterwards lost, they could have been easily supplied. Was it because of some fatal defect in them, or was it simply because plaintiff thought it unnecessary to file them? We do not know. How could the court know that they were properly executed, or that they had been properly acknowledged for recordation, so as to permit a certified copy as evidence in place of the original, without having seen them? The court was the judge, in this case, of the sufficiency of the evidence, and it could not pass on this question without inspecting the deeds. The notary had no power to pass upon the sufficiency of the deeds; and, certified copies having been shown to exist, it was necessary to make them parts of the record in order to prove title. Parol evidence on this point was secondary, and therefore inadmissible, evidence; no reason being shown making it necessary to resort to it.

Plaintiff having claimed to have title by deed, the deeds themselves, or, under our statute, certified copies thereof, were the best evidence to the title. 1 Greenleaf on Evidence, § 81 (h); Id. § 84; 2 Wigmore on Evidence, § 1172; Id. § 1192; 17 Cyc. 465; Id. 485; Millers v. Catlett, 10 Grat. (Va.) 477; Hubbard v. Kelley, 8 W. Va. 46; Lewis v. Burns, 122 Cal. 358, 55 Pac. 132; Cain v. Busby, 30 Ga. 714; Reich v. Berdel, 120 Ill. 499, 11 N. E. 912; Griffith v. Huston, 7 J. J. Marsh. (Ky.) 385; Brakett v. Evans, 55 Mass. 79; Thompson v. Richards, 14 Mich. 172. But it may be thought that, inasmuch as no exception was taken to this mode of proof, and because no order of court appears in the record requiring such certified copies to be filed, it is now too late to raise the objection. But we do not think so. This parol evidence is insufficient. It fails to prove material facts. It does not state who the grantors were in those deeds. It is not known whether they were privies in estate with the Alexander McWhorter Bruen heirs or not; nor is it even shown that the deeds were properly executed so as to make them good as conveyances. Plaintiff having alleged that it claims title under the commissioner's deeds, hereinbefore referred to, it became necessary to connect itself with this title by proper conveyances. It was a fatal omission not to do so. The record fails to show any privity of estate between the plaintiff and the grantor through whom it alleges to have title.

It is assigned as error that the defendants were enjoined from redeeming that part of their land which counsel say lies wholly without the boundary of the land claimed by the plaintiff company. But as to this assignment counsel are clearly under a misapprehension as to the fact, because the survey and report made in this case show that the whole of the Middleton survey lies within the boundaries of the two contiguous 2,500-acre tracts; the one claimed by this plaintiff, and the other by the Whitehouses, and both being parts of the Hollingsworth 100,000-acre grant.

Plaintiff pleads, in bar of defendants' title, an action of ejectment brought by Robert Patton and others against Russell Landers, Albert Dean, and others, in which a verdict and judgment was rendered for the defendants in the year 1883 by the circuit court of Putnam county. The record of this ejectment suit is made an exhibit with plaintiff's bill. A bill of exceptions was taken in that case, and was made a part of that record. But no writ of error was ever granted to that judgment. The bill of exceptions is only a skeleton in form, and simply refers to many deeds and papers that were used as evidence at the trial, but does not contain them. Enough, however, is contained in the skeleton bill of exceptions to show that the same titles were involved in that suit that are in issue in this one, and that the land described in the declaration is the same identical land described in the Middleton grant of 1865. The defendants in this suit are privies in estate to the plaintiffs in the ejectment suit. But, so far as that suit concerns the title of the plaintiff in this suit to the 2,500 acres claimed by it, it seems to lack one of the essential elements necessary to constitute res judicata.

The appellant assigns as error that the lower court permitted oral proof in explanation of the record in the ejectment suit. Was it error? Under the law of this state the only plea permissible to ejectment is "not guilty." This plea is very general in its nature, and comprehensive in its scope, and matters are often put in issue under it which, in other forms of action, would have to be pleaded specially. In such cases the record, unaided by any explanatory evidence, rarely discloses the real matters that were involved in the issue, and for this reason evidence is admissible in explanation of, but not in contravention or contradiction of, the record, for the purpose of explaining what were the real matters litigated. 2 Black on Judg. § 614; Id. § 624; Russell v. Place, 94 U. S. 606, 24 L. Ed. 214; Wilson's Ex'r v. Deen, 121 U. S. 525, 7 Sup. Ct. 1004, 30 L. Ed. 980; Dunlap v. Glidden, 34 Me. 517; Rogers v. Libby, 35 Me. 200; Gage v. Holmes, 12 Gray (Mass.) 428; Burlen v. Shannon, 99 Mass. 200, 96 Am. Dec. 733; Carleton v. Lombard, Ayres & Co., 149 N. Y. 137, 43 N. E. 422; Whitehurst v. Rogers, 38 Md. 503; Botterff v. Wirst, 53 Ind. 32; Leopold v. City of Chicago, 150 Ill. 568, 37 N. E. 892. Consequently, on the theory of plaintiff that the judgment in ejectment was res judicata as to the defendants in this suit, it was proper to admit the oral testimony of witness McLean to prove the map used as evidence at that trial for the purpose of identifying the land in controversy, to prove which one, or ones, if any, of the defendants in the ejectment suit were in possession of the 2,500 acres now claimed by this plaintiff, and to prove the fact that the plaintiffs in the ejectment suit then claimed the land by the same title by which the defendants, their privies in estate, now claim it. Such testimony is only in aid of the record. But the fact that the land involved in both suits is identical is also shown by a comparison of the two descriptions given of it in the declaration, and in the answer to the bill; and the fact that defendants' grantors claimed under the same source of title in the ejectment suit that defendants themselves now claim under is also fully established by a comparison of the bill of exceptions taken at the ejectment trial with the allegations contained in defendants' answer. The identity of both the corpus of the land and the title by which it was claimed being thus established by the record, the admission of the testimony of witness McLean on this point, even if it could be regarded as error at all, would not be prejudicial to defendants.

This brings us to a consideration of the question of res judicata. Does it apply in this case? This court applied it in the Whitehouse Case. Are the facts in the two suits the same? We think not. While they are similar in very many respects, and identical in others, yet there is an essential and material difference upon a vital point which prevents the application of the principle here. This difference is the entire want of an issue between the plaintiffs in the ejectment suit and any person claiming any part of the 2,500 acres of land now claimed by the Igiano Land & Mining Company. The ejectment suit must have involved the same matters now in issue, must have been between the same parties, or their privies, and there must have been a final adjudication upon the merits, before it could operate as a bar to defendants here. Looking to the record in that suit, we find that the plaintiffs declared against a number of persons who were alleged to be in possession of the land covered by the Middleton grant; but, by reference to the testimony of J. L. McLean, it is found that only one of those defendants, to wit, Albert Dean, was in possession of any part of the 2,500 acres claimed by plaintiff. The others were on the 2,500 acres owned by the Whitehouses. It will be remembered that the partition of the 100,000 acres among the Bruen heirs and devisees had been made long before that suit. The record further discloses that Albert Dean was not served with notice; that he did not appear and plead; nor does it appear that his lessors were substituted in his stead as defendants. It is true that witness McLean says that he (McLean) appeared and defended the action. But so far as this testimony is intended to show that there was an issue between those plaintiffs and any one representing the title to the 2,500 acres claimed by the plaintiff in this suit, it is in contravention of the record, and is therefore inadmissible. It, therefore, follows that the principle of res judicata does not apply in this case. This does not conflict with the opinion on the subject expressed by the court in the Whitehouse Case, because in that case the record in the ejectment suit shows that the parties who were in possession of the other 2,500-acre tract were served with notice and pleaded, and, furthermore, that the Whitehouses were, by the order of the court, substituted as defendants. It is assigned as error that the deposition of J. L. McLean was read as evidence over the objection of defendants, because the time of the notice was too short to enable clients to communicate with their counsel. It does not appear how far counsel resided from clients, or that the time given was unreasonably short. Notice to take the depositions was accepted by counsel for defendants on the 25th day of March, and the taking was commenced on the 28th, and concluded on the 30th day of March, 1901. A complete answer to this objection, however, is found in the fact that another one of counsel for defendants appeared, and is noted as counsel for Mary P. Hudson and some others of the defendants, and cross-examined the witness on the 28th of March. Mary P. Hudson being the only one who appeals, it matters not whether or not he appeared for all the defendants.

Exceptions were noted to a number of questions and answers, some of which may have been irrelevant, immaterial, and even improper, evidence. But this court will not presume that the circuit court considered such parts of the evidence as were improper if there is sufficient proper evidence to sustain his conclusion.

Counsel in their brief insist that the answer denies that the plaintiff is a corporation, and that the record furnishes no proof of its existence. The only allegation in the answer that has any bearing on this point is the following: "That it is not true that the so-called Iguano Land & Mining Company, a pretended corporation, either as a corporation or any of its members, assignors, or vendors, are or ever were possessed, in fee simple or otherwise, of a certain tract of land consisting of 2,500 acres," etc. We do not think this amounts to such a denial of the plaintiff's existence as a corporation as the statute requires. So far as it refers to the plaintiff not being a corporation it is a mere recital, and not a denial. It is not sufficient to raise an issue on this question, under chapter 125, § 41, Code W. Va. 1899 (section 3861, Code 1906).

For the reasons herein stated, the decree, rendered in this cause by the circuit court of Putnam county on the 23d day of September, 1902, is reversed, and this court will render such decree as the lower court should have rendered, dissolving the injunction and dismissing plaintiff's bill.

(132 Ga. 451)

DOANE v. BLACK et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. April 16, 1909.)

1. HUSBAND AND WIFE (§§ 9, 13*)—RIGHT OF HUSBAND IN WIFE'S LAND—REDUCTION TO POSSESSION—NECESSITY.

The first item of the will of John D. Swift, who died in 1841, was: "It is my will that my wife * * * and my children [naming them, six in number] shall share an equal proportion of my estate, after my wife and [four named children] shall have a sufficient sum of money or property out of my estate to make them equal to the amount willed [to the other two children] by their grandfather; * * * it being my desire to place them all on an equality." The second item was: "It is my will that my wife remain on the place of residence where I now reside during her life or widowhood, and, in case she marries, for her to receive a child's part." The widow, who never remarried, lived on the land mentioned in the second item until 1848. Subsequently it was occupied by her tenants till 1852, when she sold her interest therein. She died in 1907. Eliza R. Swift, one of the testator's daughters named in the will, married E. H. Gillespie in 1851. In November, 1853, a one-sixth interest in the land mentioned in the second item of the will was sold at sheriff's sale, as the property of E. H. Gillespie, under a judgment against him on a debt contracted in 1852, and was purchased by Allen B. Johnson, who took the sheriff's deed to the same. Johnson died in 1854, leaving as his only heirs at law two children, Dannie C. Doane and T. A. Johnson. In 1880 T. A. Johnson conveyed his interest in the land to Dannie C. Doane. E. H. Gillespie died in the fall of 1853, leaving his widow and one child, who died in infancy. Neither Gillespie nor his wife, during coverture, occupied the land mentioned in the second item of the will, or any part thereof, or collected rents, or exercised any act of ownership over the land, or any interest therein. Held, that Dannie C. Doane acquired no interest in such land, for the reason that under numerous decisions of this court it is well settled that "prior to the Code of 1863, the marital rights of a husband did not attach to the real estate, either owned by the wife at the time of the marriage or acquired by her during coverture, unless she was in possession of the same, or it was reduced to possession by the husband during coverture." *Arnold v. BLACK et al. v. NOLAN et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. April 16, 1909.)

WILLS (§ 615*)—CONSTRUCTION—NATURE OF ESTATES AND INTERESTS CREATED.

The first item of the will of a testator, who died in 1841, was: "It is my will that my wife * * * and my children [naming them, six in number] shall share an equal proportion of my estate, after my wife and [four named children] shall have a sufficient sum of money or property out of my estate to make them equal to the amount willed [to the other two children] by their grandfather; * * * it being my desire to place them all on an equality." The second item was: "It is my will that my wife remain on the place of residence where I now reside, during her life or widowhood, and, in case she marries, for her to receive a child's part." The widow never remarried, and continued in possession of the premises referred to in the second item till 1852, when she sold and conveyed her interest therein. She died in 1907. Held that, construing the two items together, the intention of the testator was, after an equalization, to give to the widow and to each of his six children a one-seventh interest in his estate, including the land mentioned in the second item, and to the widow, in addition to a one-seventh interest, the privilege of remaining on the place referred to in the second item during her life or widowhood.

Error from Superior Court, Morgan County; H. J. Lewis, Judge.

Action for partition by Mary L. Black, in her own right and as guardian for her children, against J. A. Nolan and others. From a judgment in their favor, plaintiffs bring error. Affirmed.

F. M. Johnson and Cobb & Erwin, for plaintiffs in error. O. L. Williford, S. H. Sibley, Westmoreland Bros., and M. C. Few, for defendants in error.

FISH, C. J. Mary L. Black, in her own right and as guardian for her children, Kathleen and Elizabeth B. Black, filed a petition for partition against J. A. Nolan and Mattie E. Nolan. John T. Wilcox and Dannie C. Doane were made parties to the proceeding. The question at issue was as to the interest that Eliza R. Swift had in the land in controversy under the will of her father, John D. Swift. The trial judge held that it was a one-seventh interest, and that petitioner and her two children, the descendants of Eliza R. Swift, were entitled to such one-seventh interest, whereupon petitioner, who claimed that the interest of Eliza R. Swift in the land in question was an undivided one-sixth, excepted.

The will of John D. Swift, who died in 1841, in so far as is here material, was as follows:

"Item 1. It is my will that my wife, Mary Ann Swift, and my children, namely, Eudoxus S. Swift, Virginia A. Swift, John Augustin Swift, Eliza R. Swift, Caroline E. Swift, and Susan Young Swift, shall share an equal proportion of my estate, after my wife, Mary Ann Swift and John A. Swift, Eliza R. Swift, Caroline E. Swift, and Susan Young Swift shall have a sufficient sum of money or property out of my estate to make them equal to the amount willed Eudoxus S. Swift and Virginia Ann Swift by their grandfather, Maj. John Floyd, deceased, after said property shall be appraised, left Eudoxus S. Swift and Virginia Ann Swift by John Floyd, deceased: it being my desire to place them all on an equality.

"Item 2. It is my will that my wife remain on the place of residence where I now reside during her life or widowhood, and, in case she marries, for her to receive a child's part."

The land mentioned in item 2 is that for which a partition was sought. The testator's widow, who never remarried, lived on the land until about 1848, and her tenants thereafter occupied it until 1852, when she conveyed all her interest in the land to William H. Brooks. She died in 1907. The respondents claim under Mary Ann Swift, the widow of the testator, and his children mentioned in the first item of the will, other than Eliza R. Swift. Mary L. Black and her children, as descendants of Eliza R. Swift, claim only the share of Eliza R. in the land, and respondents do not claim this share, nor any part of the same. So the question is: Did Eliza R., under the will of her father, John D. Swift, take a one-sixth or a one-seventh interest in the land in question? The answer to that question depends upon what interest the will gave to the widow in this land. It is quite clear, from the first item of the will, that the intention of the testator was that his widow and his six named children should each have an equal share or interest in his whole estate, after the widow and four named children should each receive therefrom an amount in money or property equal to that which each of the other two children had received from their grandfather's estate. Under this item it was the evident purpose of the testator to dispose of the whole of his estate. The difficulty arises as to the proper construction of the second item of the will, in which there was an apparent departure from the scheme of exact equality between the widow and each of the children contained in the first item, as in the second item the widow was given the right to remain on the land in question during her life or widowhood.

Construing the two items together, we are of the opinion that the intention of the testator was to give to the widow and to each of his six children a one-seventh interest in his estate, including the land in question; the widow, however, being given the right to occupy such land during her life or widowhood, and, in the event of her remarriage, then there was to be an immediate division of this land, and, upon her death without having remarried, each of the testator's children was to take a one-seventh interest in this land, the other one-seventh interest being in the estate of the widow, or in her assignee in the event of its having been sold by her. We do not think that the second item created merely a life estate in the widow, with remainder to the children. Remainder is not mentioned therein, nor is it therein provided what disposition should be made of the land upon the death of the widow. Nor do we think that the effect of the second item was to so take the land from under the operation of the first item as to make an intestacy as to the land, after the interest therein given to the widow should expire. The natural and reasonable presumption is, that, when so solemn and important an instrument as a will is executed, the testator intends to dispose of his whole estate, and does not intend to die intestate as to any part of his property, which presumption is overcome only where the intention of the testator to do otherwise is plain and unambiguous, or is necessarily implied. 30 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 668. As already noted, it seems clear that the testator in this case intended to dispose of his whole estate.

The contention is made in behalf of the plaintiffs in error that several of the deeds under which defendants in error hold recognize the interest of each of the testator's children in the land as being a one-sixth, and that the deeds which placed the title in the defendants in error finally described their interest as a five-sixths interest and the widow's life interest, and that "the recital in these deeds by the predecessors in title of the Nolans amounted to a disclaimer of all interest except one-sixth, and this disclaimer binds all persons claiming under the deed." All of the deeds in the chain of title of defendants in error do not, however, treat the title in remainder as belonging to the six children only; and if the recitals in some of the deeds in such a chain of title are any evidence at all of the true title of Eliza R. Swift, under whom plaintiffs in error claim, they are certainly not sufficient to overturn the will itself. If the immediate grantor of the defendants in error had a six-sevenths interest, instead of a five-sixths interest, in the land, and the difference between these two interests was not conveyed, it would remain in such grantor or his heirs at law, and would not revert to Eliza R. Swift, under whom plaintiffs in error claim.

FLUKER et al. v. CITY OF UNION POINT et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. May 12, 1909.)

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 126*)—NIGHT WATCHMAN—CREATION OF OFFICE.

The mayor and council of the city of Union Point have no authority, under its charter, by ordinance to create the office of "night watchman" of said city, and to provide that the person holding such office shall serve until the ordinance is repealed, "shall go on duty at 6 p. m. and remain till 6 a. m.," and "shall protect the persons and property of said city," and "to that end * * * shall apprehend and arrest any persons violating the laws and ordinances of said city," and that he shall be paid by the city a stated sum per night as his salary.

Action by O. E. Fluker and others against the City of Union Point and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs bring error. Reversed.

Park & Park, for plaintiffs in error. Samuel H. Sibley, for defendants in error.

FISH, C. J. Only one point is presented for adjudication by the record in this case, and that is whether the city of Union Point can, under its charter, elect a night marshal, or watchman, and pay him a salary for his services from its treasury. The charter of the city in section 7 provides that the "mayor and councilmen" of such city "have the power, should they see fit to do so, to elect a mayor pro tem., a clerk of council, a city treasurer, * * * and a city marshal, to hold their offices for the term of one year, or until removed by the mayor and council, and to receive such compensation, if any, as may be fixed by the mayor and council. * * * That mayor and council may also appoint special police for special emergencies." Acts 1904, p. 678. Section 14 of the charter provides: "That the said mayor and council shall have full power and authority to enact and enforce all ordinances, by-laws, rules and regulations necessary for the good government of said city; and to protect * * * and promote peace and good order in said city." The mayor and council enacted the following ordinance: "In order to protect and promote peace and good order in the city of Union Point, a night watchman is hereby employed for said city of Union Point, at a salary of $1 per night. Said watchman shall go on duty at 6 p. m. and remain till 6 a. m. Said night watchman shall serve until this ordinance is repealed. Said night watchman shall protect the persons and property of said city. To that end he shall apprehend and arrest any persons violating the laws and ordinances of said city of Union Point." In pursuance of this ordinance, at a regular council meeting, "W. H. Gentry was elected night watchman, his salary to be $1 per night." Plaintiffs in error contend that as a municipal corporation has no power except that expressly or by necessary implication conferred upon it in its charter, and as the charter of Union Point conferred upon it authority to elect one marshal and to pay him a salary, the power of the city was restricted to the election of one marshal and to the payment of his salary, except in case of special emergencies, when authority was granted to appoint special police. The defendants in error contend that, under the general authority conferred by the charter upon the mayor and council to enact and enforce all ordinances and regulations necessary for the good government of the city, and to promote and protect the peace and good order thereof, the city was authorized, under its charter, to employ a night watchman, at $1 per night, to protect the persons and property of the city.

1. In our opinion the contention of the plaintiffs in error should prevail. Considering the ordinance as passed by the mayor and council and their action thereunder, we do not think that this is a case where merely an individual was employed to perform certain services for a specified time for the protection of the city and its citizens. The ordinance provided for the employment of a night watchman at a given salary, who was to go on duty at 6 p. m. and remain on duty until 6 a. m., and who was to serve until the ordinance should be repealed, and, for the purpose of protecting the persons and property of the city, the duty was imposed upon him of apprehending and arresting all persons violating the laws and ordinances of the city, and to fill the position so created Gentry "was elected night watchman, his salary to be $1 per night." Usually mere employes of a city are not elected and they do not receive salaries. Moreover, the night watchman provided for by the ordinance, in protecting the persons and property of the city, was to perform the duties of a regular marshal or policeman; for it was explicitly made his duty, in this respect, to arrest all persons violating the laws and ordinances of the city. The fact that the ordinance designated him a night watchman and provided that he should be "employed" does not keep him from being a police officer. See, in this connection, Collier v. Elliott, 100 Ga. 363, 28 S. E. 117. His duties, as prescribed by the ordinance, make him a night marshal or policeman; and we think it clear that the city, under its charter, has no authority to create such an office, fill it by election, and pay a salary to the incumbent thereof from the city treasury. It is clear that the action of the city authorities in this matter was not authorized by the provision in section 7 of the charter, authorizing them to "appoint special police for special emergencies." On the contrary, the presence of this provision in the charter indicates that it is only "in special emergencies" that "special police" can be employed. It seems apparent that the purpose of this section of the ordinance, in so far as the power of the mayor and council to elect or appoint police officers is concerned, was to deal exhaustively with the subject; for it provides only for the election of a city marshal, and then limits the power of the mayor and council, as to the employment of policemen other than the city marshal, to the authority to "appoint special police for special emergencies." There is nothing whatever in the ordinance in question which even suggests the existence of any special emergency requiring the employment of a night policeman. On the contrary, the ordinance indicates that the night watchman was to be elected and employed because, in the opinion of the mayor and council, it was necessary for the city to have a policeman on duty by night as well as one on duty by day, not to meet a special temporary emergency, but regularly, night after night, and for an indefinite period of time.

2. It being well established that taxpayers may enjoin municipal corporations and their officers from making an unauthorized appropriation of the corporate funds or an illegal disposition of the corporate property, it follows from the foregoing that the court below erred in refusing to grant the injunction prayed for by the plaintiffs in error.

Error from Superior Court, Clarke County; J. N. Worley, Judge.

Suit by J. C. Cooper against the National Fertilizer Company and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

John R. Cooper and E. K. Lumpkin, for plaintiff in error. Cobb & Erwin, for defendants in error.

EVANS, P. J. In January, 1907, J. C. Cooper purchased 1,504 tons of fertilizers from the National Fertilizer Company of Nashville, Tenn. The contract was in writing, and provided that the fertilizer company agreed to sell to Cooper certain brands of fertilizers at stated prices, which were to contain a certain percentage of fertilizer ingredients, and that Cooper was to sell the fertilizer, take notes from the purchasers, payable to the company, and deliver to the company these notes as collateral for the notes which Cooper was to give to the company. Agreeably to the contract, the fertilizer was shipped to Cooper, and Cooper executed to the company seven notes, aggregating $31,728.60, and delivered to the company the notes of the persons to whom he had sold the fertilizer, aggregating $30,544.24, as collateral to his own notes. Before the maturity of the notes of Cooper to the company, the latter discounted them with the American National Bank of Nashville, Tenn., indorsing each note. On September 9, 1907, the company returned the collateral notes to Cooper for collection for the account of the company, the proceeds to be applied to the payment of his notes. Cooper paid his note of $4,000, maturing November 1, 1907, and wrote the bank that, because of poor collections, he could not meet the other notes at maturity, and asked indulgence. On January 9, 1908, after repeated demands from the company, Cooper surrendered some of the collateral notes upon which there was due about $6,300. On January 16, 1908, Cooper and the company entered into a written agreement, the purport of which was that Cooper deposited with the company 202 shares of the stock of the Oconee Oil & Refining Company to secure the company against loss on its indorsements of Cooper's notes held by the bank, and the company agreed to secure an extension on the notes, so that Cooper could pay the balance, aggregating $27,328.60 in five installments, beginning in January and ending in June, 1908, each of the installments being for $5,000, except the last, which was to be the balance then due on the debt. Upon the payment of $10,000 Cooper was to have the right to withdraw 100 shares of the hypothecated stock, and, upon failure to pay any installment within 10 days after it was due, the company was authorized to sell the stock after publication of time and place of sale. Cooper paid $10,000 and withdrew 100 shares of the stock; but, he having failed to pay the installment due in May, 1908, the company gave notice of its intention to sell 192 shares of stock, and advertised the same as provided in the contract. Cooper then filed his petition to enjoin the sale, alleging that the company and the bank were foreign corporations owning no property in Georgia; that the bank was not an innocent purchaser, and the company was liable to him in the sum of $6,000 or other large sum on account of some of the fertilizer being shipped in defective sacks, and being short in quantity; and that because of these deficiencies, and because two of the brands did not come up to the guaranteed analysis as printed on the sack, he lost many of his customers, and his business was seriously injured. The prayer was that the bank be required to bring in the notes, that an accounting be had, and the amount of his damage be ascertained and credited on his notes, and the company be restrained from selling the stock hypothecated until the final hearing. No service was had on the bank, and it never appeared or answered. The company filed an answer denying that Cooper was entitled to any deduction on the notes by way of damages or otherwise, and also an answer in the nature of a cross-bill, in which it was alleged that the Oconee Oil & Refining Company had sold the most valuable part of its property, and what remained was worth much less than the capital stock; that this company was indebted to Cooper for salary and otherwise; that Cooper had no visible property except about $600 worth of personal property, and it was apprehensive that the 192 shares of stock was insufficient to pay the balance due of the debt, and by way of equitable garnishment it prayed that Cooper be enjoined from collecting any debt due by the Oconee Company to him, and the Oconee Company be enjoined from paying such debts to Cooper. On the interlocutory hearing the court refused to enjoin the sale of the hypothecated stock, and did enjoin the Oconee Oil & Refining Company and J. C. Cooper as prayed in the cross-bill. Cooper excepted.

1-3. We will first notice the phase of the case presented by the application of the plaintiff in error to enjoin the National Fertilizer Company from selling the stock of the Oconee Oil & Refining Company, hypothecated to secure the payment of his notes to it, pursuant to the agreement of January 16, 1908. Briefly stated, the plaintiff's contention is that he has suffered damage by the fertilizer company's breach of contract; that the fertilizer company is a nonresident without property in this state, and the sale of the collateral should be stayed until an accounting can be had, and the exact amount of the plaintiff's indebtedness ascertained, which amount the plaintiff avers his willingness to pay. The basis of damage is alleged to be (1) loss in weight in the fertilizers shipped; (2) cost of resacking fertilizers received in damaged sacks; and (3) injury to his business as a dealer in fertilizers, resulting from the fertilizers being shipped in bad and inferior sacks, and from a shortage in weight, and because the actual and official analysis of two of the brands fell below the guaranteed analysis printed on the sacks. With reference to the first and second elements of damage, there was practically no dispute that at the time Cooper signed the agreement of January 16, 1908, by means of which he procured an extension of the time of payment of his notes, he had knowledge of these deficiencies in the fertilizers. When the plaintiff with such knowledge entered into an agreement, and secured an extension of time of payment of his notes, he waived his right to plead these matters as a defense to his notes. Am. Car. Co. v. Atlanta St. Ry. Co., 100 Ga. 254, 28 S. E. 40; Lunsford v. Malsby, 101 Ga. 39, 28 S. E. 496; Montfort v. Americus Guano Co., 108 Ga. 12, 33 S. E. 636. On the interlocutory hearing the plaintiff testified, and it was not denied by the defendant, that at the time the agreement of January 16, 1908, was signed the plaintiff did not know that some of the fertilizer ingredients fell below the percentage contained in the guaranteed analysis as printed on the sacks. In his petition the plaintiff alleged that by reason of the fertilizers "being shipped in bad and inferior bags, and difficult to handle, and shortage in fertilizer ingredients, and failure to come up to the guaranteed analysis hereinbefore set forth, and short weights, each and all of which was due to the failure of the said National Fertilizer Company to comply with their agreement as aforesaid, he was injured and damaged in the sum of five thousand dollars ($5,000), in that he lost many of his good and valuable customers, and his fertilizer business was seriously injured, and the said goods so sacked by the said defendant under the brands and name of the petitioner and not coming up to representation, his business was seriously injured thereby; that his fertilizer business dropped from twenty-four hundred (2,400) tons of last year to only some seven hundred (700) tons this year; and that said injury to his said business is serious and permanent, and that it was directly due and caused by the failure of the said defendant to comply with their said contract in shipping inferior goods, short weights, and in inferior and improper bags as aforesaid, and that they are liable to him therefor." There was ample proof before the judge to authorize a finding that, at the time the plaintiff received the fertilizers and sold them to his customers, he had knowledge of the deficiency in weight and defective sacks, of which he now complains. Having knowledge of such condition of the fertilizers when he sold them, if any injury to his business accrued from their sale on this account, he could not hold the fertilizer company responsible therefor, for the reason that the proximate cause of the injury was his own voluntary act in selling fertilizers which were known to be of short weight and defectively sacked. Henderson Elevator Co. v. North Ga. Milling Co., 126 Ga. 279, 55 S. E. 50 (5).

Is the fertilizer company liable on its breach of warranty for injury to the plaintiff's business because the quantity of one of the ingredients of two brands of the fertilizer fell slightly below the seller's guaranty under all the circumstances of the case? One of the brands of the fertilizer was guaranteed to contain phosphoric acid 9 per cent., nitrogen 2.47 per cent., and potash 3 per cent. The fertilizing ingredients actually found by the state chemist were phosphoric acid 10.55 per cent., nitrogen 2.10 per cent., and potash 3.25 per cent. The commercial value of this brand as claimed by the manufacturer was $21.13, and as actually found by official analysis was $21.09; the difference in commercial value being 4 cents per ton. Another brand was shown to be deficient in phosphoric acid .75 per cent. and in commercial value 23 cents per ton. Of the 1,504 tons purchased 117 tons were shown to be deficient in commercial value 4 cents per ton, and 75 tons were shown to be deficient in commercial value 23 cents per ton; the deficiency in neither brand amounting to as much as 3 per cent. of the commercial value. Section 3 of the act approved December 18, 1901 (Acts 1901, p. 65), is as follows: "If any commercial fertilizer or fertilizer material offered for sale in this state, shall, upon official analysis, prove deficient in any of its ingredients as guaranteed and branded upon the sacks or packages, and if by reason of such deficiency the commercial value thereof shall fall three per cent. below the guaranteed total commercial value of such fertilizer or fertilizer material, then any note or obligation given in payment thereof shall be collectible by law only for the amount of actual total commercial value as ascertained by said official analysis, and any person or corporation selling the same shall be liable to the consumer, by reason of such deficiency, for such damages, if any, as may be proven and obtained by him on trial before a jury in any court of competent jurisdiction in this state." There is no common-law duty to brand sacks of fertilizer. This is purely a statutory requirement. The act of 1901 provides that certain things shall be done, and that certain rights and liabilities shall result from a failure to comply with its terms. Possibly from a recognition of the difficulty of mixing the ingredients into a perfectly uniform composition of great bulk, and that, however earnest an effort might be made to do so, there might be slight variances in the different parts of a large quantity of the fertilizer, and consequently slight variances in different analyses made of samples taken from such parts, the Legislature made provision to cover such variances as they deemed reasonable. Had they said in terms that the manufacturer should brand on the sacks or packages an analysis which should be within at least 3 per cent. of that of the state chemist, or that the requirement of branding should be deemed sufficiently complied with if this branded analysis came within 3 per cent. of that of the state chemist, the intention would have been plain. Is the case materially different where the act provides that if there is a deficiency in any of the ingredients, and "by reason of such deficiency the commercial value thereof shall fall 3 per cent. below the guaranteed total commercial value of such fertilizer or fertilizer material," certain rights and liabilities should follow, making the official analysis the test of the reasonableness of the variance in the commercial value? Is not the negative pregnant plain that such results do not follow a variance of less than 3 per cent? Spinks v. Rome Guano Co., 108 Ga. 614, 33 S. E. 906; Sutherland v. Sou. Pac. Guano Co., 108 Ga. 742, 33 S. E. 811. The plaintiff's case as to this feature does not rest on the alleged violation of any common-law duty by the defendants, but upon a failure to comply with the statute. Were it otherwise, the damages which he could recover for a breach of contract would only be such as "may fairly and reasonably be considered either arising naturally (i. e., according to the usual course of things) from such breach of contract itself, or such as may reasonably be supposed to have been in the contemplation of the parties, at the time they made the contract, as the probable result of the breach of it." Hadley v. Baxendale, 9 Exch. 341; Ga. R. v. Hayden, 71 Ga. 522, 51 Am. Rep. 274; Randall v. Raper, El. Bl. & El. 84; Civ. Code 1895, §§ 3912, 3913.

There is no contention by the plaintiff that his customers refused to pay for fertilizers because of the variance in the percentage of a fertilizing ingredient, or that the variance between the guaranteed and official analysis was such as to essentially or materially change the constituency of the fertilizer or render it unsuited for use as a fertilizer of the grade and character represented by the guaranteed analysis. Nor is there any contention that the fertilizer company knew of any deficiency in the guaranteed analysis. In his sworn petition, and also in his affidavit, submitted on the hearing, the plaintiff arrived at the amount of his damages which he claimed resulted to his business by estimating his prospective profits per ton on the difference in tonnage between the sales of the years 1907 and 1908. A plaintiff who seeks reparation in damages to his business from a breach of contract is limited to the recovery of damages which are the natural and material consequence of the act from which the damage flows. Loss of prospective profits is ordinarily too remote for recovery. The profits of a commercial business are dependent on so many hazards and chances that unless the anticipated profits are capable of ascertainment, and the loss of them traceable directly to the defendant's wrongful act, they are too speculative to afford a basis for the computation of damages. Where no fact is pleaded to reduce the recovery on a note for fertilizers other than a variance in fertilizer ingredient between the guaranteed and official analysis, and it appears that the total commercial value of the ingredients as ascertained by official analysis comes within 3 per cent. of the commercial value of the ingredients as guaranteed and branded on the sacks, the vendor may recover the contract price. The law as embodied in the act of 1901 becomes a part of the contract of sale, and such a small discrepancy is declared by the Legislature as unavailing to impair the contract of sale. In view, therefore, of the facts before the judge, he was authorized to find that the alleged damages to the defendant's business were neither contemplated by the parties in the sale and purchase of the fertilizers, nor were they the legal consequence of the immaterial variance between the guaranteed and official analysis of two brands of the fertilizer, that, if the plaintiff's business was injured, the proximate cause was the sale knowingly made by Cooper of fertilizer of short weight and in defective sacks.

4. We will next consider the phase of the case presented by the cross-petition, the essential purpose of which is to protect the fertilizer company from loss on account of its indorsement of the notes of Cooper held by the American National Bank by impounding whatever funds or effects the Oconee Oil Refining Company may be due to Cooper on account of claims for salary or otherwise.

The evidence as to the insolvency of Cooper was conflicting. It appeared that he was a salaried officer of the Oconee Company. The court enjoined the Oconee Company from paying over any money to Cooper until the final decree in the case. The cross-petition partakes of the nature of an equitable garnishment, and the right to the relief prayed is predicated on the absence of any common-law remedy, and the equitable right of an indorsee to compel the payment of the notes. It is undisputed that the notes of Cooper which the Fertilizer indorsed are held by an innocent purchaser for value before maturity, and at the time of this proceeding were past due. Under the agreement of January 16, 1908, relatively to Cooper, the fertilizer company sustained the relation of surety. Our Code does not give to a surety or indorser who has not paid the debt the remedy of garnishment. But equity affords a remedy by entertaining a petition at the instance of the surety against his principal at any time after the debt has fallen due to compel payment, although he may not have been sued. Bispham's Eq. § 331; 16 Enc. Pl. & Pr. 951; Sanford v. United States Fidelity Co., 116 Ga. 689, 43 S. E. 61. Under the averments of the cross-petition and the evidence submitted the court did not abuse its discretion in restraining Cooper from collecting any debt which might be due him by the Oconee Oil & Refining Company.

5. The judgment complained of is alleged to be erroneous, because its effect is to deprive the plaintiff in error of certain constitutional rights and guaranties, viz., the right of trial by jury, the right of appeal to the courts, the right to appear in the courts by person or attorney, due process of law, and protection of person and property, and that its effect is also to violate the fundamental principle that, where there is a right, there is a remedy. None of these constitutional questions were raised in the pleadings, nor does the record disclose that such were passed upon by the trial judge.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

JACKSON v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. May 12, 1909.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§§ 785, 807*) — INSTRUCTIONS.

The court charged the jury in part as follows: "From the peculiar character of rape and assault with intent to rape, care is to be used in regard to them. The injured female is usually a competent witness in such cases; but the degree of credit to be given to her evidence depends more or less upon the concurrence of the circumstances of the fact with her testimony. For instance, if she be of good fame, if she presently discovered the offense, made pursuit after the offender, showed circumstances and signs of the injury, if the place where the fact was done was remote from the people, inhabitants, or passengers, or if the offender fled, these and the like are concurring evidences to give greater probability to her testimony, when proved by others as well as herself. But if she concealed the injury for any length of time after she had an opportunity to complain, if the place where the fact was supposed to be done, when and where it is probable that she might be heard by others, these and like circumstances carry a strong presumption that her testimony is false or feigned. Such is the care that the law uses in scrutinizing allegations of the crime of rape." Held, that the excerpt from the charge above quoted was not open to the criticism "that it is argumentative in favor of the prosecutor, the woman alleged to have been raped, that its effect is to lend undue weight to the testimony of the prosecutor and to influence the jury in believing that her testimony was to be believed in preference to the other testimony, if it chanced to coincide with the language used in the first portion of said charge."

2. RAPE (§ 51*)—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

The verdict was authorized by the evidence.

3. RAPE (§ 59*)—INSTRUCTIONS—DEGREE OF OFFENSE.

The evidence in the case requiring a finding that the defendant was guilty of the offense of rape, if guilty of any offense, it was not error for the court to refuse to submit to the jury the question of whether the defendant was guilty of the assault with intent to commit a rape.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Chatham County; W. G. Charlton, Judge.

William Jackson was convicted of rape, and he brings error. Affirmed.

Shelby Myrick, for plaintiff in error. W. W. Osborn, Sol. Gen., and John C. Hart, Atty. Gen., for the State.

BECK, J. William Jackson was indicted for rape; it being alleged that he committed the offense upon the person of Louisa Talley. Upon the trial the jury rendered a verdict of guilty, with a recommendation. The defendant made a motion for a new trial, which was overruled, and to this judgment he excepted.

1. The court in part charged the jury as follows: "From the peculiar character of rape and assault with intent to rape, care is to be used in regard to them. The injured female is usually a competent witness in such cases; but the degree of credit to be given to her evidence depends more or less upon the concurrence of the circumstances of the fact with her testimony. For instance, if she be of good fame, if she presently discovered the offense, made pursuit after the offender, showed circumstances and signs of the injury, if the place where the fact was done was remote from the people, inhabitants, or passengers, or if the offender fled, these and the like are concurring evidences to give greater probability to her testimony, when proved by others as well as herself. But if she concealed the injury for any length of time after she had an opportunity to complain, if the place where the fact was supposed to be done, when and where it is probable that she might be heard by others, these and like circumstances carry a strong presumption that her testimony is false or feigned. Such is the care that the law uses in scrutinizing allegations of the crime of rape." The charge quoted was excepted to on the ground "that it is argumentative in favor of the prosecutor, the woman alleged to have been raped, that its effect is to lend undue weight to the testimony of the prosecutor, and to influence the jury in believing that her testimony was to be believed in preference to the other testimony, if it chanced to coincide with the language used in the first portion of said charge." We do not think that the portion of the charge above set forth is open to the criticism made upon it. It is certainly not an argument tending to influence the jury to form any conclusion adverse to the defendant independently of the evidence, but was cautionary in its character, impressing upon the minds of the jurors the duty of carefully considering and scrutinizing the facts and circumstances of the case which tended to throw light upon the main issue in the case.

2. The second and third grounds of the amended motion are as follows: "(2) Because the testimony in said case fails to show that the offense of rape was committed by the defendant beyond a reasonable doubt. (3) Because the testimony touching the offense for which the defendant was indicted and found guilty does not constitute or make out the offense of rape as defined by the law of Georgia." It is apparent that the two grounds of the motion set forth immediately above are but restatements, with some variation in form, of the general ground that the verdict is without evidence to support it. An examination of the testimony contained in the record discloses that the woman upon whose person it is alleged in the indictment the crime was committed identified the prisoner at the bar as her assailant. Besides her testimony as to the identity of the accused with the person who committed the offense, this witness was corroborated by proved facts and circumstances. The victim of the offense of which the defendant was convicted, after testifying as to the assault upon her, the threats and menaces used by the assailant to intimidate her, after having described the place at which the crime was committed, her efforts to prevent the consummation of the offense, her outcries after it had been consummated, and her efforts to have the assailant apprehended, and after having repeated with particularity the details of the circumstances of the assault, used the following language: "That man [the accused] followed me, threatened to kill me, and assaulted me. * * * I went home crying, and told him [her husband] a man had assaulted me and attempted to kill me. * * * It was a bright moonshiny night; and I tried to catch a glimpse of his face, so I would know him if he didn't kill me. * * * The road was muddy. It had been raining, and was very muddy, and I was thrown into the water. He dragged me from about where I am sitting to the extent of this room. He carried me to the right of Mr. Schwarz's vegetable garden, and on the other side is broom straw. It was between 10 and 11 o'clock as near as I can judge. * * * He assaulted me. He entered my person. He accomplished his purpose." It is insisted that, even if we accept as true the testimony of the prosecutor, still the offense with which the defendant is charged is not made out beyond a reasonable doubt. The language used by the witness clearly means, and could not mean anything else, than that the accused forcibly and against her will had carnal knowledge of her, and under the evidence in the case the jury were authorized so to find.

3. Under the evidence in the case the jury were authorized to find the defendant guilty of the offense of rape. There is nothing in the testimony of the prosecutrix which would have supported a finding that the accused was guilty merely of an assault with intent to commit rape. That being true, the court below did not err in not submitting to the jury the question as to whether or not the defendant was guilty of an assault with intent to commit rape.

LOCKWOOD v. MUHLBERG.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. April 17, 1909.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 302*)—GROUND OF MOTION FOR NEW TRIAL—SUFFICIENCY TO RAISE QUESTION.

The only ground of the motion for a new trial relied on was as follows: "The court erred in refusing to permit plaintiff to introduce in evidence the fact that on the first trial of the case, after the conclusion of the plaintiff's evidence, the defendant introduced an ordinance of the city of Savannah allowing pawnbrokers to charge 10 per cent. per month interest on the dollar on sums less than $25, whereupon the court, on motion of the defendant, directed a verdict; said refusal to permit this evidence to be introduced being error, in that it eliminated from the consideration of the jury a legitimate means of throwing light upon the interpretation of the word 'charges' as used in the contract, and thus assist them to determine whether the use of that word was a blind for usury or interest, and was merely a ruse or device to evade the usury laws, said meaning of the word 'charges,' and the bona fides of its use in the contract, being a material issue in the case, and the fact that on the previous trial, under the same facts, the defendant confessed the word to mean 'interest,' and sought to escape under the ordinance, was material assistance to the jury, and its exclusion was error, prejudicial to the plaintiff." Held that, under previous rulings of this court, such ground did not raise with sufficient distinctness a question for determination by a reviewing court; it being merely stated that the presiding judge refused to allow the movant to introduce "a fact" in evidence, without stating that any evidence was offered for the purpose of proving such fact, or of what such evidence consisted, or whether it was oral or documentary, or both, or that any particular evidence was offered and excluded. 2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 588*)—BRIEF OF EVIDENCE — RECITALS — EFFECT — PRESENTATION AND RESERVATION OF GROUNDS OF REVIEW—MOTION FOR NEW TRIAL.

While there are incorporated in the brief of evidence, in connection with the cross-examination of a witness, certain recitals as to the witness being interrogated on the subject of the occurrences at the last trial, objections to the evidence, arguments of counsel, and the ruling of the court, such recitals form no proper part of the brief of the evidence, and cannot be considered as authenticating the facts stated.

The motion for a new trial, not the brief of evidence, must show the ruling of the court of which complaint is made. Central of Georgia Ry. Co. v. McClifford, 120 Ga. 90, 47 S. E. 590; McComb v. Hines, 123 Ga. 246, 51 S. E. 300.

TAYLOR et al. v. WRIGHT.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. May 13, 1909.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 731*)—ASSIGNMENTS OF ERROR—SUFFICIENCY.

By agreement of counsel for both parties this case was submitted to the trial judge, "to decide on the law and the facts without intervention of a jury." After the conclusion of the evidence the judge rendered a decision in favor of the defendant, disposing of the same upon the law and the facts, the only exception to which is in the following words: "To which finding and judgment of his honor, the judge, the plaintiff in error excepted and now excepts, and assigns the same as error." Held, that such assignment of error is too general to raise any question for determination by this court; and, there being no other assignment of error which can, under the judge's certificate to the bill of exceptions, be considered, the writ of error is, upon motion, dismissed. Lyndon v. Georgia Ry. & Elec. Co., 129 Ga. 353, 58 S. E. 1058.

BECK, J. In addition to the general exception stated in the headnote, there were specific exceptions to the rulings of the court upon the question of the admissibility of certain oral testimony; but the judge, in his certificate to the bill of exceptions, states that this evidence was rejected by him and was not considered in reaching his finding and judgment as rendered, leaving as the only question to be considered the judgment which disposed of the case upon the law and the facts. JACKSON v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. May 12, 1909.)

1. HOMICIDE (§ 309*)—VOLUNTARY MANSLAUGHTER—INSTRUCTIONS.

There was evidence from which the jury might infer that the killing was without premeditation, upon a sudden impulse of passion, aroused not only by words, but also by an attempted indecent exposure of the person of the deceased in the presence of defendant's wife, and by the commission upon the defendant of an assault by the deceased; and an appropriate instruction on the law of voluntary manslaughter should have been given to the jury.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Terrell County; W. C. Worrill, Judge.

Henry Jackson was convicted of murder, and brings error. Reversed.

M. C. Edwards, for plaintiff in error. J. A. Laing, Sol. Gen., by R. R. Arnold, and John C. Hart, Atty. Gen., for the State.

EVANS, P. J. Henry Jackson was convicted of the murder of Henry Shine, and recommended to mercy. The court refused him a new trial, and he excepts.

1. Several of the exceptions go to the point that the court erred in instructing the jury that the defendant was either guilty of murder, or not guilty, and in failing to give an appropriate charge on the law of voluntary manslaughter. The defendant and the deceased had married sisters. About two months prior to the homicide the wife of the deceased separated from him, and had since resided with the defendant and his wife. The defendant lived in a house containing three rooms. The front of the house had two rooms, separated by a hall five or six feet wide. The homicide occurred in the hall of the house, between 8 and 10 o'clock at night. The only persons in the house at the time of the homicide were the defendant and the deceased and their wives. The wife of the defendant was incompetent to testify, and the wife of the deceased gave substantially this account of the tragedy: About 8 o'clock at night the deceased came to the house of the defendant and requested permission to spend the night with the witness. She declined the request, and the deceased said he was going to stay anyway, and commenced stripping off his clothes in the presence of herself, her sister, and the defendant. Whereupon the defendant said, "Don't be undressing here before my wife, you go on home," to which the deceased replied that "he didn't give a God damn, he was going to stay all night." The defendant then said, "You go on home; I don't want you here undressing before my wife that way," and the deceased pulled up his pants and said, "By God, he was going to stay all night." The defendant got his gun and commanded the deceased to leave the house. At this stage of the colloquy the witness says she apprehended a difficulty and jumped behind the bed. She heard the defendant say, "Don't come on me, cutting at me; I will shoot you," and about that time the gun fired and the witness ran from the house. The witness did not see any knife in her husband's hand, nor did she see an open knife on the floor near his hand. The next morning an open knife was picked up from the floor under the hand of the deceased before the body of the deceased had been removed. There was a conflict in the evidence as to whether this knife belonged to the defendant or the deceased. An unopened knife belonging to the deceased was taken from his pocket after his death.

We think this testimony demanded a charge on the law of voluntary manslaughter. The jury could infer from it that the killing was without premeditation, upon a sudden violent impulse of passion, aroused, not alone by words, but also by an attempted exhibition of the person of the deceased in the presence of the defendant's wife, and by the commission upon the defendant of an assault by the deceased. It is true that the wife of the deceased did not testify that she saw the deceased make a knife thrust at the defendant; but she did say that, while hiding behind the bed, she heard the defendant warn the deceased not to cut him, simultaneously with the discharge of the gun. An open knife was found by the body of the deceased. The defendant's contention was that it was the knife with which the deceased assaulted him. The State contended, under the evidence that the open knife belonged to the defendant, and was placed by the body of the deceased after death by the defendant to give color to the claim of self-defense. The solution of these contentions could only be made by the jury. We think the jury might infer that an assault was made by the deceased upon the defendant with a knife. If the intent of the deceased in making the assault was not to commit a felony, but only a serious personal injury, such as a stabbing, and the defendant killed under the impulse of passion because of such attempt, the homicide would be voluntary manslaughter. Rumsey v. State, 126 Ga. 423, 55 S. E. 167; Jenkins v. State, 123 Ga. 523, 51 S. E. 598; Gann v. State, 30 Ga. 67.

2. Counsel for the defendant propounded the following question on cross-examination to the wife of the deceased, a witness for the state: "Why did you separate from him?" (the deceased). The answer would have been: "I couldn't get along with him. He beat me and fought me all the time." The court excluded the answer. It is insisted that this testimony was admissible as tending to show that the defendant had nothing to do with the separation or reconciliation of the deceased with his wife. There was nothing in the testimony which rendered this testimony relevant. There was no contention that the defendant was concerned, either with the separation of the witness from her husband, or any effort at reconciliation of the estranged spouses. The rejected testimony was irrelevant.

3. It is complained that the court failed in his instructions to the jury to define a "reasonable doubt." It has been held that, in the absence of a written request, it is not error for the judge to omit to define such words as "ordinary care," or "extraordinary care and diligence," which have an obvious meaning. Savannah Electric Co. v. Bennett, 130 Ga. 597, 61 S. E. 529. For the same reason there is no error in failing to define the words "reasonable doubt," where a properly worded written request is not made. Battle v. State, 103 Ga. 53, 29 S. E. 491; Nelms v. State, 123 Ga. 575, 51 S. E. 588.

Than as indicated in the first division of this opinion, no error is made to appear.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur.

MERCHANTS' & FARMERS' BANK v. McMULLEN.

HUSBAND AND WIFE (§ 232*) — ACTION AGAINST WIFE — PAYMENT OF HUSBAND'S DEBT—EVIDENCE.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Colquitt County; R. G. Mitchell, Judge.

Action by the Merchants' & Farmers' Bank against Rachael McMullen. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

W. A. Covington, J. G. & J. F. McCall, and Stanley S. Bennet, for plaintiff in error. Shipp & Kline and Edwin L. Bryan, for defendant in error.

HOLDEN, J. The plaintiff, a banking corporation, brought suit against the defendant on a negotiable promissory note for $980.36, principal. The defendant filed a defense wherein she contended, for reasons therein alleged, that she was not liable on such note, and further contended that prior to the execution of this note she had given several other notes to the plaintiff for her husband's debt, and had paid the same, and prayed judgment against the plaintiff for the amount thus paid. Upon the trial the jury found a verdict in favor of the defendant for $1,405.82, and to the order of the court overruling the plaintiff's motion for a new trial exceptions were filed. The following facts appear from the evidence: The defendant gave to the plaintiff a note, dated January 1, 1897, for $1,405.82, which she contended was given in settlement of her husband's debt. Other notes were given in renewal of this note, and the amount appearing to be due was finally paid by the defendant. It was for such payments that the defendant sought a recovery against the plaintiff. On January 1, 1897, the plaintiff held a note against John and W. S. McMullen, and the note of the defendant, above referred to, was given to take up this note.

Upon the trial of the case the husband of the defendant testified that the note for $1,405.82, given by his wife, the defendant, to the plaintiff, was given under the following circumstances: "He bought some mules from Mr. Groover, and it fell due, and he sent John and W. S. McMullen to John McCall to get him to pay it for witness, and he paid it and took their notes." It does not appear when the note of John and W. S. McMullen was given to the bank. The testimony would seem to indicate that John McCall was the attorney for and a director for the bank at the time this note was given. The testimony shows that he had no authority, at the time the note of John and W. S. McMullen was given, to make loans for the bank, or to do anything except to draw papers for the bank as its attorney. There is no evidence to show that the official of the bank who advanced the money on the John and W. S. McMullen note knew that the note was being given for the debt of the defendant's husband; and, if they did know it, there is no evidence that, when the defendant gave her note to the bank to take up the John and W. S. McMullen note, the bank looked to the husband for the payment of the debt represented by the John and W. S. McMullen note, or that the bank had any right to collect such debt out of him. The defendant's husband says that John McCall looked to him for the debt; but it does not appear to have been owing to McCall, or that McCall had any right to collect the debt out of the defendant's husband, nor does it appear that McCall was in any way liable to the bank by reason of the transaction. Defendant's husband said that he did not know to whom the bank looked for the payment; but, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, it will be presumed that the bank looked for payment to the parties whose note it held, and to no one else. There was no evidence to authorize the jury to believe that the bank held any claim against the husband of the defendant when she gave her note to the bank to take up the John and W. S. McMullen note held by and payable to the bank. The mere fact that the bank, on the notes of John and W. S. McMullen, loaned them money to pay the debt of the husband of the defendant, would not of itself authorize the finding that the bank had any right to collect out of the husband the debt represented by the note. There is no evidence that the defendant's husband ever agreed to pay the bank or McCall the money advanced John and W. S. McMullen to pay the husband's debt, or that the bank held the note as collateral security for any debt. The evidence was not sufficient to authorize a recovery by the defendant against the plaintiff for any payments made by her to the plaintiff, on the theory that such payments were made in settlement of her husband's debt.

It is unnecessary to discuss the evidence on the other issues in the case. We think it proper, under all the evidence in the case, that a new trial should be granted; and the judgment of the court overruling the motion for a new trial is reversed. All the Justices concur.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Mitchell County; W. N. Spence, Judge.

Action by S. B. Luckey against J. B. Miller and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants bring error. Reversed.

R. J. Bacon, for plaintiffs in error. Pope & Bennet, for defendant in error.

HOLDEN, J. 1. The defendant in error, Luckey, brought suit against Miller & Larrimore as a copartnership, and against the individual members thereof, for damages alleged to have resulted from acts of trespass claimed to have been committed by the defendants in cutting and boxing, for turpentine purposes, certain trees on the lands of the plaintiff. Upon the trial of the case, a general verdict was rendered in favor of the plaintiff, and the defendants made a motion for a new trial, which was overruled. To the order of the court overruling the motion for a new trial the defendant Miller alone excepted; but by amendment in this court the partnership of Miller & Larrimore, and Larrimore as an individual, were made parties plaintiff with Miller in the bill of exceptions. Before pleading to the merits, Miller filed a special plea in abatement, alleging that he was a minor, 20 years of age, and that the service upon him, not being personal, was insufficient. Upon a hearing had upon this special plea, the court overruled the same, and Miller filed exceptions pendente lite, which were duly certified, and error on this ruling is assigned in the bill of exceptions. It appears from the recitals in the exceptions pendente lite that service was not had on Miller personally, and that "he was a member of the turpentine firm of Miller & Larrimore at that time, and doing business for himself as such member."

We think the court committed error in overruling this plea in abatement. In order to perfect service on a minor over 14 years of age in a suit against him, it is necessary, under Civ. Code 1895, § 4987, to serve such minor personally and appoint a guardian ad litem for him. Under the provisions of this section, until personal service on him is made and a guardian ad litem appointed, he is no party to the suit. In this connection, see Welch v. Agar, 84 Ga. 583, 586, 11 S. E. 149, 20 Am. St. Rep. 380; Burnett v. Summerlin, 110 Ga. 349, 35 S. E. 655; Maryland Casualty Co. v. Lanham, 124 Ga. 859, 53 S. E. 395; Douglas v. Johnson, 130 Ga. 472, 60 S. E. 1041. If an infant, by permission of his parent or guardian, engages in any business as an adult, and becomes bound for all contracts connected with such business, as provided in Civ. Code, 1895, § 3650, this fact would not, while he was so engaged in business, dispense with the necessity of making service on him in the regular method provided for in suits against minors. The provisions of such section relate to liability for his contracts, and have no reference to the method of service upon him in a suit against him.

Nor would the fact that "infancy is no defense to an action for a tort, provided the defendant has arrived at those years of discretion and accountability prescribed by this Code for criminal offenses," as declared by Civ. Code 1895, § 3904, obviate the necessity for the usual service on minors. As stated in Maryland Casualty Co. v. Lanham, supra, on page 860 of 124 Ga., page 396 of 53 S. E.: "This rule refers to the liability of an infant for his torts, and not to the proper manner of bringing suit against him therefor. So, likewise, the rule that the exemption of an infant generally from liability on his contracts is a personal privilege (Civ. Code 1895, § 3649) does not affect the proper method of suing and serving an infant." The court committed error in refusing to sustain the plea in abatement.

2. It appears from one ground of the amendment to the motion for a new trial that a witness for the plaintiff, on direct examination, gave an estimate of the damages resulting from the alleged trespass, and immediately thereafter, on cross-examination, he said that it was impossible for him "to make any proper calculation on the market value before and after it [the timber] was cut," and that "the calculation was just my own judgment." We think the court should have sustained the motion of defendants to rule out this testimony. The opinion of a witness as to the value he places on property might be entirely different from his opinion as to its market value. Where a trespass is committed, resulting in the destruction of growing timber, the measure of damages is the difference between the market value of the tract of land before the trespass and after such trespass. Where such timber is destroyed, and by reason thereof there is a depreciation in the market value of the land, the measure of damages is "the value of the timber destroyed in its then state as attached to the land on which it grew." Western & Atlantic R. Co. v. Tate, 129 Ga. 526, 59 S. E. 266. See, also, Central R. & B. Co. v. Murray, 93 Ga. 256, 20 S. E. 129, where it was held: "Timber injured by the fire, but not destroyed, is to be dealt with on the same basis, to the extent of the difference between its value as it was before the fire and as the fire left it."

There were other assignments of error re-

ing in the amendment to the motion 24 special assignments of error. The view that this court takes of the merits of this case makes immaterial any of the errors specially complained of in the motion for a new trial, and we will consider only the grounds of demurrer which we deem meritorious, and will decide the case on the uncontroverted facts as they appear in the brief of evidence.

1, 2. The evidence, briefly stated, shows the following case: Plaintiff was the owner and was in possession of the mule in controversy, which he had bought from Henry Paul English, in Early county, this state, on September 2, 1907, paying therefor $150, and had placed the mule in his stable. English had previously bought this mule in Early county from one C. C. White, who had the mule in his possession at the time of the sale. On February 6, 1908, the agent or agents of the defendants, at night, entered the lot and stable of the plaintiff, tore down his lot fence, and seized and carried away his mule to the state of Alabama. After discovering the loss of the mule, the plaintiff traced it to Columbia, Ala., and located it in the possession of the defendants, in their stable. The defendants attempted to justify their seizure of the mule on the ground that they held a mortgage to the mule, executed by its then owner, C. C. White, to whom they had sold the mule in Alabama, the mortgage being for the balance of the purchase money, and claimed that under the law of the state of Alabama they held an absolute title to the mule, under this mortgage, which was properly recorded in Alabama. They also set up that they held the mule in controversy under a valid claim of right and title, namely, that on or about February 6, 1908, said property was in the lawful custody of J. R. Baker, deputy sheriff of Houston county, Ala., said Baker having taken possession of the same for and in behalf of the plaintiff, they subsequently having recovered possession of the property from Baker under an action of detinue, brought in the circuit court of Houston county, Ala.; a certified copy of the detinue proceedings and the judgment thereon being attached as an exhibit to this special plea. A certified copy of the mortgage from C. C. White to the defendants was also attached as an exhibit to the plea. The evidence further shows that the mule had been delivered into the possession of J. R. Baker, deputy sheriff of Houston county, Ala., by the agents of the defendants after they had seized it in Georgia, and had taken it from the stable of the plaintiff, and carried it into the state of Alabama. These facts, which are not controverted, in our opinion, demanded a verdict for the plaintiff for the value of the mule when wrongfully seized and taken from the possession of the plaintiff by the agent or agents of the defendants.

The voluminous assignments of error merely tend to obscure the simplicity of the real issue in this case; and if the ingenuity of learned counsel has discovered any error of law committed by the court in the trial, such error, in view of the facts, is immaterial and in no wise tends to invalidate the verdict on the essential facts and the law applicable thereto. The defense made was wholly insufficient to justify the unlawful, forcible, and wrongful seizure of the mule by the agents of the defendants while in the possession of the plaintiff. This seizure, under the facts and the law, simply amounts to trespass to personality. Conceding that the defendants held a mortgage on the mule executed by one C. C. White, who at the date of the mortgage was the owner thereof, and that under the law of Alabama this mortgage placed in them the legal title to the mule, yet, after this mortgage was executed in Alabama, the mule was brought into the state of Georgia and here sold to English, who subsequently sold it to the plaintiff. There is no pretense that this mortgage was recorded in the county of Early, to which the mule was brought by White, and where the plaintiff bought it. "A mortgage executed in another state on personality and subsequently brought into this state, but not recorded in the county where the property is brought within the six months provided by Civ. Code 1895, § 2726, is postponed to a purchase of the same property made in good faith and without notice of the mortgage." Armitage-Herschell Co. v. Muscogee Real Estate Co., 119 Ga. 552, 46 S. E. 634. It is not pretended that the plaintiff, when he purchased the mule, had any notice whatever of the mortgage held by the defendants, or that his purchase was not made in absolute good faith. His title to the mule was therefore good, under the law of this state, as against any title which defendants had to the mule under the law of Alabama. The defendants not having recorded their mortgage within the six months as provided by our statute section, supra, and the plaintiff having bought the mule in good faith in the state of Georgia from one who had possession of it and who claimed title thereto, must be protected as an innocent purchaser without notice.

Of course, the proceedings in detinue, instituted in Alabama, after the mule had been wrongfully taken from the possession of the plaintiff in Georgia, and taken by their agent to the state of Alabama, and there delivered to the deputy sheriff, and any judgment rendered by the court in such proceedings in favor of the defendants, could not affect the right of the plaintiff in this case, as he was not a party to such proceedings. These proceedings seem merely to have been instituted for the purpose of giving some legal coloring to the wholly illegal and wrongful possession of the mule by the defendants. We conclude by stating that we are clear that the plaintiff was entitled to a verdict for $200, which was the proven value of the mule when wrongfully seized and taken out of his possession by the defendants through their agents.

3. It is also earnestly insisted by learned counsel that the wrongful conduct complained of was not that of the firm of Grant & Malone, but only the wrongful conduct of a member of the firm, and that the partnership is not responsible for this tort of a member of the firm; and in support of this position they cite section 2658 of the Civil Code of 1895. We do not think this section applicable to the facts of this case. Here the undisputed evidence is that the mule was seized and wrongfully taken from the possession of the plaintiff by the agent of the partnership, and under the terms of the section of the Code just cited a partnership is responsible for torts of its agents or servants under like rules as individuals. Here the defendants as a firm claimed title to the mule under their mortgage. The mule, after having been seized by the agents of the firm, was by those agents delivered into the possession of the firm, and was found in the stable of the firm by the plaintiff. In other words, everything that was done in reference to the mule in question and the trespass to the personal property of the plaintiff, under the evidence, was committed in furtherance of the firm's interest, and under the direct authority of its members, and the case on the facts falls squarely within the terms of the decisions of the Supreme Court of this state in the cases of Page v. Citizens' Banking Co., 111 Ga. 73, 36 S. E. 418, 51 L. R. A. 463, 78 Am. St. Rep. 144, Martin v. Simpkins Co., 116 Ga. 256, 42 S. E. 483, and Hendricks v. Middlebrooks, 118 Ga. 136, 44 S. E. 835.

4. It is insisted by counsel for plaintiffs in error that this suit, under the allegations of the petition, was in assumpsit, and that as there was no allegation that the mule had been sold or otherwise disposed of by the defendants, the plaintiff could not recover the value of the mule as for money had and received to his use; that to entitle him to recover the value of the mule he would be required to institute a suit in tort. We do not agree with this view. In our opinion the suit, both in form and in substance, is one sounding in tort, and is not an action ex contractu. Strictly speaking, the allegations make it an action for trespass to personal property other than the statutory remedy of trover. Civ. Code 1895, § 3885. See opinion on rehearing in Southern Express Co. v. Pope, 5 Ga. App. —, 63 S. E. 809.

5. We think, however, that the special demurrers directed to paragraphs 8, 9, and 10 of the petition should have been sustained by the court. The allegations of these paragraphs are not sufficient upon which to base a recovery for the items of damages therein set out, to wit, lost time and expenses incurred in going to Blakely and Columbia and attorney's fees in bringing this suit. It is not necessary now to decide whether under any allegations these items would be recoverable under the law, but we are certain that the allegations as made are insufficient for the purpose.

We therefore hold that the judgment refusing a new trial in this case will be reversed, unless the plaintiff will write off from his verdict and judgment, within 10 days from the date of the filing of the remittitur, the amount of the verdict and judgment embracing these items of cost, expenses, and attorney's fees, and reduce the amount of the verdict and judgment in his favor to $200, the proven value of the mule when taken from his possession on February 6, 1908, with interest on this amount at 7 per cent. per annum from that date. If these amounts are written off in pursuance of this judgment, then the judgment refusing a new trial will stand affirmed.

Judgment affirmed, with direction.

Error from City Court of Sylvester; J. B. Williamson, Judge.

Will Harvey and others were convicted of criminal trespass, and bring error. Reversed.

Claude Payton, for plaintiffs in error. J. H. Tipton, Sol., for the State.

HILL, C. J. The plaintiffs in error were convicted of criminal trespass, and their motion for a new trial was overruled. The evidence, briefly stated, is as follows: The plaintiffs in error are two negro boys, who were employed by a contractor to haul sand to be used in his work of erecting buildings. They had on previous occasions hauled sand from the land of the prosecutor without any objection from him. On the occasion for which they were indicted for committing a trespass, they hauled about 30 loads of sand from uninclosed land which was in the possession of the prosecutor. On their way with their wagons to get the sand, they met the son of the prosecutor, told him their purpose, and asked permission from him to bond in attachment is made payable to the Atlantic Coast Line R. R. Co. The attachment is against the Atlantic Coast Line R. R. Co. The levy is made of the attachment on the property (as stated in the levy) of the Atlantic Coast Line Railway Co. The replevin bond is made by the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company. The declaration in attachment is brought against the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad or Railway Company. The verdict is written on the attachment. The judgment is against the Atlantic Coast Line Railway Company, as principal, and J. J. Parramore, as security. The execution is against the Atlantic Coast Line Railway Company, principal, and J. J. Parramore, security." The third ground of the affidavit of illegality is as follows: "Because the declaration is against the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad or Railway Company, the verdict is not certain, the judgment is against the Atlantic Coast Line Railway Company, the execution is against the Atlantic Coast Line Railway Company, and no legal verdict or judgment could be rendered or entered against this deponent, as security for any principal except the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company."

We do not think that the use of the word "Railway" in one place and "Railroad" in another, in referring to the corporation, was a substantial and material change in its name, in view of the fact that there was no allegation or proof that there was a corporation by the name of the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company and another by the name of the Atlantic Coast Line Railway Company. It nowhere appears in the affidavit of illegality, nor in the proof upon the hearing before the judge who heard the case without a jury, that there were two separate and distinct corporations. If a bond is given in an attachment proceeding, a judgment in such proceeding on such bond is not binding on the surety if it is against a principal who is a different person from the principal named in the bond. But it is not made to appear that such is the case here. On the contrary, the absence of any showing that the principal in the bond and the principal in the judgment were different corporations, the slight variation in the name as above set forth, will raise no presumption that they are different corporations. The bond was given by the Atlantic Coast Line "Railroad" Company, as principal, because of the levy of the attachment on property which the entry of levy states was the property of the Atlantic Coast Line "Railway" Company. This would seem to be an admission that the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company and the Atlantic Coast Line Railway Company were one and the same corporation.

In the case of Davis v. State, 105 Ga. 808, 32 S. E. 158, it was held: "Where, on the trial of an indictment for burglary which charged the accused with breaking and entering the depot of the 'Chattanooga Southern Railroad Company,' proof was made by the state that the depot of the company named was burglariously entered as charged, testimony offered in behalf of the defendant to the effect that the corporate name of the owner of the depot was 'Chattanooga Southern Railway Company,' even if admitted, would not establish a material variance between the allegations in the indictment and the proof." On pages 810, 811, of 105 Ga., and page 159 of 32 S. E., it was said by Mr. Justice Lewis, in delivering the opinion: "Even if the proof had shown that the name of the corporation owning the depot was improperly stated by its being called a 'railroad' instead of a 'railway' company, we do not think such a slight variance between the allegation and proof would have been fatal. * * * The words 'railway' and 'railroad' have identically the same meaning, and we think the identification of the owner of the depot in this case was sufficiently clear from the description in the indictment, notwithstanding there may have been a slight error made in the use of a wrong word, identical in meaning and similar in sound to the particular term used in the charter." In this connection, see Palatine Ins. Co. v. Dickenson, 116 Ga. 794, 43 S. E. 52; Maddox v. Central of Ga. Ry. Co., 110 Ga. 301, 34 S. E. 1038; Commissioners v. Aiken Canning Co., 123 Ga. 647, 51 S. E. 585; Rhodes v. City of Louisville, 121 Ga. 553, 49 S. E. 681; Shaver v. McLendon, 26 Ga. 228; Thompson v. Hall, 67 Ga. 627; Johnson v. Central Railroad, 74 Ga. 397; Richardson, Ex'r, v. Allen, 74 Ga. 719, 722; Chattanooga, etc., R. Co. v. Jackson, 86 Ga. 676, 13 S. E. 109; Rome Railroad Co. v. Sullivan, 14 Ga. 277; Steers Co. v. Morgan, 66 Ga. 552; Hicks v. Riley, 83 Ga. 332, 9 S. E. 771; Timberlake v. State, 100 Ga. 66, 27 S. E. 158; Banks v. Lee, 73 Ga. 25; Roberson v. Downing Co., 120 Ga. 833, 48 S. E. 429, 102 Am. St. Rep. 128; 1 Thomp. Corp. § 291; 3 Thomp. Corp. § 3729; 6 Thomp. Corp. § 7608; 7 A. & E. Enc. Law, 689.

In Hicks v. Riley, 83 Ga. 332, 9 S. E. 771, it was ruled: "The law does not regard the middle name or initial of a person as material, unless it be shown that there are two persons of the same first name and surname. Hence, where the declaration was in the name of George S. Riley, and the verdict was for George S. Riley, but the judgment was in the name of George R. Riley, the difference between the verdict and execution and the judgment was immaterial. And the passage of an order amending the judgment from George R. to George S. was an immaterial amendment, and did not vitiate the levy." In this connection, see Timberlake v. State, 100 Ga. 66, 27 S. E. 158; Banks v. Lee, 73 Ga. 25; Roberson v. Downing Co., 120 Ga. 833, 48 S. E. 429, 102 Am. St. 128.

The variance in the two names was slight and in words having practically the same meaning and frequently used interchangeably. The difference between the names of the "At-Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company" and the "Atlantic Coast Line Railway Company" is not a variance in substance. The names do not of themselves indicate that they are of different corporations, and, if it is not made to appear that there are two distinct corporations respectively bearing these different names, the conclusion must follow that the names given were of one and the same corporation.

We do not think there was any merit in either of the grounds of illegality above set forth, and the court was right in its judgment dismissing the affidavit of illegality.

Error from City Court of Floyd County; Harper Hamilton, Judge.

Action by the Warner Elevator Manufacturing Company against Hamilton Yancey. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error, while plaintiff assigns cross-error. Cross-bill dismissed. Judgment affirmed.

Denny & Harris, for plaintiff. J. Branham and Jno. W. & G. E. Maddox, for defendant.

HILL, C. J. The Warner Elevator Manufacturing Company sued Hamilton Yancey for the price of an elevator which it had contracted to install and did install in the defendant's storehouse in Rome, Ga. A verdict was directed for the plaintiff, and the defendant's motion for a new trial, based on the general grounds and on error to the direction of the verdict, was overruled.

The contract for the elevator provided that the plaintiff was to erect in the defendant's building in Rome, "in a complete, workmanlike, and substantial manner," one of its "latest improved, direct acting, hydraulic passenger elevators," and the contract described specifically the constituent parts of the elevator, its size, finish, and material, and expressly warranted in every respect the elevator as described. The defendant filed a plea setting up a total failure of consideration, in that the plaintiff had failed to comply with its contract to install in his building, in a complete, workmanlike, and substantial manner, the elevator described in the contract. He avers that the elevator described in the contract was a passenger elevator, but that the elevator put in by the plaintiff, under the most favorable circumstances, with the water pressure called for by the contract, required 17 seconds to ascend from the first to the second floor of the building, a distance of 14 feet and 3 inches, and that a passenger elevator, such as described in the contract, would reasonably ascend the distance named in not exceeding 5 seconds of time, and that in this respect the elevator installed by the plaintiff failed to meet the description of the passenger elevator which the plaintiff expressly warranted in the contract to furnish to defendant. He sets up other defects in the elevator which he claims constituted breaches of the express warranty of the contract. These defects are shown by the evidence to have been immaterial, not in any manner affecting the speed of the elevator, and, in fact, are shown to have been remedied by the plaintiff.

The entire defense is embraced in the averment made by the defendant that the plaintiff was to install a certain described passenger elevator, when in fact it did not install a passenger elevator such as was described in the contract, but, instead, an elevator which was entirely worthless for passenger service, because of insufficient speed. It is admitted that the contract was one of express warranty, specifically designating "one of our latest improved, direct acting, hydraulic passenger elevators," which, as to "capacity and travel," expressly warranted that the "platform will travel from first to second [story], a distance of about 14 feet and 3 inches, and lift a load of 1,200 pounds, exclusive of platform, with a water pressure of 80 pounds to the square inch at the operating valve." The contract further provided that the owner of the building was to supply the necessary water pressure for the operation of the elevator. There is nothing in the contract on the subject of speed. It being conceded that the contract is one of express warranty, any implied warranty as to rate of speed must be excluded.

It is claimed, however, by the defendant, that a passenger elevator, such as described in the contract, under the water pressure described, would ascend from the first to the second floor, a distance described, in about 5 seconds. Conceding this to be as claimed by the defendant, the burden would be on him to show that this elevator, with a water pressure of 80 pounds to the square inch at the operating valve, would not make the speed required for a passenger elevator. Now, the speed of an hydraulic elevator obviously depends upon the amount of the water pressure at the operating valve, and the defendant was to supply this water pressure.

His own evidence conclusively shows that he never did supply a sufficient quantity of water to produce a pressure of 80 pounds to the square inch at the operating valve, but that the water pressure did not at any time exceed the amount of 46 pounds to the square inch at the operating valve. It was admitted that, even with this amount of pressure, the elevator would ascend from the first floor to the second with any load placed on it, the amount of the load making no difference in the speed with which it would ascend, but that under this pressure it had not obtained a greater rate of speed than 10 seconds from the first to the second floor.

The conclusion is inevitable that the failure of the elevator on the question of speed was due, not to any defect in the elevator itself, but solely to insufficient water pressure, and that this insufficiency of water pressure was due entirely to the failure of the defendant to supply the amount of pressure designated by the contract. It would be as reasonable to claim that an engine was defective because it did not run, when no water was in the boiler to generate the steam, as to claim that a hydraulic elevator was defective because it did not have speed when there was no water pressure sufficient in volume to make speed. The contract showed, and the evidence is without conflict on this point, that the defendant, and not the plaintiff, was to furnish the water with which to make the speed, and it is obvious that every pound of water pressure would add to the speed of the elevator; and if, in the present case, a pressure of 46 pounds made this elevator rise from the first to the second floor in 17 seconds, with a pressure increased to 80 pounds, which is the amount designated in the contract, the rate of speed at which it would ascend would be proportionately increased, and this matter was wholly under the control of the defendant.

We think that the evidence in this case conclusively shows that the plaintiff complied with its contract in every respect, that it did install for the defendant the passenger elevator specifically described in the contract, that the defects alleged in the plea were immaterial variations, which did not affect the value of the elevator, and that the failure of the elevator to make the rate of speed desired by the defendant, and claimed by him to be the usual and customary speed of passenger elevators, was not caused by any defects in the elevator itself, but was due entirely to the failure of the defendant to supply the requisite water pressure which the contract made it his duty to supply.

The undisputed evidence shows that the elevator was accepted by the defendant, and after installation was used by his tenant from four to five months in the regular business of conducting passengers and freight from the first to the second floor of the storehouse, and that the only complaint in connection with the elevator was its lack of speed, when only a water pressure nearly one-half less than that required by the contract was supplied by the defendant. Certainly it cannot be said, under this evidence, that a plea of total failure of consideration was sustained; and, while the plea of total failure of consideration includes any partial failure of consideration, there is no evidence of any reduction in the value of the elevator on account of the defects claimed. The evidence, in our judgment, demanded the verdict for the plaintiff which was directed by the court.

Judgment affirmed. Cross-bill dismissed.

Error from Superior Court, Berrien County; R. G. Mitchell, Judge.

Action by W. J. Cook against the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Bennet & Branch and Hendricks & Christian, for plaintiff in error. Bule & Knight, for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. Cook brought suit in the county court to recover the value of a Jersey cow which he alleged was killed by the "Atlantic Coast Line, owning and operating a railroad under the laws of the state of Georgia, a corporation having an office and agent in said county." Process was directed to the defendant as the "Atlantic Coast Line Railway Company," and was served upon the defendant, the "Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company," by serving its agent, F. B. Harris, in said county personally with a copy of the writ. The defendant, at the appearance term, in the name of the "Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company," through its attorneys, filed a special demurrer to the suit, and also in the same name filed an answer of the general issue. After hearing the evidence, the court rendered a judgment for the sum of $50 against the "Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company," and the defendant, in the name of the "Atlantic Coast Line Railway Company," entered an appeal from this judgment to the superior court. When the appeal case was called in the superior court, the plaintiff asked leave to amend his declaration as follows: "By adding the words 'Railroad Company' between the word 'Line' and 'owning' in the first line of the first paragraph of the petition, and in all other places where the words 'Atlantic Coast Line' appear, so that the petition as amended should read the 'Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company, owning and operating a railroad under the laws of the state of Georgia,' etc. This amendment was objected to by the defendant, but was allowed by the court. The case then proceeded to trial, and a verdict was returned against the defendant in favor of the plaintiff for $50. The defendant filed a motion for new trial on the general grounds, and on eight special grounds, which was overruled, and it excepted. Exceptions pendente lite were filed to the judgment overruling the demurrer, and to the allowance of the amendment.

1. The second and third grounds of special demurrer, that the petition was "defective in that it failed to allege what train or locomotive of the defendant company killed the plaintiff's cow, or in what direction the train or locomotive was moving when the plaintiff's cow was killed," if at all meritorious, were fully cured by appropriate amendment. The first ground of the demurrer, that no specific act of negligence was charged in the petition and that only negligence in general terms was charged, is not sustained by an inspection of the petition, it being distinctly alleged in the petition that the defendant "negligently and carelessly struck and killed the cow," because at the time she was killed "she was in such position on the railroad track as to be visible to the engineer at least one-half mile before the train reached her," and that it was in the daytime when the cow was killed. We think this is a sufficient allegation of negligence.

2. There was no error in allowing the plaintiff to amend his petition by adding to the words "the Atlantic Coast Line" the words "Railroad Company," so as to give the defendant its proper corporate name. This was not adding a new party, but only correcting a misnomer. This the plaintiff had the right to do, under section 5102 of the Civil Code of 1895 and under repeated rulings of the Supreme Court. See the following cases, exactly in point: Johnson v. Central Railroad, 74 Ga. 397; Chattanooga, Rome & Columbus Railroad Co. v. Jackson, 86 Ga. 676, 13 S. E. 109, where a declaration against the Chattanooga, Rome & Carrollton Railroad Company was amended by substituting "Columbus" for "Carrollton," so as to give the defendant its proper corporate name. See, also, Parish v. Davis, 126 Ga. 840, 55 S. E. 1032; Perkins Co. v. Shewmake, 119 Ga. 617, 46 S. E. 832; Coombs v. Lowe, R. M. Charit, 395. While the plaintiff in the original petition sued the "Atlantic Coast Line," he alleged that the defendant was a corporation operating a railroad under the laws of Georgia, with an office and place of business in Berrien county. He probably called the defendant by its popular name. This court will judicially know that the corporate name of the railroad in question is the "Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company." It cannot be doubted, from an inspection of all the pleadings in this case, that this was the corporation which the plaintiff sued for negligence in killing his cow. Process was directed to the Atlantic Coast Line Railway Company, and was served on the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company. The defendant, as served, appeared by counsel and in its corporate name demurred to the petition, and in its corporate name filed an answer of the general issue. It would seem that the attorneys for the defendant fully recognized the fact that the true defendant had been sued and served, and that the amendment which was allowed by the court was simply correcting an obvious misnomer in its corporate name. Indeed, we think that the words "Atlantic Coast Line, owning and operating a railroad under the laws of the state of Georgia," is equivalent to saying the "Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company."

3. There is no merit whatever in any of the grounds contained in the motion for a new trial, general or special, and the verdict is fully supported by the evidence.

Judgment affirmed.

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1028*)—HARMLESS ERROR—DECISION CORRECT ON MERITS.

The evidence demanded a verdict for the value of the personal property which had been wrongfully taken from the possession of the plaintiff by the agents of the defendants; and, if any errors of law were committed by the trial court, they were for this reason immaterial and harmless. A righteous verdict under the facts should not be set aside because of trivial errors.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Blakely; W. A. Jordan, Judge.

Attachment by C. Hammond against the Malone & Grant Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed, with direction.

Lee & Thompson and Pottle & Glessner, for plaintiff in error. Park & Collins, for defendant in error.

HILL, O. J. Hammond sued out an attachment against the Malone & Grant Company, a partnership composed of George Malone and A. G. Grant, residents of the state of Alabama. The attachment was levied by summons of garnishment on D. S. Sheffield. The declaration in attachment makes in substance the following case: On September 2, 1907, the petitioner purchased from Henry Paul English one bay horse mule named "Ed," the reasonable value of which on said date, and on February 6, 1908, was $200. On February 6, 1908, this mule was "in the legal, lawful, rightful, and proper possession of the petitioner," and on that date the Malone & Grant Company, "without any authority whatsoever of law," and while petitioner was asleep at his home, sent an agent (whose name is unknown) to the petitioner's premises, who tore down petitioner's lot fence and seized and carried away the mule to Columbia, in the state of Alabama. Petitioner charges that by these acts of the defendants, through their agent, he was "illegally, unjustly, and wrongfully deprived of the possession of his mule," and that therefore the defendants have become indebted to him in the sum of $200. Petitioner further charges defendants with having damaged him in the sum of $15, "in causing him to lose his time while it was necessary for him to be cultivating his crop; said time being three days and being worth $5 per day." The defendants "further endangered petitioner as aforesaid by forcing him to make three trips to Blakely, at an expense of $1.50 each trip, and one trip to Columbia, Ala., at an expense of $3," and that "by reason of the aforesaid wrongful acts of defendants he has been injured and damaged in the further sum of $50 for attorney's fees incurred in the bringing of this suit." This aggregate indebtedness of $300 the defendants have never paid, and refuse to pay, and petitioner prays for a judgment against the defendants, the Malone & Grant Company, on the attachment, and against the garnishee, in the sum of $300, the summons of garnishment never having been answered, and also a general judgment against the defendants, the Malone & Grant Company, for this sum.

The Malone & Grant Company appeared, filed a demurrer, and made answer to the suit. The demurrer was general and special, and the petition was amended to meet the special demurrer in certain respects. The grounds of special demurrer point out certain alleged defects in the petition as to which no amendments were offered; these defects being as follows: (1) From the second to the seventh paragraph of the declaration, both inclusive, the facts alleged do not support the plaintiff's claim that the defendants are indebted to him in the sum of $300, or $200, or in any other amount, and show that the plaintiff is not entitled to maintain any action of assumpsit; that his remedy, if any, is an action ex delicto, and not ex contractu. (2) The plaintiff does not state, in the eighth paragraph of his declaration, "when, how, or in what manner the defendants caused him to lose his time, or why it was necessary for him to do so." No facts are alleged in support of the bare assertion that his time was worth $1.50 per day, or that his lost time amounted to $15. "Plaintiff's 'lost time' is not an element of damage recoverable in this suit, considered as an action ex delicto, nor do the facts alleged support any implied promise made by the defendants to pay for his lost time in whole or in part." (3) The ninth paragraph of the petition is defective, in that it does not disclose "why, when, or in what manner, or for what purpose, the plaintiff was forced to make two trips to Blakely and one trip to Columbia, Ala.," nor is it stated when, how, or in what manner the expenses of these alleged trips were incurred, nor is there shown a necessity of incurring said expenses, or that the same were reasonable, or that the defendants are chargeable with any part of the same, and said expenses are not recoverable under the facts alleged in the declaration as a legitimate element of damages, nor is any implied promise on the part of these defendants to pay such expenses alleged. (4) The tenth paragraph of the declaration is specially demurred to because the facts therein alleged do not warrant a recovery in any amount for attorney's fees. The demurrer was renewed to the petition as amended, and was overruled by the court on each and every ground thereof, and the defendants filed exceptions pendente lite to this judgment.

The answer of the defendants denied that the plaintiff was entitled to the possession of the mule, and denied the wrongful acts and conduct alleged in the petition in reference to the seizure of the mule. On the trial of the case the jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff in the sum of $279.65. The defendants filed a motion for a new trial, based upon the general grounds, and containing in the amendment to the motion 24 special assignments of error. The view that this court takes of the merits of this case makes immaterial any of the errors specially complained of in the motion for a new trial, and we will consider only the grounds of demurrer which we deem meritorious, and will decide the case on the uncontroverted facts as they appear in the brief of evidence.

1, 2. The evidence, briefly stated, shows the following case: Plaintiff was the owner and was in possession of the mule in controversy, which he had bought from Henry Paul English, in Early county, this state, on September 2, 1907, paying therefor $150, and had placed the mule in his stable. English had previously bought this mule in Early county from one C. C. White, who had the mule in his possession at the time of the sale. On February 6, 1908, the agent or agents of the defendants, at night, entered the lot and stable of the plaintiff, tore down his lot fence, and seized and carried away his mule to the state of Alabama. After discovering the loss of the mule, the plaintiff traced it to Columbia, Ala., and located it in the possession of the defendants, in their stable. The defendants attempted to justify their seizure of the mule on the ground that they held a mortgage to the mule, executed by its then owner, C. C. White, to whom they had sold the mule in Alabama, the mortgage being for the balance of the purchase money, and claimed that under the law of the state of Alabama they held an absolute title to the mule, under this mortgage, which was properly recorded in Alabama. They also set up that they held the mule in controversy under a valid claim of right and title, namely, that on or about February 6, 1908, said property was in the lawful custody of J. R. Baker, deputy sheriff of Houston county, Ala., said Baker having taken possession of the same for and in behalf of the plaintiff, they subsequently having recovered possession of the property from Baker under an action of detinue, brought in the circuit court of Houston county, Ala.; a certified copy of the detinue proceedings and the judgment thereon being attached as an exhibit to this special plea. A certified copy of the mortgage from C. C. White to the defendants was also attached as an exhibit to the plea. The evidence further shows that the mule had been delivered into the possession of J. R. Baker, deputy sheriff of Houston county, Ala., by the agents of the defendants after they had seized it in Georgia, and had taken it from the stable of the plaintiff, and carried it into the state of Alabama. These facts, which are not controverted, in our opinion, demanded a verdict for the plaintiff for the value of the mule when wrongfully seized and taken from the possession of the plaintiff by the agent or agents of the defendants.

The voluminous assignments of error merely tend to obscure the simplicity of the real issue in this case; and if the ingenuity of learned counsel has discovered any error of law committed by the court in the trial, such error, in view of the facts, is immaterial and in no wise tends to invalidate the verdict on the essential facts and the law applicable thereto. The defense made was wholly insufficient to justify the unlawful, forcible, and wrongful seizure of the mule by the agents of the defendants while in the possession of the plaintiff. This seizure, under the facts and the law, simply amounts to trespass to personality. Conceding that the defendants held a mortgage on the mule executed by one C. C. White, who at the date of the mortgage was the owner thereof, and that under the law of Alabama this mortgage placed in them the legal title to the mule, yet, after this mortgage was executed in Alabama, the mule was brought into the state of Georgia and here sold to English, who subsequently sold it to the plaintiff. There is no pretense that this mortgage was recorded in the county of Early, to which the mule was brought by White, and where the plaintiff bought it. "A mortgage executed in another state on personality and subsequently brought into this state, but not recorded in the county where the property is brought within the six months provided by Civ. Code 1895, § 2726, is postponed to a purchase of the same property made in good faith and without notice of the mortgage." Armitage-Herschell Co. v. Muscogee Real Estate Co., 119 Ga. 552, 46 S. E. 634. It is not pretended that the plaintiff, when he purchased the mule, had any notice whatever of the mortgage held by the defendants, or that his purchase was not made in absolute good faith. His title to the mule was therefore good, under the law of this state, as against any title which defendants had to the mule under the law of Alabama. The defendants not having recorded their mortgage within the six months as provided by our statute section, supra, and the plaintiff having bought the mule in good faith in the state of Georgia from one who had possession of it and who claimed title thereto, must be protected as an innocent purchaser without notice.

Of course, the proceedings in detinue, instituted in Alabama, after the mule had been wrongfully taken from the possession of the plaintiff in Georgia, and taken by their agent to the state of Alabama, and there delivered to the deputy sheriff, and any judgment rendered by the court in such proceedings in favor of the defendants, could not affect the right of the plaintiff in this case, as he was not a party to such proceedings. These proceedings seem merely to have been instituted for the purpose of giving some legal coloring to the wholly illegal and wrongful possession of the mule by the defendants. We conclude by stating that we are clear that the plaintiff was entitled to a verdict for $200, which was the proven value of the mule when wrongfully seized and taken out of his possession by the defendants through their agents.

3. It is also earnestly insisted by learned counsel that the wrongful conduct complained of was not that of the firm of Grant & Malone, but only the wrongful conduct of a member of the firm, and that the partnership is not responsible for this tort of a member of the firm; and in support of this position they cite section 2658 of the Civil Code of 1895. We do not think this section applicable to the facts of this case. Here the undisputed evidence is that the mule was seized and wrongfully taken from the possession of the plaintiff by the agent of the partnership, and under the terms of the section of the Code just cited a partnership is responsible for torts of its agents or servants under like rules as individuals. Here the defendants as a firm claimed title to the mule under their mortgage. The mule, after having been seized by the agents of the firm, was by those agents delivered into the possession of the firm, and was found in the stable of the firm by the plaintiff. In other words, everything that was done in reference to the mule in question and the trespass to the personal property of the plaintiff, under the evidence, was committed in furtherance of the firm's interest, and under the direct authority of its members, and the case on the facts falls squarely within the terms of the decisions of the Supreme Court of this state in the cases of Page v. Citizens' Banking Co., 111 Ga. 73, 36 S. E. 418, 51 L. R. A. 463, 78 Am. St. Rep. 144, Martin v. Simpkins Co., 116 Ga. 256, 42 S. E. 483, and Hendricks v. Middlebrooks, 118 Ga. 136, 44 S. E. 835.

4. It is insisted by counsel for plaintiffs in error that this suit, under the allegations of the petition, was in assumpsit, and that as there was no allegation that the mule had been sold or otherwise disposed of by the defendants, the plaintiff could not recover the value of the mule as for money had and received to his use; that to entitle him to recover the value of the mule he would be required to institute a suit in tort. We do not agree with this view. In our opinion the suit, both in form and in substance, is one sounding in tort, and is not an action ex contractu. Strictly speaking, the allegations make it an action for trespass to personal property other than the statutory remedy of trover. Civ. Code 1895, § 3885. See opinion on rehearing in Southern Express Co. v. Pope, 5 Ga. App. —, 63 S. E. 809.

5. We think, however, that the special demurrers directed to paragraphs 8, 9, and 10 of the petition should have been sustained by the court. The allegations of these paragraphs are not sufficient upon which to base a recovery for the items of damages therein set out, to wit, lost time and expenses incurred in going to Blakely and Columbia and attorney's fees in bringing this suit. It is not necessary now to decide whether under any allegations these items would be recoverable under the law, but we are certain that the allegations as made are insufficient for the purpose.

We therefore hold that the judgment refusing a new trial in this case will be reversed, unless the plaintiff will write off from his verdict and judgment, within 10 days from the date of the filing of the remittitur, the amount of the verdict and judgment embracing these items of cost, expenses, and attorney's fees, and reduce the amount of the verdict and judgment in his favor to $200, the proven value of the mule when taken from his possession on February 6, 1908, with interest on this amount at 7 per cent. per annum from that date. If these amounts are written off in pursuance of this judgment, then the judgment refusing a new trial will stand affirmed.

Judgment affirmed, with direction.

Error from City Court of Sylvester; J. B. Williamson, Judge.

Will Harvey and others were convicted of criminal trespass, and bring error. Reversed.

Claude Payton, for plaintiffs in error. J. H. Tipton, Sol., for the State.

HILL, C. J. The plaintiffs in error were convicted of criminal trespass, and their motion for a new trial was overruled. The evidence, briefly stated, is as follows: The plaintiffs in error are two negro boys, who were employed by a contractor to haul sand to be used in his work of erecting buildings. They had on previous occasions hauled sand from the land of the prosecutor without any objection from him. On the occasion for which they were indicted for committing a trespass, they hauled about 30 loads of sand from uninclosed land which was in the possession of the prosecutor. On their way with their wagons to get the sand, they met the son of the prosecutor, told him their purpose, and asked permission from him to get the sand from his father's land. This permission was given by the son. Thereupon the sand was hauled by the two negroes and delivered to their employer, and they were subsequently prosecuted for a criminal trespass in hauling this sand from the prosecutor's premises.

While it is not necessary that there should be in a case of trespass an animus furandi, yet in every criminal offense "there shall be a union or joint operation of act and intention, or criminal negligence." Pen. Code 1895, § 31. Under the facts of this case it seems perfectly clear that the defendants, in hauling the sand from the uninclosed land of the prosecutor, did not intend to commit the offense of trespass. While they did not have the consent of the prosecutor himself to haul the sand, yet the facts that they had previously gotten sand from this land without his objection, and that on the occasion in question they did have the consent of his son, would, in our opinion, be sufficient to cause them to assume that the prosecutor did not object. Especially would this seem to be the case where the hauling of the sand was in the daytime and without any surreptitious purpose or effort of concealment. Taking all the facts of the case, we think that the conviction was wholly unauthorized, and that a new trial should have been granted.

Judgment reversed.

POWELL, J. (dissenting). The exculpatory facts stated in the opinion appear only from the statements of the defendants. The jury had the right to disbelieve them entirely.

Love & Fort and Wm. A. Little, for plaintiff in error. Geo. C. Palmer, for the State.

POWELL, J. Carrie Austin was convicted of assault with intent to murder, and to the overruling of her motion for a new trial brings error.

The judge, among other things, charged the jury as follows: "Mathematical certainty cannot be attained in legal investigations. All that the law requires is moral and reasonable certainty. Whenever you have arrived at that amount of mental conviction, you have then arrived at that stage where you believe that the defendant is guilty beyond a reasonable doubt." It should be stated in this connection that the judge also charged the jury that the evidence must be such as to show the defendant's guilt beyond a reasonable doubt before they would be authorized to convict her. Indeed, this general statement, that the proof must be such as to show the defendant's guilt beyond a reasonable doubt before accusation would be authorized appears in several places in the charge. The contention of the defendant's counsel is that there is a difference between proof of guilt to a moral and reasonable certainty and proof of guilt beyond a reasonable doubt. Neither in common parlance nor in legal vernacular is there any difference between the two expressions. The very definitions of the words show this. Certainty is the quality of being established beyond doubt. Reasonable certainty is, therefore, the quality of being established beyond a reasonable doubt. Moral certainty is defined by the Century Dictionary as "a probability sufficiently certain to justify action upon it; as, there is a moral certainty that the sun will rise tomorrow." Therefore reasonable and moral certainty may be said to be that degree of probability which exists with such strength as to justify human action upon it. Whatever exists to a moral and reasonable certainty of necessity exists beyond a reasonable doubt. The majority opinion of the Supreme Court in the case of Bone v. State, 102 Ga. 390, 30 S. E. 845, is in accord with what is ruled herein. See, also, Warren v. State, 123 Ga. 245, 51 S. E. 302; Cole v. State, 125 Ga. 277, 53 S. E. 958.

Another ground of the motion raises the point that the court erred in charging the jury as follows: "It is not necessary to define the words 'reasonable doubt,' because they define themselves. They are not the equivalents of any and all doubt. The doubt which serves to acquit should be a reasonable doubt, a doubt entertained by reasonable men thinking about the case in a reasonable way." The objection asserted against this charge is that it defines what a reasonable doubt "is not." An examination of the excerpt shows that it not only tells the jury what a reasonable doubt is not, but also what it is.

2. The other grounds of the motion object to the admission in evidence of certain physical facts and circumstances tending to corroborate the prosecutor's statement as to how the assault was made upon him. The objections are utterly without foundation or merit. Indeed we find from an examination of the record that the defendant was fairly tried and legally convicted.

Judgment affirmed.

RUSSELL, J. Two contentions are raised by the counsel for the plaintiff in error. He insists that the state failed to prove the venue and the identity of the steer alleged to have been stolen. The steer is described in the indictment as "one yellow-colored steer, with white spots on his body and a white spot in his forehead." It is true that all the witnesses except one swore that the steer that belonged to the prosecutor, which was afterwards found in the possession of Mr. Brinson, was a red steer, with white spots on his body and a white spot in his forehead. Even the prosecutor himself testified that he would not call the steer a yellow steer, but he denominated him as being of a dull red color, though he further said that some people would call him a yellow-colored steer. The witness Powell, however, testified positively that he was a yellow steer, with a white spot in his forehead and white spots on his flanks; and this witness testified that he was with the prosecutor when the steer was found in Brinson's pasture. This testimony, when taken in connection with the statement of the prosecutor that some people might call the steer a yellow steer, was sufficient, if preferred by the jury, to fix the identity of the steer in question and establish it as the same steer described in the indictment; and when it is borne in mind that all the witnesses testified as to the white marks on the animal's side, and the spot in his forehead, the jury were authorized to find that the allegation of the indictment, descriptive of the animal stolen, was substantially proved.

The most that can be said as to the point that the venue was not shown is that the testimony of several of the witnesses upon that point is insufficient. But the testimony of Steve Ivy is positive and sufficient. He swore that he helped the defendant drive the steer in question to the defendant's home, and that they found the steer on Boykin's drain, in Miller county.

There was no error in refusing a new trial.

HILL, C. J. The plaintiff in error was convicted of a violation of the act of August 15, 1903 (Acts 1903, p. 90), making it a misdemeanor to fraudulently procure money on a labor contract. The evidence for the state conclusively shows that the conviction was wholly unauthorized, and the prosecution seems to have been for the purpose of collecting an old debt, rather than to punish the fraudulent procurement of money on a contract to perform labor.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. & Am. Digs. 1907 to date, & Reporter Indexes

On December 24, 1908, the defendant entered into a contract with the prosecutor to perform for him services as a laborer during the year 1909 at $12.50 per month; the contract to begin on January 1, 1909. When the contract was made it seems that the defendant, according to the prosecutor, owed him an old debt of $23.50, and this sum was to be charged against the defendant and to be taken up on his wages during the year. What time during the year this amount was to be deducted from his wages does not appear. The defendant began work under the contract on January 1, 1909, and worked until March 6, 1909, for which time his wages amounted to $28, and the prosecutor had only paid him of this amount the sum of $19.50. So far as the contract was concerned, therefore, the prosecutor was due the defendant, when he had him arrested and prosecuted, the sum of $8.50, and this fact utterly precludes the conclusion that there was any loss to the prosecutor, growing out of the contract, but that there was a loss to the defendant of $8.50 by reason of the failure of the prosecutor to pay him this amount of the wages which he had earned.

It was a misapplication of the law to treat the old debt which the defendant owed the prosecutor as money advanced on the contract. Of course, the defendant could agree to such application of his wages if he desired to do so; but such agreement could not possibly change its character as a debt, and make it money advanced on a contract, or make the defendant liable to a prosecution for a violation of the act of 1903, if subsequently he withdrew his consent for such application of his wages. This case is fully covered by previous decisions of this court, construing the act in question, notably the cases of Mulkey v. State, 1 Ga. App. 521, 57 S. E. 1022, Fuller v. State, 2 Ga. Error from Superior Court, Effingham County; Paul E. Seabrook, Judge.

Action by Eden Georgia Kehr and another, by next friend, against Floyd & Co. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs bring error. Affirmed.

J. H. Smith and B. W. Sheppard, for plaintiffs in error. Travis & Travis and Wm. L. Gigulliat, for defendant in error.

EVANS, P. J. The exception is to the dismissal of the petition on demurrer. Eliminating immaterial verbiage, and stating the essential averments as alleged, the petition was as follows: The petition of Eden Georgia Kehr and Robert Edwin Kehr, by their next friend, shows the following cause of action against J. B. Floyd and T. B. Floyd, doing business in the firm name of J. B. Floyd & Co., in Effingham county, Ga.: The plaintiffs are nonresident minors, and the only living heirs of Herman E. Kehr and Ella Kehr. On May 20, 1891, Herman E. Kehr made and executed his certain deed of conveyance, whereby he conveyed a certain tract of land located in the Tenth district, G. M., of Effingham county, known as the "Eden Plantation," and containing 2,483 acres more or less "to his wife Ella Kehr, her lifetime, with remainder to his children born and unborn, the common offspring born to him by his said wife Ella Kehr, contingent nevertheless that should his said wife Ella Kehr depart this life before the said Herman E. Kehr, then in that event the lands were to revert to the said Herman E. Kehr in fee; but if the said Herman E. Kehr should die before his said wife Ella Kehr, then his said wife Ella Kehr should have a life estate in said lands and the same was to be held by her for life, with remainder in fee to their said children, and the children of their issue as tenants in common." On September 14, 1891, Ella Kehr and Herman E. Kehr conveyed by their deed of that date their reversionary, contingent, and life estates in the lands hereinbefore described to F. B. and S. S. Keller. The records in the ordinary's office in Effingham county show that on January 4, 1892, Ella Kehr was appointed guardian for "Eden G. Kehr, minor and orphan child of Ella and H. E. Kehr." The guardian book on file in the ordinary's office of that county, marked "1856," shows that on January 4, 1892, Ella Kehr gave bond as guardian for Eden Kehr in the sum of $100, and that this bond was signed by J. G. & D. H. Clark as attorneys for Ella Kehr, and by Morgan as security. It nowhere appears from the records of that office that Ella Kehr ever took the oath or qualified as guardian of the person and property of Eden G. Kehr. The minutes of that court show that on March 7, 1892, Allen N. Kelffer, ordinary of Effingham county, granted an order authorizing Ella Kehr, as guardian for Eden G. Kehr, to sell the remainder interest of Eden G. Kehr in the "Eden Plantation," above described. The records of deeds and mortgages of the county in the office of the clerk of the superior court show that on July 7, 1892, Mrs. Ella Kehr conveyed to F. B. Keller and S. S. Keller, in consideration of $5, all the remainder interest of Eden G. Kehr in the 2,483 acres of land known as the "Eden Plantation."

Petitioner avers that this sale of the remainder interest of Eden G. Kehr in these lands was illegal and void for the following reasons: (a) Because the bond given by Ella Kehr as guardian for Eden G. Kehr was not signed by her, but shows on its face that it was signed by her attorneys. (b) Because it appears from the records in the ordinary's office of Effingham county that Ella Kehr never took the oath or qualified as guardian of Eden G. Kehr. (c) Because the order granted by Allen N. Kelffer, ordinary, does not show for what purpose the remainder interest of the minor was to be sold, or that Eden G. Kehr or her nearest friend was ever served with notice of said application. (d) Because the records do not show that the sale of this remainder interest was approved and confirmed by the court. (e)

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. & Am. Digs. 1907 to date, & Reporter Indexes

Because the ordinary was without jurisdiction to grant an order authorizing the sale of this remainder interest of Eden G. Kehr in these lands; Acts 1889, p. 156 (Civ. Code 1895, §§ 2545, 2546), vesting exclusive jurisdiction and authority in judges of the superior courts to authorize the sale of the estates of infants. Herman B. Kehr died on June 25, 1902. Petitioner avers that Floyd & Co. have possession of the lands, but are only entitled to the use, custody, possession, and control of the same as life tenants; that as life tenants they are only entitled to the reasonable use of the soil and premises exercised in such a manner as to work no harm or injury to the remainder interest of Eden G. Kehr and Robert Edwin Kehr; that defendants have no right to box the trees for turpentine or to cut and remove the timber, but have wantonly and willfully boxed the greater portion of the trees, to the plaintiff's damage of $6,000, and have cut and removed sawmill timber of the value of $1,000, and are preparing and threatening to cut and box the balance of the sawmill timber on the land; that Floyd & Co. as life tenants in and to such premises and lands as described have, by reason of the several acts hereinbefore related, committed voluntary waste in and upon the premises and lands, and are guilty thereof, and have forfeited all their rights as life tenants to a life estate in these lands. Waiving discovery, the plaintiffs pray for process, for an injunction to restrain the defendants from cutting and boxing the trees on the land, and that upon the final hearing a decree be granted to strike from the records of Effingham county of deeds and mortgages the deed made by Mrs. Ella G. Kehr to F. B. Keller and S. S. Keller under date of July 7, 1892, wherein she as guardian for Eden G. Kehr conveyed for a consideration of $5 the remainder interest of Eden G. Kehr in the aforesaid premises; that petitioner recover a judgment for $7,000 as compensation for the injury and damage committed to the remainder interest and estate of the remaindermen by reason of the several acts of waste complained of as committed by the defendants; that petitioner recover the lands and premises in question as forfeited to them by reason of the several acts of waste complained of, and as committed by the life tenants Floyd & Co. The defendants demurred to the petition, on the grounds, that their residence was not alleged, that the petition sets forth no cause of action, and that it misjoins a proceeding to stay waste by an alleged tenant for life brought by a remainderman with an action of damages.

The petition was rightly dismissed. Premitting a discussion or decision of the effect of a failure to allege the residence of the defendants there were other potent reasons invoked by the demurrer why the petition should have been dismissed. The plaintiffs neither alleged title in themselves, nor title nor possession in their grantor, or that the defendants claimed title under a common propositus with them. However, it is made clearly to appear that they have no immediate right to the possession of the land, unless the precedent life estate of Mrs. Kehr or her grantees is forfeited for waste. Neither Mrs. Kehr nor her grantees are made parties; and it would be subversive of every fundamental principle of law to cancel and nullify their title, and forfeit their life estate, without giving the original life tenant or her grantees an opportunity to be heard in defense. Nor is there any allegation that Floyd & Co. claim either as direct or remote grantees of Mrs. Kehr, or claim authority from her or her grantees to cut the timber, or that Floyd & Co.'s acts are consequent upon the failure, either of herself or her grantees, to exercise prudence in the preservation of the estate in remainder. See Civ. Code 1895, § 3090. Again, the plaintiffs certainly would not be entitled to have expunged from the records the deed of Mrs. Kehr to G. B. & S. S. Keller without first making them parties to the proceeding to obtain this relief. Other reasons are advanced in support of the judgment of the court on demurrer, but we will forbear discussion of them, as those which we have stated are sufficient to uphold the dismissal of the petition.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

Where an innkeeper provided a lot and stables in which his guests were permitted to keep their horses without charge, but it was customary to charge for feed for horses if furnished by the innkeeper, it was not sufficient evidence of the relation of innkeeper and guest that one drove into the lot, unhitched his mule from his buggy, and placed the mule in a stable pointed out by a boy in charge of the lot and stables, and then left the premises without entering the inn or having any agreement with the innkeeper or his authorized agent that he would be a guest, or that the innkeeper should furnish any feed for the mule, or doing anything further towards becoming a guest, though the owner stated to the boy that he would return and would himself feed his mule at dinner time, and though he testified that he intended to take dinner at the inn with another person who accompanied him, and who dined there, but did not do so because before the dinner hour he learned of the injury to the mule.

Error from Superior Court, Liberty County; Paul H. Seabrook, Judge.

Action by S. T. Brewer against J. M. Carswell. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

S. T. Brewer instituted suit in the superior court of Liberty county against J. M. Carswell for the recovery of $150, the value of a mule, the property of the plaintiff, which was lodged by him in the stable of the defendant, and was stung by certain bees kept by the defendant behind the stable and in close proximity thereto, from the effects of which the mule died. In his own behalf the plaintiff testified, among other things, as follows: The defendant keeps a hotel or inn at Hinesville, and, in connection therewith, conducts this stable and lot. "On the day named in the declaration I came to Hinesville with Middleton. We drove my mule, and upon arrival in town drove into the lot of defendant. There was a boy in charge of the lot and stable who showed us a stall, the only one not occupied, in which we placed the mule. I instructed the boy that the mule was young and excited, and that I would come back at dinner and feed him. I had no feed in my buggy, and expected to get the feed from the stable. Mr. Middleton, who came with me, took a dinner at the hotel, and I expected to take dinner with him. Just on the outside of the stable and immediately against the rear of the stable in which my mule was placed was a row of beehives. I was notified after leaving the stable that my mule had been stung by the bees. I hurried down to the hotel, and found the mule covered with them. I began to doctor the mule, and did everything for him I could. This was about dinner time, and when dinner came on I was busy with attending to the mule, and could not stop to eat dinner. The mule died from the effects of the sting when I got home. The mule was four years old, and reasonably worth $150. I did not know anything about the bees being at the back of the stall. If I had, I would not have allowed the mule to be placed in the stall. I did not make any contract with the boy as to the pay for keeping the mule, but expected to pay the usual charge. If the mule had not been stung, I would have taken dinner with Middleton at the hotel, and would have also fed my mule at the stable and expected to pay for it. I was prevented from taking dinner there because of the injury to the mule. I told Mr. Carswell's agent that I would come back at dinner, but did not tell him or anybody else that I would come back and take dinner at the hotel." Martin, sworn for the plaintiff, testified: "Mr. Carswell keeps a hotel in Hinesville, and charges guests for stopping with him. He keeps no book for his guests to register in when stopping there." Lang testified that he had always paid for the feed of his horse when he stopped at the Carswell Hotel and placed his horse in the stables, but did not pay for stable room. Mr. Carswell never made any charge for a man who simply left his horse in the stable. The plaintiff closed, and, upon motion for nonsuit, the judge passed the following order: "After argument, * * * the plaintiff's counsel stating, 'The plaintiff does not rely for recovery upon section 3821 of the Civil Code of 1895,' it is ordered that said motion for nonsuit be and is hereby sustained, and said case is dismissed." The plaintiff excepted to the order granting the nonsuit, and assigned error thereon on the ground that the judgment was contrary to law and evidence. In his brief counsel for plaintiff in error took the position that the defendant was liable to the plaintiff only because the defendant was an innkeeper and the plaintiff was his guest, and the evidence was sufficient to carry the case to the jury on the question as to whether the relation of innkeeper and guest, and the consequent liability arising therefrom, existed.

Donald Fraser, for plaintiff in error. Garrard & Mildrin, Edwin A. Cohen, and Ben A. Way, for defendant in error.

ATKINSON, J. (after stating the facts as above). Under the contention of the plaintiff, the question is whether the defendant was liable as an innkeeper to the plaintiff as his guest. All persons entertained for hire at an inn are guests. Civ. Code 1895, § 2934. "It is not necessary to show actual delivery to the innkeeper. Depositing goods in a public room set apart for such articles or leaving them in the room of the guest, or placing a horse in the stable, is a delivery to the innkeeper. If, however, the guest delivers his goods to a servant under special charge to him to keep the same, the innkeeper is not liable therefor." Section 2936. The expressions, "depositing goods in a public room set apart for such articles," and "placing a horse in the stable," as used in the section of the Code last cited, are to be understood as relating to such acts of a guest as distinguished from such acts by a mere intruder or stranger having no relation of guest to the innkeeper, and at no time establishing such a relation. It was held in Yorke v. Grindstone, 1 Salk. 388 (Yorke v. Grenough, 2 Lord Raymond, 866), that, if a traveler leave his horse at an inn and lodge elsewhere, he is for the purpose of this rule to be deemed a guest, because, it was said, it

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. & Am. Digs. 1907 to date, & Reporter Indexes

"must be fed, by which the innkeeper has gain; otherwise if he had left a trunk or a dead thing."

There has been some diversity of opinion as to when the relationship of innkeeper and guest was impliedly established by the mere leaving of a horse at the stable of an innkeeper, at least so far as affected the safekeeping of the horse and the liability for any injury to it. But the authorities which have held that the relation of innkeeper and guest was thus established have had, as their underlying reason, the existence of a state of facts "by which the innkeeper has gain," as it is expressed in the quotation above made; that is, that there should be such an express or implied contract between the person who leaves the horse and the innkeeper as would authorize a charge by the latter as such for the service. See note to Calye's Case, 1 Smith's Lead. Cas. (9th Ed.) 250; Healey v. Gray, 68 Me. 489, 28 Am. Rep. 80; Ingallsbee v. Wood, 33 N. Y. 577, 88 Am. Dec. 409; Mason v. Thompson, 9 Pick. (Mass.) 280, 20 Am. Dec. 471; McDaniels v. Robinson, 26 Vt. 316, 62 Am. Dec. 574; Id., 28 Vt. 387, 67 Am. Dec. 720; Gelley v. Clark, 3 Cro. Jac. 188; Beale on Innkeepers and Hotels, §§ 121-122, 131-132; Strauss v. County Hotel, L. R. 12 Q. B. Div. 27.

Here the plaintiff did not expressly or impliedly place his horse with the innkeeper or his servant to be fed and cared for. He stated to the latter that he intended to return at dinner time and feed the horse himself. He gave no intimation of any intention to obtain the feed from the innkeeper. The evidence showed that there was no custom to charge where a person provided his own feed for his mule. There was lacking, therefore, the establishment of any situation which created a right to profit on the part of the innkeeper. The plaintiff, though on the premises, did not go to the inn, or give any intimation to the proprietor of his presence or intention to become a guest or even of his expectation to return for dinner. He testified that his companion took dinner at the inn, and that he intended to take dinner with his comrade; but whether this was to be as the guest of the latter or as the guest of the innkeeper is not clear. At any rate, whatever was his private intention on this subject, it was in no way shown to have been communicated to the innkeeper or any authorized agent of his. The plaintiff left the premises. Where he went or how long he stayed does not appear. But, before the dinner hour had arrived, he heard that his mule had been stung by bees, and went to its relief. So that he never, in fact, took dinner at the inn, nor did anything else tending to establish the relation of innkeeper and guest. These facts were not sufficient to show that, when his mule was injured, he was the guest of the inn, and that the defendant was liable as an innkeeper for such injury. This ruling does not in any way conflict with that in Coskey v. Nagle, 83 Ga. 696, 10 S. E. 491, 6 L. R. A. 483, 20 Am. St. Rep. 333, and similar cases, where a traveler delivered his baggage to a porter of an inn at a station for the purpose of having it carried to the inn where he was proceeding to become a guest, and did so become. See on the general subject Tulane Hotel Co. v. Holohan, 112 Tenn. 214, 79 S. W. 113, 105 Am. St. Rep. 930, 2 Am. & Eng. Ann. Cas. 345, and note.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

BRANTLEY v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. May 12, 1909.)

CRIMINAL LAW (§§ 162, 193½*)—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§§ 250, 260*)—FORMER JEOPARDY—"NEW TRIAL"—CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISIONS—DUE PROCESS OF LAW—EQUAL PROTECTION OF LAWS.

When a person has been indicted for murder and convicted of voluntary manslaughter, if he voluntarily seeks and obtains a new trial, he is subject to another trial generally for the offense charged in the indictment, and upon such trial he cannot successfully interpose a plea of former acquittal of the crime of murder or former jeopardy in regard thereto.

(a) This ruling is in accord with article 1, § 1, par. 8, of the Constitution of the state (Civ. Code 1895, § 5705), which provides that "no person shall be put in jeopardy of life, or liberty, more than once for the same offense, save on his or her own motion for a new trial after conviction, or in case of mistrial."

(b) The fifth amendment of the Constitution of the United States, including the statement, "nor shall any person be subjected for the same offense to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb, * * * nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law," was a limitation upon the power of the federal government, and not upon the individual states.

(c) If one has been indicted for murder and convicted of manslaughter, and under a provision of the state Constitution, to the effect that, if a new trial is granted to a convicted person on his own motion, it shall be another trial generally for the offense charged in the indictment, moves for a new trial and obtains it, thus voluntarily causing the verdict to be set aside, the clause of the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States, prohibiting any state from depriving a person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law or denying to any person the equal protection of the laws, does not prevent him from being again tried for murder.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Washington County; B. T. Rawlings, Judge.

Solomon Brantley was indicted for murder, and, from a judgment sustaining a demurrer to a plea of former jeopardy, he brings error. Affirmed.

John R. Cooper, for plaintiff in error. Alfred Herrington, Sol. Gen., Hines & Jordan, and John C. Hart, Atty. Gen., for the State.

LUMPKIN, J. Solomon Brantley was indicted in a single count for murder, and on the trial was convicted of voluntary manslaughter. He moved for a new trial, which was refused, and he carried his case to the Court of Appeals by writ of error, and there obtained a reversal. See 5 Ga. App. 457, 63 S. E. 519. When the case again came on for trial in the superior court, he filed a plea of former acquittal and former jeopardy, contending that the verdict finding him guilty of voluntary manslaughter had the legal effect of finding him not guilty of murder, and therefore he could not be again put on trial for murder, but only for manslaughter. The presiding judge sustained a demurrer to the plea. This is the only ruling of which complaint is now made.

In some states the Constitution or a statute declares that the granting of a new trial to one convicted of a crime places him in the same position as if no trial had been had, or contains provisions having that effect. In the absence of such constitutional or statutory provision, where one who has been indicted for murder and convicted of manslaughter moves for and obtains a new trial, the authorities are not in harmony as to whether he can be again placed on trial for murder or only for the lesser offense under the general prohibition contained in state Constitutions against putting a person twice in jeopardy for the same offense. The greater number of authorities take the view that a verdict of manslaughter involves an acquittal of murder, and that a new trial granted on motion of the accused after conviction of the lesser offense is not to be considered as a new trial for the greater offense of which he was acquitted, but must be confined to a retrial of the offense of which he was convicted, as the accused should not be deemed to have waived his right in so far as he was acquitted. The contrary view, which is held by other authorities, with the reasons therefor, may thus be stated: The defendant was found guilty of the lesser offense of manslaughter, included in the charge of murder. Had he permitted the verdict to stand, he could have claimed whatever legal results flowed from it, including the implication that, as he was found guilty of manslaughter, he was not guilty of the higher offense of murder, and that the affirmative finding that he was guilty of the lesser involved in it the exclusion of the greater. But the accused cannot both voluntarily set aside the verdict and also hold to it. A verdict cannot at the same time be of force and not of force. The verdict of guilty is single. He cannot divide it into that which pleases him and that which does not. The positive fact is the verdict of guilty of one offense. The negative implication from that finding is not guilty of the other offense. It is not easy to see how the positive finding which furnishes the sole basis for the negative implication can be destroyed and set aside by the voluntary action of the accused, and yet leave the implication to stand alone without a basis. To sustain a plea of former acquittal, there must be a subsisting record of an acquittal. If the verdict of guilty of the lesser offense operates as a record of acquittal of the greater, when it is set aside at the instance of the accused, it is certainly no longer a subsisting record of conviction. Can it be said to stand as a subsisting record of acquittal? When, on motion of the accused, the verdict is set aside, no verdict is left. When he asks a new trial and it is granted, it is a complete new trial, not a partial one. The accused is tried on the indictment, not on it as limited by the results of a verdict which he himself has voluntarily caused to be set aside and rendered ineffective. This view was taken in the early case of Bailey v. State, 26 Ga. 579. That decision has never been overruled, although Simmons, C. J., in view of other authorities, said that it involved a question of pleadings, and indicated some doubt as to what would be the ruling were it not for the express provision included in our present Constitution on the subject. Waller v. State, 104 Ga. 505, 30 S. E. 835. In Small v. State, 63 Ga. 386, the grant of a new trial was not under consideration, but the judgment on a verdict of guilt was arrested solely on the ground that the judge who presided at the trial was unauthorized by law to hold the court; and it was held that the prisoner could be again tried on the same indictment, whether the arrest of judgment or the setting aside of the verdict was erroneous or not, as he was concluded by a judgment rendered at his own instance, to which the state could not except.

If the question be argued from the standpoint of former jeopardy, rather than that of former acquittal, and the two be not the same within the meaning of the Constitution, as to the thing inhibited, the result must be the same. A court can grant a new trial to a person convicted of crime and retry him, or it cannot. On the first trial the accused has been placed in jeopardy as to the offense of which he was actually convicted quite as much as in respect to the offense of murder. If, under the Constitution, he could never be put in jeopardy again for any offense involved in the former trial, and could not waive such guaranty, and if he moved for and obtained a new trial, he could never be tried again at all. The grant of a new trial would be equivalent to a discharge. It is generally conceded that he could waive the constitutional protection against putting him twice in jeopardy by asking for a new trial and obtaining it at least as to the offense for which he was convicted. United States v. Ball, 163 U. S. 662, 16 Sup. Ct. 1192, 41 L. Ed. 300. If so, then whether the waiver merely has the effect of allowing a new trial as to the lesser offense, or on the indictment as if there had been no previous trial, is a matter of degree and of construction of the extent of the waiver which the law declares the accused makes in asking for a new trial.

In those states where statutes have been passed declaring that, if on motion of the accused a new trial is granted, it shall be a complete new trial, we have found no instance in which such a statute has not been upheld. Enactments of that character are, in substance, merely legislative declarations or provisions that, when the accused moves for and obtains a new trial, he waives any right to set up former jeopardy to prevent a complete new trial, or estops himself from so doing. If the declaration that the accused cannot be put on trial for murder after he has caused a conviction of manslaughter to be set aside and a new trial to be granted to him is based on constitutional grounds, such legislative acts could not change the result. If the position be not based upon any strict constitutional inhibition against retrying the accused for murder after the grant of the new trial, but upon a question of what is the extent of the waiver which the accused makes when he applies for and obtains a new trial, we need not repeat what has already been said as to the inconsistency in permitting a person convicted of a crime to ask that the verdict of guilty of manslaughter be set aside and a new trial be granted to him, and that he be allowed to destroy the verdict in so far as it affirmatively affects him injuriously, but retain the benefit of all implications arising in his favor therefrom. We are aware of the contrary position which is taken by a number of decisions and some text-writers, but other courts have adopted views similar to those above expressed. In Trono v. United States, 199 U. S. 521, 533, 28 Sup. Ct. 121, 124, 50 L. Ed. 292, it was said, in the opinion delivered by Mr. Justice Peckham: "In our opinion the better doctrine is that which does not limit the court or jury upon a new trial to a consideration of the question of guilt of the lower offense of which the accused was convicted on the first trial, but that the reversal of the judgment of conviction opens up the whole controversy, and acts upon the original judgment as if it had never been." See, also, State v. Gillis, 73 S. C. 318, 53 S. E. 487, 5 L. R. A. (N. S.) 571, 114 Am. St. Rep. 95, 6 Am. & Eng. Ann. Cas. 993; Bohanan v. State, 18 Neb. 57, 24 N. W. 390, 53 Am. Rep. 791; State v. Kessler, 15 Utah, 142, 49 Pac. 293, 62 Am. St. Rep. 911; State v. Bradley, 67 Vt. 465, 32 Atl. 238; United States v. Harding, 1 Wall. Jr. (C. C.) 127, Fed. Cas. No. 15,301; State v. Be Himer, 20 Ohio St. 572; 2 Story, Const. § 1787. In states where statutes on the subject are referred to, see Veatch v. State, 60 Ind. 291; Commonwealth v. Arnold, 83 Ky. 1, 4 Am. St.

Rep. 114. As to the conflict of authority on the subject, see note to Trono v. United States, 4 Am. & Eng. Ann. Cas. 778.

If what has been said were not correct, some very peculiar results would follow in this state. Thus it has been held that where on the trial of one indicted for murder the evidence demands either a verdict of guilty of murder or an acquittal, and under no theory presented by the evidence or the statement of the defendant can he be properly convicted of voluntary manslaughter, it is error for the court to give to the jury a charge to the effect that he may be found guilty of that offense, and that a verdict finding him guilty of voluntary manslaughter is contrary to law, and a new trial will be granted to him on that ground. Berry v. State, 122 Ga. 429, 50 S. E. 845. In that case a new trial was granted to the accused on the ground that there was no element of voluntary manslaughter in the case, and that he should have been found guilty of murder or acquitted. In Kelsey v. State, 62 Ga. 558, the accused was indicted for rape, and was convicted of assault with intent to rape. He moved for a new trial, which was refused by the trial court, and exception was taken. The Supreme Court granted him a new trial, holding that "where the evidence is conclusive that the carnal knowledge was realized, and the only possible question is concerning the force and the consent, a verdict finding the prisoner guilty of an assault with intent to rape is contrary to law." Pen. Code 1895, § 19, declares that "no person shall be convicted of an assault with intent to commit a crime, or of any other attempt to commit any offense, when it shall appear that the crime intended, or the offense attempted, was actually perpetrated by such person at the time of such assault, or in pursuance of such attempt." Other similar cases might be cited. If the contention that on a new trial the accused could only be tried for the offense of which he had previously been convicted were sustained, then in such cases the defendant could set aside the verdict as unwarranted and obtain a new trial on the ground that the evidence proved him guilty of the greater offense, and not of the lesser; and, when again arraigned, could prevent a trial for the greater offense, and thus, in effect, could be set free by satisfying the reviewing court that he was, in fact, guilty of the greater offense instead of the lesser included in it. But, if it were otherwise in the absence of statutory or constitutional provision, the Constitution of the state (Civ. Code 1895, § 5705) expressly provides that "No person shall be put in jeopardy of life, or liberty, more than once for the same offense, save on his or her own motion for a new trial after conviction, or in case of mistrial." A mistrial operates in this respect as no trial. A new trial, as used in the Constitution, means new trial generally. Waller v. State, 104 Ga. 505, 30 S. E. 835; Yeates v. Roberson, 4 Ga. App.

578, 62 S. E. 104. If the state affords a convicted person at his option the privilege of causing a verdict to be reviewed and set aside on account of error, he cannot say that his own conduct shall have no effect against him either as a waiver or estoppel or by virtue of the Constitution itself. He may waive a trial altogether, including the constitutional guaranty of trial by jury, and plead guilty. Former jeopardy is a matter which must be duly pleaded, or the defense will be treated as waived. Hall v. State, 103 Ga. 403, 29 S. E. 915; State v. White, 71 Kan. 356, 80 Pac. 589.

It was contended that to place the defendant on trial for murder, after he had been convicted of manslaughter, and had sought and obtained a new trial through a reversal granted by the Court of Appeals, would be violative of the clause of the fifth amendment of the Constitution of the United States in regard to former jeopardy. Such a contention is without merit. It is now well settled that the fifth amendment to the Constitution of the United States was intended to operate upon the federal government, and not to limit the powers of the states, in respect to their own people. Barron v. Mayor, etc., of Baltimore, 7 Pet. 242, 8 L. Ed. 672; Twitchell v. Commonwealth, 7 Wall. 321, 19 L. Ed. 223; Spies v. Illinois, 123 U. S. 131, 166, 8 Sup. Ct. 22, 31 L. Ed. 80.

It was also contended that to again place the accused on trial for murder would be violative of the provisions of the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States, in that he would thereby be deprived of due process of law and the equal protection of the laws. We think it requires no argument to show that those provisions have no application to the case. That amendment does not deal with the regulations established by state laws and state Constitutions under which a person convicted of crime may move for a new trial or carry his case to a reviewing court, or the extent of the new trial which will be granted to him if he elects of his own motion to invoke the aid of such statutory or constitutional provisions, provided only they furnish due process of law, and do not deny the equal protection of the laws. There is nothing in the Georgia Constitution or laws having any such effect as to the accused. He has been accorded a trial before a court of competent jurisdiction. No claim is made that he was not duly and regularly tried in accordance with the forms of law, nor is any other error assigned except on the point hereinbefore discussed. He has apparently fallen into the same error as did Rawlins, which is thus referred to by Mr. Justice Holmes: "At the argument before us the not uncommon misconception seemed to prevail that the requirement of due process of law took up the special provisions of the state Constitution and laws into the fourteenth amendment for the purposes of the case, so that this court would revise the decision of the state court that the local provisions had been complied with. This is a mistake. If the state Constitution and laws as construed by the state court are consistent with the fourteenth amendment, we can go no further. The only question for us is whether a state could authorize the course of proceedings adopted, if that course were prescribed by its Constitution in express terms." Rawlins v. Georgia, 201 U. S. 638, 26 Sup. Ct. 560, 50 L. Ed. 899. The fourteenth amendment did not radically change the whole theory of the relations of the state and the federal governments to each other, and of both governments to the people. In re Kemmler, 136 U. S. 436, 448, 10 Sup. Ct. 930, 34 L. Ed. 519; Hurtado v. People of California, 110 U. S. 516, 4 Sup. Ct. 111, 292, 28 L. Ed. 232. In Leeper v. Texas, 139 U. S. 462, 11 Sup. Ct. 577, 35 L. Ed. 225, it was said: "By the fourteenth amendment the powers of states in dealing with crime within their borders are not limited, except that no state can deprive particular persons or classes of persons of equal and impartial justice under the law; that law in its regular course of administration through courts of justice is due process, and when secured by the law of the state the constitutional requirement is satisfied; and that due process is so secured by laws operating on all alike, and not subjecting the individual to the arbitrary exercise of the powers of government unrestrained by the established principles of private right and distributive justice."

SAVANNAH ELECTRIC CO. v. JACKSON.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. May 12, 1909.)

1. NEW TRIAL (§ 39*)—GROUNDS—INSUFFICIENCY OF INSTRUCTIONS.

Where, in a suit against a railway company on account of a personal injury, the charge of the court nowhere informed the jury what were the issues or contentions between the parties made by the pleadings or evidence, and the charge given consisted almost entirely of abstract principles of law, and they were not so accurately applied to the case as to render it probable that the jury apprehended what were the issues, or that the omission to instruct them on that subject was harmless, a new trial will be granted.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see New Trial, Cent. Dig. § 59; Dec. Dig. § 39.*]

2. TRIAL (§ 255*)—INSTRUCTIONS—NECESSITY FOR REQUEST.

In an action against a railway company to recover damages for a personal injury on account of a negligent tort, the defense declared by Civ. Code 1895, § 2322, that no person shall recover damages from a railroad company for injury to himself or his property, where the same is caused by his own negligence, and that provided for in section 3830, which states that, if the plaintiff by ordinary care could have avoided the consequences to himself caused by the defendant's negligence, he is not entitled to recover, are not identical; and, where the evidence is such as to present both defenses, the charge should include both, even in the absence of a request therefor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. § 630; Dec. Dig. § 255.*]

3. TRIAL (§ 252*)—INSTRUCTIONS—APPLICABILITY TO EVIDENCE.

Where there was no evidence to show willfulness, recklessness, and wantonness on the part of the employees of the defendant, the judge should not have referred thereto in his charge.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 598-612; Dec. Dig. § 252.*]

4. TRIAL (§§ 256, 260*)—DUTY TO REQUEST MORE SPECIFIC INSTRUCTIONS—OMISSION TO CHARGE.

If the substantial law covering the issues made by the pleadings and evidence is given in charge, and more specific instructions are desired by either party, appropriate requests for that purpose should be made.

(a) Where the presiding judge charged that, if the defendant were not guilty of negligence causing the injury, the plaintiff could not recover, an omission to charge, without request, that if the injury resulted from accident there could be no recovery, was not such a failure to charge in regard to a distinct substantive defense as will require the grant of a new trial.

(b) The case of Atlanta Railway & Power Co. v. Gaston, 118 Ga. 418, 45 S. E. 508, considered and disapproved.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. 628-641, 651-659; Dec. Dig. §§ 256, 260.*]

5. NO ERROR.

Except as above indicated, none of the grounds of the motion for a new trial require a reversal.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Chatham County; W. G. Charlton, Judge.

Action by George Jackson against the Savannah Electric Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Osborne & Lawrence, for plaintiff in error. Oliver & Oliver, for defendant in error.

ATKINSON, J. George Jackson brought suit against the Savannah Electric Company to recover damages for a personal injury caused by his being struck by a street car of defendant. He alleged that the car was running at a high, unlawful, and dangerous rate of speed along the public street; that the motorman did not have it under control when he saw the plaintiff, or in the exercise of proper care could have seen him, in time to avoid the collision; and that no bell was rung or signal given of the approach of the car, so that the plaintiff could avoid it. The defendant denied the substantial allegations of the petition, and alleged that, if the plaintiff received any injury at all, it was due to his own negligence and want of care in not using and exercising ordinary care and diligence for his own safety, and was not due to any negligence or want of care upon the part of the defendant or its servants or agents. The jury found for the plaintiff $150. The defendant moved for a new trial, which was refused, and it excepted.

1. The charge of the court nowhere stated to the jury what were the issues or contentions between the parties. It did not even refer them to the pleadings to ascertain the allegations of the parties, as has sometimes been done. Central Ry. Co. v. McKinney, 118 Ga. 535, 45 S. E. 430 (1); Atlanta Ry. Co. v. Bagwell, 107 Ga. 157, 33 S. E. 191 (1). It made no reference to the pleadings, except that it commenced in these words: "When a railroad company, in the operation of its cars, injures the person of any one, that person is entitled to recover damages, unless the railroad company can show that, in the operation of its cars, its employes were in the exercise of ordinary and reasonable care and diligence; the presumption being against the railroad company, in the event the plaintiff proves his declaration as laid." This could hardly be taken as even referring the jury to the pleadings to ascertain the issues between the parties. The charge consists almost entirely of statements of abstract principles of law, and we cannot say that it was sufficiently explicit, in concretely applying the law to the case, to supply the omission of any statement to them as to what were the real contentions between the parties as presented by the pleadings and evidence. Where the judge informs the jury what the substantial contentions are and gives the law applicable to the case, although it may be somewhat generally stated, if parties desire more specific instructions given to the jury, they should make proper requests therefor. An omission to state in express terms the contentions of the parties may sometimes be cured by such a concrete application of the law to the facts of the case as that the jury would clearly understand the respective positions and the law applicable thereto. But a mere general statement of abstract rules of law will not suffice, in the absence of any statement whatever of the issues arising from the pleadings and evidence. The principle involved in Atlanta Street Ry. Co. v. Hardage, 93 Ga. 457, 21 S. E. 100 (4), is applicable here, although the omission to charge was more evidently erroneous there than in the present case.

2. In the case at bar the evidence for the plaintiff tended to show that he was injured by being struck by a car of the defendant, and that it was negligently operated by the company's servants. On the other hand, the evidence for the defendant was to the effect that the plaintiff, while riding a bicycle and endeavoring to avoid a vehicle on the street, ran against the side of the car, thus causing his own injury, without any negligence on the part of the defendant's servants. There was also evidence tending to show that the plaintiff, by the use of ordinary care, might have avoided the consequences of the negligence of the defendant's employes, if there was any. Thus it will be seen that there was evidence to support either defense—that the plaintiff caused the injury by his own negligence, or that he could have avoided the consequences to himself of negligence on the part of the defendant. These two defenses are not identical. Civ. Code 1895, §§ 2322, 3830; Ga. R. Co. v. Thomas, 68 Ga. 744. And where the evidence is such as to present both defenses the charge should include both, even though no request be made therefor. Central R. Co. v. Harris, 76 Ga. 501. The court omitted in its charge any reference whatever to the defense that the plaintiff caused the injury by his own negligence.

3. The judge charged that "if the defendant was negligent, and the plaintiff did not exercise ordinary care to avoid the consequences of that negligence, unless it was willful, reckless, and wanton on the part of the defendant, still the plaintiff could not recover." There is no evidence in the record sufficient to show willfulness, recklessness, and wantonness on the part of the employes of the defendant; and the charge should have omitted any reference thereto, and the presiding judge should not in that connection have used the expressions above quoted.

4. Several of the grounds of the motion for a new trial complained of omissions of the presiding judge to give various charges. Except as above indicated, in so far as proper, the principles alleged to be omitted were elaborations of the charges as given; and, if the defendant desired such instructions, requests therefor should have been made. If the substantial law covering the issues made by the pleadings and evidence is given, and more specific instructions are desired by either party, they should prefer timely written requests for that purpose.

One ground of the motion for a new trial complains that the judge did not charge the jury that, if the injury was the result of an accident, there could be no recovery by the plaintiff. He did charge that, if the defendant was not guilty of negligence causing the injury, the plaintiff could not recover. The case of Atlanta Ry. & Power Co. v. Gaston, 118 Ga. 418, 45 S. E. 508, was relied on by counsel for plaintiff in error in this connection. The decision in that case was concurred in by five justices, and not by the entire bench, so that it is not binding authority until reviewed, under the statute.

We do not approve the reasoning there set out. An "accident," as the term is used in connection with cases of this character, means an injury which occurs without being caused by the negligence of either the plaintiff or the defendant. That the defendant itself is free from fault furnishes it a defense, not that the plaintiff is faultless. Where the judge instructs the jury that, if the defendant has used all ordinary care and diligence there can be no recovery, it cannot be said to add a distinct and substantive defense to also prove that the plaintiff is free from fault. A charge that if the injury resulted from an accident, and neither party was at fault, there can be no recovery, is in the nature of an elaboration or additional statement of the proposition that the defendant is not liable if it is without fault. It may be proper to give such a charge, if requested; but, being merely elaborative, it does not involve such a distinct defense as to make it error to fail to give it in the absence of a request. The case just cited was considered and differentiated in that of Wrightsville R. Co. v. Gornito, 129 Ga. 204, 213, 58 S. E. 769.

5. Except as above indicated, none of the grounds of the motion for a new trial require a reversal.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur.

P. H. EMMETT & CO. et al. v. DEKLE et al.
(Supreme Court of Georgia. May 13, 1909.)

1. APPEARANCE (§ 20*)—WAIVER OF SERVICE—DEMURRER.

To demur generally to a petition as presenting no cause of action is to plead to the merits of the case; and it is not error for the court to refuse to dismiss a petition on a subsequent motion of the demurrants on the ground that they have not been served with process.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appearance, Cent. Dig. § 92; Dec. Dig. § 20.*]

2. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 444*)—ACTIONS AGAINST.

Where a petition alleges that it is brought against a defendant as administratrix of a certain deceased person, and alleges the death of her intestate, her qualification as such administratrix, and her consent to be sued within 12 months from her qualification, and prays the cancellation of certain mortgages executed by her intestate, and other relief against her as administratrix, and where service of a copy of the petition is acknowledged, and process, copy process and service thereof, and 12 months' exemption from suit are waived in an entry indorsed upon the petition and signed by one as attorney at law for such defendant as administratrix of such deceased person, such defendant as administratrix of her intestate is a party to the suit, notwithstanding that in the prayer for process her representative character is not stated.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. § 1815; Dec. Dig. § 444.*]

3. VENUE (§ 22*)—PARTNERSHIP—ACTION AGAINST.

A suit to cancel a mortgage on realty, executed by a partnership and the members composing the partnership, may be brought in the county of the residence of the administratrix of a deceased partner.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Emanuel County; B. T. Rawlings, Judge.

Equitable petition by R. L. Dekle and others against P. H. Emmett & Co. and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants bring error. Affirmed.

On March 31, 1902, R. L. Dekle, Lucy L. Morehead, W. J. Evans, and George P. Edenfield filed their equitable petition in the superior court of Emanuel county against P. H. Emmett & Co., the Tatnall Investment Company, Lizzie V. Emmett, administratrix of the estate of P. H. Emmett, deceased, Wade B. Shrivall, and the Ellis-Young Company, all being residents of Emanuel county, except the Tatnall Investment Company, a corporation, and the Ellis-Young Company, which were residents of Otham county. The allegations of the petition were substantially as follows:

The firm of P. H. Emmett & Co., composed of P. H. Emmett and the Tatnall Investment Company, was formed for the purpose of producing and manufacturing naval stores, having its plants and place of business in Emanuel county. John R. Young and C. S. Ellis, both of Chatham county, were respectively president and secretary and treasurer of the Tatnall Investment Company. The amounts of indebtedness of the firm of P. H. Emmett & Co. to the several plaintiffs are set forth, and it is alleged that this firm owes various other creditors several thousand dollars, all of which indebtedness was created since May 9, 1899. P. H. Emmett having died on August 28, 1901, while a resident of Emanuel county, his widow, Lizzie V., qualified as his administratrix, and waived the 12 months' exemption from suit allowed her by law. P. H. Emmett & Co., the estate of P. H. Emmett, and the Tatnall Investment Company are alleged to be insolvent. The Ellis-Young Company, of which John R. Young and C. S. Ellis are the members, hold a mortgage given by P. H. Emmett & Co. to secure an alleged indebtedness of $11,000, and also to secure future advances, upon which it is claimed that there is due them the amount of $25,000, and are also the transferees of a mortgage made by P. H. Emmett & Co. to the Ellis-Young Company to secure an alleged indebtedness of $10,500 on December 15, 1897, which mortgage shows no credit, and which the transferees claim is yet due. It is alleged on information and belief that this latter mortgage was given without any consideration, and for the purpose of defrauding and defeating certain judgments in existence against P. H. Emmett at the time of its execution. For nearly three years since the execution of the $11,000 mortgage P. H. Emmett & Co. have shipped to the Ellis-Young Company their entire output of naval stores, worth several thousand dollars, for which no credit has been made upon either of said mortgages, and the Ellis-Young Company refuse to explain what has been done with such shipments. Since the death of P. H. Emmett, the Tatnall Investment Company, through its officers, Young and Ellis, has, as surviving partner, taken charge of the property of the firm of P. H. Emmett & Co., through Wade B. Shrivall. Young and Ellis, representing, owning, and controlling the Tatnall Investment Company, have been disposing of all the property of P. H. Emmett & Co. they possibly could, which has been acquired since the mortgage was made, and through Shrivall wasting, destroying, and removing out of Emanuel county all the property of this firm not embraced in the mortgages. The Ellis-Young Company have by virtue of a power of sale in these mortgages advertised all the property of P. H. Emmett & Co. for sale on November 22, 1901, the property being of the value of $7,000; and the Tatnall Investment Company, in collusion with Ellis-Young Company, both of which are operated, controlled, and owned by the same parties, are by these means striving to defeat the collection of any and all just demands of all parties against P. H. Emmett & Co. It is alleged that upon a proper accounting between the firm of P. H. Emmett & Co. and the Ellis-Young Company there will be left sufficient property to pay at least 50 per cent. of the bona fide indebtedness of this firm; but, if not restrained, the Ellis-Young Company will waste, squander, and appropriate the whole amount.

The prayers of the petition are (1) for the appointment of a receiver to sell the property and dispose of all the proceeds under proper orders of the court; (2) that the mortgages of the Ellis-Young Company be brought into court and decreed to be null and void, as being without consideration, and, if there was any consideration, that it be decreed to be paid; (3) that defendants be restrained from selling, appropriating, managing, controlling, or in any manner interfering with the property of P. H. Emmett & Co., and that all the defendants be enjoined from further management or control of this property; (4) for judgment against the firm of P. H. Emmett & Co. as a partnership, and against the Tatnall Investment Company as a member of the firm, and Lizzie V. Emmett, administratrix of P. H. Emmett, deceased (de bonis testatoris), as individuals composing this firm, for the full amounts of plaintiffs' demands, and against the Ellis-Young Company, and John R. Young and C. S. Ellis, and that all these parties be served with a copy of this petition, and with process; (5) for such other relief as they may be entitled to; and (6) "that process may issue requiring said P. H. Emmett & Co., the Tatnall Investment Company, Ellis-Young Company, Wade B. Shrivall, and Lizzie V. Emmett to be and appear at the April term of the superior court" to answer this complaint.

The process is headed: "W. J. Evans et al. v. Lizzie V. Emmett et al. Complaint"—and proceeds as follows: "The defendant, Lizzie V. Emmett et al., are hereby required," etc. The only entry of service is an acknowledgment thereof, with waiver of process, and the 12 months' exemption from suit, signed, "G. H. Williams, Atty. at Law for Lizzie V. Emmett, Adm'r of P. H. Emmett, Dec'd," dated November 19, 1901.

The defendants P. H. Emmett & Co., the Tatnall Investment Company, "the surviving copartner of the said firm of P. H. Emmett & Co.," the Ellis-Young Company, John R. Young, and C. S. Ellis, by their attorneys, on April 1, 1902, filed their demurrer to the petition, upon the grounds that it set forth no cause of action; that it showed no ground for injunction, receiver, or other equitable relief; that there is an ample remedy at law; that the petition on its face shows that the superior court of Emanuel county has no jurisdiction of the case, because no defendant against whom substantial relief, especially equitable relief, is asked, resides in that county, but all reside in Chatham county; that the date on which the alleged threatened sale, sought to be enjoined, was to take place was November 22, 1901, while the petition was not filed till April of the following year, long after it had taken place, and was, therefore, as to its main features, too late; that the allegations of the petition are too vague, there being no statement as to the property alleged to be under mortgage, and no copy of either mortgage attached to the petition, nor any reason alleged why it was not so attached; that the allegations of fraud are too vague and indefinite, and it was not alleged that plaintiffs were interested in the judgments against P. H. Emmett, mentioned in the petition; and that the petition was vague and uncertain as to parties.

After filing the petition, W. J. Evans and George P. Edenfield withdrew from the cause, leaving R. L. Dekle and Lucy L. Morehead as plaintiffs. Under an agreement between counsel the demurrer came on to be heard before Judge Rawlings on December 30, 1907, at which time two amendments to the petition were presented and allowed. The first of these amendments alleged that Mrs. Emmett, John R. Young, and C. S. Ellis collusively took possession and control of the entire estate of P. H. Emmett & Co., in Emanuel county, consisting of described lands and personality of the value of $16,000, and, under the pretense that the mortgage referred to in favor of the Ellis-Young Company covered this property and was a valid lien on the same, sold this property under their mortgage, bought it in themselves, and converted it to their own use, when in fact this mortgage did not cover such property; that all this property is still in the estate of P. H. Emmett & Co., but by the acts referred to has been placed out of the reach of petitioners and the other creditors of P. H. Emmett & Co.; that the administratrix is only under a small bond, not sufficient to cover this property, and the "defendants, jointly and in collusion with each other, having converted said property to their own use in manner and form aforesaid, are jointly liable to your petitioners for their respective sums against the said P. H. Emmett & Co."; that in legal contemplation the firm of P. H. Emmett & Co. consisted of C. S. Ellis, John R. Young, and P. H. Emmett, for the reason that the Tatnall Investment Company, which it was claimed was the "Company," had for several years prior to the formation of this firm been extinct, Ellis and Young being, respectively, its president and secretary and treasurer, and the business was carried on and operated by these three persons, and for this reason they had no right to dispose of the assets of the firm in the manner and form stated; and that the consideration of the notes sued on was turpentine timber sold to P. H. Emmett & Co., of which defendants got the full benefit, and in equity and good conscience they are liable to petitioners to the value of the same. The prayer of this amendment is for such judgment and decree as the pleadings, evidence, and the law of the case may authorize.

The second amendment alleges that P. H. Emmett as an individual, and the Tatnall Investment Company as a corporation, formed the partnership of P. H. Emmett & Co., and because a corporation was one of the partners the contract of partnership was contrary to public policy, null, and void, and in equity Ellis and Young (being the members of the Tatnall Investment Company) and P. H. Emmett constituted the firm of P. H. Emmett & Co., and are therefore liable individually for the amounts due thereon; that equitably all the creditors of P. H. Emmett & Co. are entitled to share in the assets of the firm ratably, regardless of liens, mortgages, and conveyances made by this firm to any creditors; and that, if Ellis and Young are not partners of that firm and individually liable as such, they can only share ratably with the other creditors as members and stockholders of the Ellis-Young Company, these mortgages being null and void in legal contemplation. The method by which the property was sold is attacked, it being alleged that the power of sale in the mortgage, signed by P. H. Emmett & Co., was revoked by the death of P. H. Emmett, and that Lizzie V. Emmett, as the administratrix of P. H. Emmett, deceased, had notice of its illegality, and with such knowledge procured, aided, and acquiesced therein. Copies of the notes representing the petitioner's indebtedness are attached, and also of the two mortgages, and a deed made by the Ellis-Young Company to John R. Young, by virtue of the sale under the power. These mortgages and this deed are alleged to be void, and it is prayed that they be delivered up and canceled.

After the allowance of the amendment, the defendants, who originally filed their demurrer (except John R. Young, who has since died), renewed their demurrer and moved "to dismiss the case as amended, because these defendants are not served with process, or made parties, or legally brought into court, and also upon all the 10 grounds set forth in the original demurrer filed by defendants." Upon this motion to dismiss the court indorsed the following order: "The within motion not having been filed till December 30, 1907, the date when said demurrer therein referred which was filed April 21, 1902, the same is hereby overruled as coming too late; said general and special demurrer, having been filed several terms of said court previous to said motion, being equivalent to a waiver of service or any defect in the service." Defendants complain of the refusal to sustain their demurrer and the motion to dismiss.

Adams & Adams, for plaintiffs in error.
Williams & Bradley, for defendants in error.

EVANS, P. J. (after stating the facts as above). 1. At the appearance term the plaintiffs in error demurred generally and specially to the petition. To demur generally to a petition as presenting no cause of action is to plead to the merits of the case. Appearance and pleading to the merits amount to a waiver of process and service, and by demurring generally these particular defendants were properly before the court. They could not invoke the judgment of the court upon the sufficiency of the petition, unless they were to be bound by such judgment. The court very properly refused to dismiss the case because the plaintiffs in error had not been served with process. Lyons v. Planters' Bank, 86 Ga. 485, 12 S. E. 882, 12 L. R. A. 155; Dykes v. Jones, 129 Ga. 99, 58 S. E. 645.

2. The two defendants residing in the county where the suit was brought were Wade B. Shrivall and Mrs. Emmett. Shrivall was only a nominal party, and was never served. The plaintiffs in error insist that Mrs. Emmett was not a party to the suit, either individually or as administratrix of the estate of P. H. Emmett. The original petition began with the allegation that petitioners complained against Lizzie V. Emmett, administratrix of P. H. Emmett, deceased, and the other defendants therein named. Her qualification as administratrix of P. H. Emmett was alleged to have occurred within 12 months of the contemplated filing of the suit, and it was further alleged that she "as such administratrix has waived the exemption of 12 months from her qualification from suit in the case herein made and presented, and she is a resident of the county of Emanuel." It is alleged that the mortgage executed by her intestate is fraudulent and void for the reasons stated. The prayers of the petition include those for a judgment (de bonis testatoris) against her as administratrix of P. H. Emmett, and for a cancellation of the mortgage of P. H. Emmett & Co. to the Ellis-Young Company. Her attorney acknowledged service as follows: "Service of a copy of the within petition acknowledged, process and copy process and service thereof waived, and Lizzie V. Emmett, adm'x, hereby waives the 12 months' exemption from suit as such administratrix. Nov. 19, 1901. [Signed] G. H. Williams, Atty. at Law for Lizzie V. Emmett, Adm'x of P. H. Emmett, Deceased." The prayer for process against the several defendants included Lizzie V. Emmett, without describing her representative character; but, as no relief was prayed against her individually, her citation to court in the process would be to answer the suit served on her. At most it would be but an irregularity in the process, and one she could not take advantage of after she had specifically acknowledged service of a copy of the petition, and waived process, copy process, and service of process.

Our attention is called to the cases of Seisel v. Wells, 99 Ga. 159, 25 S. E. 286, and Clayton v. Farrar Lumber Co., 119 Ga. 87, 45 S. E. 723, as maintaining a contrary view. In the first-cited case a petition was filed against several defendants, but process was prayed against only two. The clerk attached process against all. Those defendants against whom there was no prayer for process acknowledged service of the petition. This court held that the clerk had no authority to annex to a petition a process requiring the appearance of persons against whom there was no prayer for process, and that a mere acknowledgment of service upon a petition, and a waiver of service of the same, is not a waiver of process or prayer for process. The other cited case is to the same effect. In the instant case, not only the process prayed against Lizzie V. Emmett, but as administratrix of P. H. Emmett she specifically waived process, copy process, and service thereof. We think that Lizzie V. Emmett, as administratrix of P. H. Emmett, was a party defendant.

3. Counsel for plaintiffs in error state in their brief that their chief contention is that the case ought to have been dismissed, because the superior court of Emanuel county was without jurisdiction. If Mrs. Lizzie V. Emmett, as administratrix of P. H. Emmett, deceased, was a necessary and proper party against whom substantial equitable relief was prayed, then Emanuel superior court had jurisdiction of the case. It was charged that the Tatnall Investment Company and the estate of P. H. Emmett were insolvent, and that the assets of P. H. Emmett & Co. were covered by apparent liens which would more than exhaust them, and it was only by invoking the aid of equity to set aside these liens and the sale thereunder which was alleged to be fraudulent, and by an accounting between the creditors, that a judgment either against the firm or its individual members could reach its assets. These mortgages were signed both by the partnership and the members of the firm as individuals, and the administratrix of the deceased partner was a necessary party to a proceeding in equity to set them aside. These mortgages were not only upon personalty, but also upon realty. The legal title to this real estate was not in the partnership, but in the partners as tenants in common (Hartnett v. Stillwell, 121 Ga. 386, 49 S. E. 276, 104 Am. St. Rep. 151), and the representative of the estate of a deceased partner would therefore be a necessary party to a proceeding to set aside a mortgage upon such real estate, signed not only by the partnership, but also by her decedent. Again, the contract of partnership between P. H. Emmett, an individual, and the Tatnall Investment Company, a corporation, was void, since the power to form a partnership is not one of those which is common to all corporations, but is wholly inconsistent with the scope and tenor of the powers expressly conferred, and the duties imposed upon a corporation in the absence of such permission in the charter. Gunn v. Central R. Co., 74 Ga. 509. Nor can the corporation as surviving partner here claim the legal right to administer the estate of the partnership, since it is only through the interposition of equitable principles that either its rights or obligations as a partner can be enforced. Had this suit been brought in Chatham county, the representative of the estate of P. H. Emmett, deceased, would have been a necessary party. It was therefore perfectly proper to bring this cause in Emanuel county. There was no error in refusing to sustain this ground of the demurrer.

The grounds of special demurrer were not argued in the briefs.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

(132 Ga. 587)

GREGORY v. GEORGIA GRANITE R. CO.
(Supreme Court of Georgia. May 13, 1909.)1. RAILROADS (§ 260*)—DUTIES—LIABILITY.

In accepting a charter from the state containing a grant of rights and franchises, a railroad company impliedly assumes the duty of public carrier, and cannot divest itself of its public duties nor shirk its liabilities by allowing another corporation, without legislative authority, to take possession of its track and operate cars thereon.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. §§ 817-823; Dec. Dig. § 260.*]

2. RAILROADS (§ 260*)—DEFECTIVE TRACK—LIABILITY.

Where a railroad company without legislative authority permits another corporation to exercise the franchise of running cars drawn by steam over its track, the company owning the road is liable for an injury due to the defective construction of the track, as though such company itself were operating the cars.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. §§ 817-823; Dec. Dig. § 260.*]

3. CARRIERS (§ 238*)—CARRIAGE OF PASSENGERS—WHO ARE PASSENGERS.

Where a railroad company verbally consents for a quarry company to operate cars on its track, and the quarry company transports over such road its employes to and from their work, an employe of the quarry company who has no connection with the operation of the train while being so transported sustains to the railroad company the relation of passenger to the extent that the railroad company and its licensee is bound to exercise extraordinary diligence to keep from injuring him.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Dec. Dig. § 238.*]

4. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 979*)—REVIEW—DISCRETION OF TRIAL COURT—NEW TRIAL.

Where there have been two concurring verdicts for the plaintiff, and no error of law has been committed, and the verdict is amply supported by the evidence, and the trial judge states in his order granting a new trial that he does so mainly because in his opinion the evidence does not sustain an essential allegation of the plaintiff's petition, the judgment granting a new trial will be reversed where it appears that the trial court erred in deciding as to the legal effect of the evidence, which influenced him in granting a new trial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3871-3873; Dec. Dig. § 979.*]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, De Kalb County; L. S. Roan, Judge.

Personal injury action by J. E. Gregory against the Georgia Granite Railroad Company. There was a verdict for plaintiff, which was set aside and a new trial granted, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

Hulsey & Field and J. D. Kilpatrick, for plaintiff in error. Westmoreland Bros. and Howard & Bolding, for defendant in error.

EVANS, P. J. The Georgia Granite Company, a corporation, owns and operates a quarry about three miles distant from Lithonia, a station on the Georgia Railroad. In 1904 the Georgia Granite Railroad Company, a corporation chartered under the general railroad law by the Secretary of State, constructed a railroad from the quarry to Lithonia. For the sake of brevity hereafter we shall refer to the Georgia Granite Company as the quarry company and the Georgia Granite Railroad Company as the railroad company. The same person was the president of both corporations. The secretary and treasurer of the railroad company was the general manager of the quarry company and the vice president of the railroad company was the superintendent of the quarry company. The railroad company had no equipment, and, immediately after the completion of its track, the quarry company used it in transporting their output to Lithonia. The quarry company has an engine, but no cars, and the cars which it uses are furnished by the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company, which operates the Georgia Railroad as lessee. The quarry company employs the engineer, the fireman, and trackmen, who operate the railroad and keep up its track. There is no formal written lease from the railroad company to the quarry company, and the latter operates the road under verbal arrangement, whereby the quarry company pays the engineer, fireman, and trackmen, and charges this expense to the railroad company. The terminus of the railroad at the quarry is called Rock Chapel, and there are two road crossings between Rock Chapel and Lithonia. In addition to transporting the product of the quarry, the quarry company also hauled fertilizers, cotton seed, and lumber for other persons, and collected freight for the same. Neither the quarry nor the railroad company maintained a ticket office or freight depot, nor was any fare ever charged or collected for carrying passengers. It was usual and customary for the quarry company to haul its employes to and from their work on the train, and to this end they left Lithonia after the arrival of the early passenger train on the Georgia Railroad for the accommodation of its employes who came daily by that train. It was also usual to stop at the road crossings between Lithonia and Rock Chapel to allow its employes to get aboard or leave the train. It was customary, not only to haul the employes of the quarry company, but also any other person in the community who wished to ride; and this custom was known to the railroad company and quarry company. In December, 1905, J. E. Gregory, an employe of the quarry company, whose work was not at all connected with the operation of the locomotive or train, while riding with numerous other employes from his work, was injured by the derailment of a car. He sued the railroad company for damages, alleging that he was riding on this car with the knowledge and sanction of the vice president and superintendent of the railroad company; that he had paid no fare as a passenger, and did not expect to be called on to pay any fare as a passenger, but that he was able and willing and ready to pay fare had any been demanded of him; and that the derailment of the car was due to the defective construction and maintainance of the track. The defendant denied liability, and especially that it was negligent as charged. The plaintiff prevailed, and a new trial was granted. The case was again tried, and the plaintiff obtained a second verdict, which was set aside on motion for a new trial; and it is to this judgment that the plaintiff excepts. In the order granting a new trial the judge stated that it was granted mainly on the ground that the evidence failed to establish the relation between the plaintiff and the defendant of passenger and carrier, as alleged in the petition.

From the identity of the officials of the two corporations, and the cessation of active management by the railroad company after the completion of the line of railroad, and the subsequent operation of it by the quarry company, the railroad tracks seems to have been constructed mainly for the use of the quarry company. The railroad company, after having obtained from the state a charter with authority to exercise the right of eminent domain, by virtue of which it laid its track, cannot afterwards surrender the exclusive use and control of its track to a private corporation for private purposes. In accepting the grant of rights and franchises from the state a railroad corporation impliedly assumes the duty of a common carrier. The consideration of the grant is the undertaking of the corporation to impartially perform this public duty. 4 Elliott on Railroads, § 1392. A railroad company cannot divest itself of its public duties nor shirk its liabilities by simply allowing another corporation to take possession of its track and operate cars thereon. Ga. R. Co. v. Haas, 127 Ga. 193, 56 S. E. 313, 119 Am. St. Rep. 327; Civ. Code 1895, § 1864. It was held in Macon & Augusta R. Co. v. Mayes, 49 Ga. 355, 15 Am. Rep. 678, that, "where a railroad company permits other companies or persons to exercise the franchise of running cars drawn by steam over its road, the company owning the road, and to which the law has entrusted the franchise, is liable for an injury done, as though the company owning the road were itself running the cars." The theory of liability is that, where a railroad company owning the track suffers or licenses another corporation or person to discharge its public functions without legislative authority, the latter does so as the agent of the former. Nelson v. Vermont & Canada R. Co., 26 Vt. 717, 62 Am. Dec. 614; Singleton v. S. W. R. Co., 70 Ga. 464, 48 Am. Rep. 574. The rule in the Mayes Case, supra, was held not to apply in case of a lessee operating the lessor's track under legislative authority, so as to make the lessor liable to the servant of the lessee for the negligence of a fellow servant in the operation of a train. Banks v. Ga. R. Co., 112 Ga. 655, 37 S. E. 992; Killian v. A. & K. R. Co., 79 Ga. 234, 4 S. E. 165, 11 Am. St. Rep. 410. In the present case there was no lease as contemplated by Civ. Code 1895, § 2173, and Acts 1899 (Ga. Laws, p. 54), but simply a verbal consent by the railroad company for the quarry company to run its cars over its track at the expense of the quarry company. The act of 1899 provides for a record of a lease contract by a railroad company to another railroad company or a private person, and declares that a failure to record such lease shall make the lessor company liable for an injury caused by the lessee, and that a defense attempting to shift liability to the lessee shall not prevail. So that there can be no doubt that the railroad company is not absolved from liability as a common carrier for an injury caused by the derailment of the car operated by the quarry company, which was due to the defective condition and maintenance of the track simply because it had surrendered its track to the quarry company, and it did not itself otherwise engage in the business for which it was incorporated.

The plaintiff alleged that he was a passenger on the car which was derailed, and relies on the foregoing recital of facts as sufficient to show that he sustained this relation to the defendant at the time of his injury. Although in the employment of the quarry company, the duties of his employment were entirely disassociated with the operation of the train. He worked at the quarry, and, in accordance with the general custom of the quarry company, was being transported from his work on its cars when injured. Treating the quarry company as the agent of the railroad company in operating its cars over the latter's track, the servants of the quarry company operating the train relatively to the public were the servants of the railroad company. But the employees of the quarry company, whose work had no connection with the operation of the train, were not the servants of the railroad company. As was said in Central R. Co. v. Henderson, 69 Ga. 716: "Though one may be an employé of a railroad company, yet if his agency is disconnected from the running of trains, and while traveling he is injured, he stands in the position of a passenger." In this case the plaintiff was a depot agent of the railroad company, and was traveling on a pass. The exaction of fare by a railroad company is not essential in every case to make one riding on its cars a passenger. "One employed by a railroad company as a telegraph lineman, and who is transported to and from his work free of charge by the railroad company, and who while so traveling has nothing to do with the control or operation of the train on which he is riding, is a passenger to the extent that the company is bound to exercise extraordinary diligence to keep from injuring him." Carswell v. M. D. & S. R. Co., 118 Ga. 826, 45 S. E. 695. The plaintiff was not on the cars by the express permission of the quarry company, but was riding in accordance with a general custom, known to its officials, and daily practiced from the time it began to run its engine over the railroad company's track. The quarry company's permission for him to ride to and from his work will be implied from its general habit of transporting its employes to and from their work. At the time of the injury he was being transported by the agent of the railroad company, to wit, the quarry company. The conclusion we reach is that under the undisputed evidence the plaintiff sustained the relation of passenger to the defendant.

The grounds of the motion for new trial were that the verdict was contrary to law, contrary to evidence, contrary to the charge of the court, and that a certain excerpt from the charge was erroneous. There was ample evidence from which the jury could find that the derailment of the car was occasioned by the defective construction and maintenance of the railroad track, and that the plaintiff's injury was due to the defendant's negligence. The court charged the jury that the plaintiff could not recover unless it appeared from the evidence that he was a passenger, and in defining the relation of passenger and carrier used this language: "What are these elements of fact? First. There must be a carrier of passengers; that is to say, there must be a person, natural or artificial, who must do a business of carrying the public. A railroad company would be an artificial person, not a natural person. Second. There must be some person who is willing to be carried by the carrier, and carried under such terms and conditions as the carrier may lawfully prescribe. Third. The actual entry by such person into one of the vehicles furnished by the carrier for the purpose of being carried in accordance with such terms and conditions as the carrier may lawfully prescribe. When these elements of fact are all present, then the relation of carrier and passenger arises." Without stating the very elaborate criticism of this charge, it is manifest that there is nothing therein contained prejudicial to the railroad company. This is the second verdict for the plaintiff, and the court in its order granting a new trial states that he was mainly influenced to grant it because he did not think the evidence was sufficient to establish the relation of passenger. We differ with his honor as to the legal effect of the evidence on this subject. Where there have been two concurrent verdicts for the plaintiff on the same state of facts, and where no error of law has been committed, and where under all the evidence the verdict is not manifestly wrong, the trial judge could not in the exercise of his discretion grant a second new trial. Dethrage v. Rome, 125 Ga. 802, 54 S. E. 654.

The grant of the second new trial is reversed. All the Justices concur.

BRADFORD v. BRAND.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. May 13, 1909.)

1. NEW TRIAL (§ 99*)—NEWLY DISCOVERED EVIDENCE—DISCRETION OF COURT.

All applications for new trial upon the ground of newly discovered evidence are addressed to the sound legal discretion of the trial judge; and, even if the newly discovered evidence relied on as a ground for a new trial was not cumulative in its nature, there is nothing in the record to indicate that the judge abused the discretion vested in him in overruling the motion on this ground. Miller v. State, 119 Ga. 561, 46 S. E. 838.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see New Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 201, 202; Dec. Dig. § 99.*]

2. DEEDS PROPERLY ADMITTED.

The court did not err in admitting in evidence the deeds to the admission of which the plaintiff objected; nor was there any error of harmful effect to the plaintiff in the failure of the court to refer to such deeds in his charge.

3. SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

The evidence was amply sufficient to support the verdict, and the court did not abuse its discretion in refusing to grant a new trial.

HARRISON et al. v. BELL et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. May 15, 1909.)

APPEAL AND ERROR (§§ 598, 954*)—RECORD—AFFIDAVIT—REVIEW—DISCRETION OF LOWER COURT—INJUNCTION.

An application was made for a permanent and for an interlocutory injunction. On the hearing of the application for the latter, it was denied, and the plaintiffs excepted. The bill of exceptions recited that "the case went to trial upon the pleadings in the case, the petition, amendment, answer of the defendants, and the affidavit of A. J. Bell." Among other grounds urged by the defendants against the grant of the injunction prayed were laches and estoppel; and the answer did not admit all of the allegations of the petition, so as to make only issues of law. The affidavit referred to was neither incorporated in the bill of exceptions nor attached thereto as an exhibit duly identified by the judge, nor did it ever become a proper part of the record; but sent up with the record was what appeared to be a copy of an affidavit of Bell, but not otherwise identified, except that it preceded the certificate of the clerk to the record. Objection was made by counsel for defendant in error to the consideration of such evidence, or to the reversal of the refusal of the court to grant an injunction, which in part at least rested on the exercise of his discretion.

Held:

(1) That the evidence was not properly brought before this court, and cannot be considered.

(2) In the absence of the evidence, it cannot be held that the presiding judge abused his discretion in refusing to grant an interlocutory injunction, or that the case is one so clearly controlled by a question of law as to require a reversal of such refusal, without regard to the evidence which may have been introduced.

(3) Under such circumstances, whether or not the court erred in refusing to strike certain portions of the answer, his ruling on that subject will not require a reversal of the judgment refusing to grant an interlocutory injunction.

5. NEW TRIAL (§ 39*)—GROUNDS—INSTRUCTIONS.

A new trial will not be granted because of the refusal by the court to give a charge containing an argumentative discussion of the various reasons underlying the rule of law that in all civil cases the jury are bound to take the law from the court.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Chatham County; W. G. Charlton, Judge.

Action by C. E. Young against H. H. McGee. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Alexander & Edwards, for plaintiff in error. Wilson & Rogers, for defendant in error.

EVANS, P. J. C. E. Young, while riding a bicycle, was injured in a collision with an automobile driven by its owner, Dr. H. H. McGee. He sued Dr. McGee for damages, and obtained a verdict which the court refused to set aside, and the defendant brings error.

Judge Cann, who presided, at the trial, shortly thereafter resigned, and the motion for new trial was refused by his successor, Judge Charlton.

The scene of the collision was in Savannah, on Drayton street, at the intersection of Hall street. Drayton street extends north and south, and the roadway between the curbing is 28 feet. There is a row of large oak trees on the east side, occupying a part of the roadway near the curbing. At the time of the occurrence under investigation, a watering cart was stationed in the street just outside the trees. The plaintiff, who was riding a bicycle, was on the east side of the street, and was going northward, and the defendant was driving his automobile southward on the west side of the street. On the trial the plaintiff testified that, before he reached Hall street, he observed the defendant's automobile coming from the opposite direction. Just as he was approaching Hall street, he observed that the defendant began to turn his automobile into Hall street, and he undertook to provide against this change in direction, when the defendant suddenly changed his course, and ran into him. The defendant and his wife, who occupied the automobile, testified that the defendant never attempted to turn into Hall street, but that the plaintiff deflected his bicycle across the course of the automobile, and collided with it while the defendant was doing his best to avoid the changed course of the bicycle. It is urged that the evidence fails to show any liability, and that the court erred in refusing to grant a new trial, on the ground of insufficient evidence to support the verdict. It is argued that inasmuch as the judge who refused the motion did not try the case, and did not observe the witnesses under examination, his approval of the verdict is not to be regarded with the same significance as if he had presided at the trial. There is a difference between the effect of an approval of a verdict on a motion for a new trial by a judge who presided at the trial, and its approval by one who only passed on the motion, but the only effect is simply to take the case out of the operation of the rule that the Supreme Court interferes reluctantly with a verdict approved by the presiding judge as contrary to law and evidence. Cleveland v. Treadwell, 68 Ga. 835. The variance between the plaintiff and the defendant as to the responsible and contributing cause of the collision is acute, and it was the peculiar province of the jury to settle this disputed issue of fact. By their verdict they found that the proximate cause of the collision was the defendant's negligence. In other words, they accepted the plaintiff's version of the occurrence. Their opportunity of seeing and hearing the witnesses while testifying gives them a superior advantage over us in determining the truth of the case. Unless errors of law have been committed, their verdict will be left to stand.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. & Am. Digs. 1907 to date, & Reporter Indexes

2, 3. It is contended that three excerpts from the charge are erroneous. The first relates to the court's summary of the defendant's contention as excluding one of his defenses. This is clearly without merit. The second exception alleges that a certain pertinent and correct charge was rendered erroneous by the failure of the court to charge in immediate connection therewith another principle of law. This exception cannot be sustained. Cline v. Milledgeville Bkg. Co., 181 Ga. 611, 62 S. E. 984 (2).

4. The third exception to the charge is to this excerpt: "If a collision takes place and a party is on the wrong side of the road, the presumption is generally against the party on the wrong side of the road. This applies to whichever of the parties in this case you may find, if either, was upon the wrong side of the road." This charge is alleged to be erroneous, because it is contended that there was no evidence showing that the defendant was ever on the wrong side of the road, or was in violation of the rule of the road. The accuracy of the charge as a legal proposition is not questioned by the assignment of error. The evidence shows that the automobile just before the collision was near the middle of the road, and it is not perfectly clear that it ever crossed to the east side; but, even if it be conceded that the automobile never crossed over to the east side of the street, we do not see how the defendant was harmed by the instruction. There is no dispute that the actual collision occurred on the western side of the street, the left side relatively to the direction the plaintiff was riding his bicycle; and the force of the instruction was to the benefit of the defendant, as the jury were instructed that the presumption was against the party who was on the wrong side of the street, and the plaintiff admitted that he had crossed the street to his left when he was stricken by the automobile.

5. Exception is taken to the refusal of the court to give in charge the following, as requested: "I further charge you that the court is responsible for the law. Your oath and your duty require you to take the law implicitly as the court delivers it. As it is sometimes unknown what reason guides juries to their conclusions, to aid your memory in this respect, the court reminds you that the charge is delivered in public in hearing of the parties and their counsel, and, if the court errs in the law, it is easy to reach such error, have a rehearing upon it, and have it corrected; but if the jury, as they privately deliberate, undertake to usurp the functions of the court, and undertakes to differ with the court as to the law of the case, it is more difficult to reach, to ascertain, or correct any such errors into which you may thereby fall. Therefore the law imposes upon the court the responsibility of determining the law of the case. The province of the jury is with the facts. You are exclusively the judges of the testimony, and it is your duty to find the facts from the testimony as delivered under oath by the witnesses, and, having found the facts, to apply the law of the case as given you by the court. I further charge you that the rule of the road, as established by the laws of Georgia, require travelers with vehicles, whether carts, wagons, automobiles, or bicycles, when meeting, to each turn to the right, and that it was the duty of the plaintiff to know and observe the rule of the road. Persons using the public streets, as conscious human agents, are bound to exercise their faculties of seeing and hearing, and are further bound to exercise ordinary care to avoid the consequences of the negligence of others who are using the public streets by either remaining away or getting out of the way of probable or known danger after they discover it if in the exercise of ordinary care and prudence they should discover it. If a person voluntarily assumes a risk or does a thing in a dangerous way which can be safely done, he assumes the risk of what he does, and, if an accident occurs and injury results to him in consequence thereof, he cannot recover; and in this connection I charge you that if you find from the evidence that the plaintiff's injuries were occasioned, wholly or in part, by his violation of the rule of the road, or in his voluntarily assuming a risk or in doing a thing in a dangerous way which he could have done in another way in safety, he cannot recover. If you find that the plaintiff's injuries were not occasioned by the negligence of the defendant, he cannot recover. The evidence must affirmatively show that the plaintiff is free from fault; otherwise he cannot recover. If you should find from the evidence that the defendant was negligent, but that the plaintiff had a clear chance to avoid the defendant's negligence, but assumed the risk to himself occasioned thereby, such conduct on the part of the plaintiff is not merely contributory negligence, which will lessen the amount of his recovery, but is such a failure to avoid danger as will defeat his right to recover at all." With regard to the argumentative instruction that the jury are the judges of the facts, and must apply the facts to the law as pronounced by the court, we have only to observe that it is perfectly proper for a judge to remind the jury that in civil cases they are bound to take the law from the court, but a trial judge should not be forced by a written request in every case to enter into an argumentative statement of the reasons upon which the rule rests. We see nothing in the case which would suggest a cautionary instruction. An accurate and clear statement of a legal principle, either in the concrete or the abstract, may possibly become obscured by an extended philosophical disquisition on the rationale of the principle. In so far as the other requests were correct and applicable, they were covered by the general charge. The charge in its entirety was comprehensive, fair, and impartial, and presented the law appropriate to the case.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

CHURCHILL v. JACKSON.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. May 15, 1909.)

1. DOMICILE (§ 5*)—OPERATION OF LAW—INFANT.

It appearing that the maternal grandparents of a child of tender years had taken charge of the child and carried it from the county of its mother's domicile at the time of the latter's death, the death of the father of the child antedating that of its mother, and it further appearing that subsequently, as a result of habeas corpus proceedings instituted by the paternal grandfather of the child, custody of the child was awarded to the maternal grandfather, and that the latter, while having custody of the child, made application to the ordinary of the county of his residence for appointment as guardian of the person of the child, a finding against the ground of the caveat to such application for guardianship, on the ground that the ordinary of that county did not have jurisdiction to pass upon the application, was demanded.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Domicile, Cent. Dig. § 28; Dec. Dig. § 5.*]

2. GUARDIAN AND WARD (§ 13*)—PROCEEDINGS FOR APPOINTMENT—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

An exemplification of the record in a habeas corpus proceeding instituted to recover the custody of the child referred to above was properly admitted in evidence, to be considered solely in passing upon the question of the domicile of the child.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Guardian and Ward, Cent. Dig. § 45; Dec. Dig. § 13.*]

3. GUARDIAN AND WARD (§ 13*)—PROCEEDINGS FOR APPOINTMENT—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

The jury trying the case had upon them the duty of looking to the interest and advantages of the child, the guardianship of whose person was involved in the case; and consequently evidence as to the financial condition of the applicant and his wife, who were the grandfather and grandmother of the child in question, was not irrelevant, and was properly admitted for the consideration of the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Guardian and Ward, Cent. Dig. § 45; Dec. Dig. § 13.*]

4. EVIDENCE (§ 471*)—OPINION EVIDENCE—PROPER PARTIES TO RAISE CHILD.

It was error for the court to permit a witness to testify that "Mr. and Mrs. Jackson [the applicant and his wife] are proper parties to raise and bring up a female grandchild." It was competent for the witness to detail and describe the facts and circumstances which tended to show the fitness of the applicant for the guardianship of the child, but not to state his opinion. The jurors should have been left to form their conclusions from the facts stated in evidence, untrammelled by the opinion of the witness himself.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 2149, 2150; Dec. Dig. § 471.*]

5. WILLS (§ 421*)—PROBATE—COLLATERAL ATTACK.

The will of the father of the child in question, which had previously been admitted to probate, having been offered in evidence, it was not competent to collaterally attack the same.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. § 904; Dec. Dig. § 421.*]

6. GUARDIAN AND WARD (§ 13*)—PROCEEDINGS FOR APPOINTMENT—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

Testimony of the wife of the applicant, to the effect that her daughter "gave her [the child] to me," was admissible for consideration by the jury in the trial of the issues in this case.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Guardian and Ward, Cent. Dig. § 45; Dec. Dig. § 13.*]

7. EVIDENCE (§ 107*)—FINANCIAL CONDITION—ADMISSIBILITY.

Where the financial condition of the resident of any county in this state is material to be considered, an exemplification of the tax digest, properly certified by the clerk of the court of ordinary, is admissible in evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 200; Dec. Dig. § 107.*]

8. GUARDIAN AND WARD (§ 11*)—TESTAMENTARY GUARDIAN—GUARDIAN OF PERSON.

An item of a will in the following language: "I hereby appoint my father, C. N. Churchill, guardian of my child, to hold, control, and manage the property given her during her minority; and he shall not be required to give bond or security for the performance of such trust"—was properly held by the court below to have the effect of appointing C. N. Churchill the testamentary guardian of the property only, and not the person, of the child referred to.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Guardian and Ward, Cent. Dig. § 38; Dec. Dig. § 11.*]

9. NO OTHER ERROR.

No other reversible errors than those which have been ruled upon above are made to appear in the record.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Jefferson County; B. T. Rawlings, Judge.

Application by W. A. Jackson for the guardianship of Anna Kate Churchill, a minor. C. N. Churchill filed a caveat to the application. From a judgment for applicant, the caveator brings error. Reversed.

B. F. Walker, Phillips & Phillips, and Hines & Jordan, for plaintiff in error. R. L. Gamble and Cain & Hardeman, for defendant in error.

BECK, J. This is a contest for the guardianship of the person of Anna Kate Churchill, the minor child of Stanley and Pearl Churchill. W. A. Jackson, the applicant for the guardianship, is the maternal grandfather of this child, and C. N. Churchill, who caveated this application, and who asked to be appointed her guardian, is the paternal grandfather. Upon the trial the jury returned a verdict for the applicant, and the caveator moved for a new trial. The motion having been overruled, he excepted.

1. The first ground of the caveat is that "Anna Kate Churchill is not a resident of Jefferson county, but is a resident of Warren county, this state; and therefore this court is without jurisdiction to grant such guardianship, but Warren court of ordinary is the proper and only court that can pass upon such application and appoint a guardian for said Anna Kate Churchill." The plaintiff in error insists that the verdict against him upon this ground is contrary to law and without evidence to support it. At the time of the death of the mother of the child in question, the mother, who was a widow and survived her husband only a few weeks, was a resident of Warren county, as was also the husband, Stanley Churchill, at the time of his death. Consequently there can be no question that at the time of the death of the mother the domicile of Anna Kate Churchill was in Warren county. But custody of her was taken by her maternal grandfather and grandmother, by whom she was carried from Warren county to Jefferson county, and subsequently, upon habeas corpus proceedings having been sued out by C. N. Churchill to recover possession and custody of the child, her custody was awarded to the defendant in error in this case; and we are of the opinion that thenceforward, and until lawfully changed again, the last-mentioned county was the county of the child's domicile. In the case of Hayslip v. Gillis, 123 Ga. 266, 51 S. E. 326, it is said: "Moreover, in that case [Darden v. Wyatt, 15 Ga. 414], the grandfather of the minors took them from the county of the domicile of their deceased father and carried them to his home in another county, there to live with him; whereas, as we have shown, the minor in the present case was carried from the county of her deceased father's domicile and cared for by persons who were not her kin. Therefore, if the court had broadly held in the Darden Case, as, perhaps, it might properly have done (see Lamar v. Micou, 114 U. S. 218, 55 Sup. Ct. 857, 29 L. Ed. 94) that the grandfather of an infant whose parents are both dead may change the domicile of the infant from one county to another, so as to vest in the ordinary of the latter county jurisdiction to appoint a guardian, such a decision would not have been contrary to the case at bar, for the reason just indicated." The father and the mother of the infant of tender years both being dead, and custody of the child having been taken by the maternal grandfather, there being no nearer kin, and that custody having been solemnly adjudged to be proper and fit, and having been continued by the judgment of the court which had jurisdiction of the matter, it would seem that the place of the domicile of those to whom the custody of the child was awarded under these circumstances became the domicile of the child.

2. The exemplification of the record in the habeas corpus proceedings, which resulted in a judgment awarding the custody of the child in question to the defendant in error here, was properly admitted in evidence, in order that it might be considered by the jury in passing upon the question of the domicile of the infant, the right to whose custody was involved in the habeas corpus proceedings. But it was admissible only for the purpose indicated, and the jury should have been restricted by proper instructions from the court, directing them to give effect to this evidence only in passing upon that particular issue.

3. The applicant, as a witness for himself in this case, was permitted to testify, over the objection of caveator, that "my wife and myself are worth more than $1,000." The objection urged was that this evidence is irrelevant. Inasmuch as the jury trying the case had upon them the duty of looking to the interest and advantages of the child, the guardianship of whose person was involved in this case, evidence as to the financial condition of the applicant and his wife, who were the grandfather and grandmother of the child in question, was not irrelevant but was pertinent to the issues involved. This evidence was pertinent and material, and the objection was properly overruled. Walton v. Twiggs, 91 Ga. 90, 16 S. E. 813.

4. Error is assigned upon the ruling of the court permitting C. A. Matthews, a witness for applicant, to testify, over the objection of caveator, that "Mr. and Mrs. W. A. Jackson are proper parties to raise and bring up a female grandchild." The objection urged to this evidence is based on the ground that it stated merely the conclusion and opinion of the witness. The exception was well taken, and the objection urged to the evidence just stated should have been sustained. Although the witness testified to the facts and circumstances upon which his opinion was based, when he was permitted to state his opinion and his conclusion, he was permitted to exercise and perform the function and duty of the jury. The witness should have been confined to a statement of the facts illustrating the question as to whether or not Mr. and Mrs. Jackson were "proper parties to raise and bring up a female grandchild," and the jury should have been left free to consider those facts, unrestricted by any expressed opinion of the witness as to whether or not it followed, from the testimony of this particular witness, and others who were called to testify as to the same issue, that the applicant and his wife were suitable persons to be intrusted with the rearing of the child. "The opinion of a witness is not admissible in evidence, when all the facts and circumstances are capable of being clearly detailed and described, so the jurors may be able readily to form correct conclusions therefrom." Mayor, etc., v. Wood, 114 Ga. 370, 40 S. E. 239. Of course, there are exceptions recognized by law to this rule; but the issue involved here does not fall within any of the exceptions. In the case of Moore v. Dozier, 128 Ga. 90, 57 S. E. 110, it is said: "Evidence touching the character, conduct, and reputation for lewdness of the mother, and other evidence tending to throw light on the question at issue, was admissible; but it was not competent for witnesses to testify generally that they thought that the mother was an unfit person to rear her children." What we have said above in regard to the opinion evidence of the witness Matthews is applicable also to that of the evidence of several other witnesses, who were permitted to give in evidence their opinion touching the fitness of Mr. Jackson for taking charge of and rearing his little grandchild. Testimony of this character should have been excluded, and the court erred in overruling the objections thereto.

5. In another ground of the motion for a new trial it is complained that "the court erred in permitting counsel for the applicant, over the objection of counsel for caveator, to have C. N. Churchill, a witness for himself, to testify as follows: 'I don't know, sir, who drew this will for my son. He had it drawn. I know who drew the will. This is the original. I drew that will. There was two wills. There was a copy. That is the will that I drew from the copy. I don't know who drew the copy. I can't tell you. My son had the copy, and I drew that other one from that copy. As to whether or not this will is mine, and not his—no, sir; that is not true. I did not write this will. It was probably a week, or probably more, before my son's death, that he signed this will.' Caveator objected to this testimony, on the grounds that it was irrelevant, and because the will of Stanley Churchill, which had been probated, could not be attacked in this way." It is apparent that the ruling here complained of was error. The only effect such testimony could have had would have been to show the invalidity of the will, and this was neither the time nor place for such an attack upon the will. When the will was offered for probate, the issue of devisavit vel non might have been raised, and the conduct and conscience of the witness might have been probed in an effort to ascertain before a competent tribunal whether the will which was offered for probate was actually the will of Stanley Churchill, or his father, C. N. Churchill, the witness whose testimony we now have under consideration. But the will had been probated, and the time for an attack of this character upon it had passed.

6. The court did not err in permitting Mrs. Jackson, the wife of the applicant, to testify, in answer to a question as to how she came into possession of the child, that "my daughter gave her to me." The question and answer were objected to on the ground that the testimony was irrelevant; but we are of the opinion that it was a circumstance proper to be considered by the jury in the trial of the issues in this case. Watson v. Warnock, 31 Ga. 715.

7. Where the financial condition of the resident of any county in this state is material to be considered, an exemplification of the tax digest, properly certified by the clerk of the court of ordinary, is admissible in evidence. See, in this connection, the case of Clark v. Empire Lumber Co., 87 Ga. 744, 13 S. E. 826, and cases there cited.

8. The ninth item of the will of Stanley Churchill is as follows: "I hereby appoint my father, C. N. Churchill, guardian of my child, to hold, control, and manage the property given her during her minority; and he shall not be required to give bond or security for the performance of such trust." This item of the will was properly held by the court below to have the effect of appointing C. N. Churchill the testamentary guardian of the property only, and not of the person, of the child referred to. The contrary instruction, which was requested in writing by counsel for plaintiff in error, was properly refused.

9. No other reversible errors than those which we have indicated are made to appear in this record. The evidence was conflicting; and, as the case is remanded for another trial, we, of course, refrain from any expression as to the weight of the evidence as shown in this record.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur.

2. INSURANCE (§ 539*)—SICK BENEFIT—NOTICE OF SICKNESS—FAILURE TO GIVE—EXCUSE.

Where the insured was suddenly stricken with some disease of the brain, which rendered him unconscious, and made it impossible for him to give to the company written notice of his sickness within the time stipulated, this fact was legally sufficient to excuse him from a compliance with this condition of the policy during the existence of such disability.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. § 1334; Dec. Dig. § 539.*]

3. INSURANCE (§ 539*)—SICK BENEFIT—NOTICE OF SICKNESS—FAILURE TO GIVE—EXCUSE.

Although the time in which the insured shall give to the company notice of his sickness is fixed by the contract, if his sickness makes a literal compliance impossible, he will be excused for the failure, if he complies with his contract in this respect within a reasonable time after it becomes possible for him to do so, or within the time stipulated after the cause preventing compliance ceases to exist.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. § 1334; Dec. Dig. § 539.*]

4. INSURANCE (§ 646*)—SICK BENEFIT—ACTIONS—BURDEN OF PROOF.

The burden is on the insured to excuse his failure to comply with the plain, unambiguous terms of his contract. In this case the insured did not successfully carry this burden, and the evidence affirmatively shows that he failed to exercise reasonable diligence in complying with the terms of the contract requiring him to give written notice to the insurance company of the commencement of the sickness for which he claimed a benefit.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

QUESTIONS FOR JURY.

In construing contracts of insurance, the substance should be preserved and the intention of the parties effected regardless of immaterial stipulations. If it is the purpose of the contract to furnish indemnity against loss, it is to be presumed that conditions subsequent in a contract of insurance will be limited to those objects which were in the contemplation of the parties when making the contract. Insurance is designed to afford proper protection, and not to provide for profitable speculation. In my opinion, it is for the jury to say from the facts and circumstances adduced in evidence whether the conditions subsequent in a policy of insurance are immaterial or material, and, if material, whether they were reasonably complied with; and therefore, it was for the jury to say whether the notice of the insured's sickness was given the company within a reasonable time. The evidence was sufficient, in my judgment, to support the verdict of the jury and to authorize their finding that the insured complied with his contract within a reasonable time after it became possible for him to do so.

(Per Russell, J., dissenting.)

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; W. D. Ellis, Judge.

Action by O. H. Watson against the North American Accident Insurance Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Tye, Peeples, Bryan & Jordan, for plaintiff in error. Smith, Hammond & Smith and F. L. Neufville, for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. Watson sued the North American Insurance Company in a justice's court for $100, claimed as a sick benefit under a policy issued to him by the company. He obtained a judgment for the full amount, and on appeal to the superior court the jury found a verdict in his favor for this amount. The company filed a motion for a new trial, which was overruled. The insurance company defended on the sole ground that the plaintiff had forfeited his right to the sick benefit claimed by him under the policy because of his failure to comply with the following express condition thereof: "Written notice of any injury, fatal or nonfatal, or of any sickness for which claim can be made, shall be given to the company at its home office at Chicago, within ten days of the occurrence of the accident or commencement of the sickness, and failure to give such written notice within ten days from the date when it becomes possible to give such notice of injury, or, in case of sickness, within ten days from date of commencement of sickness, shall invalidate any and all claims under this policy." The company admitted that it had received written notice from the plaintiff of his sickness, but claimed that this notice had not been received by it either at its home office in Chicago or elsewhere within 10 days from the commencement of the plaintiff's sickness as required by this stipulation of the policy. The plaintiff replied to this defense by the allegation that he had been providentially prevented from giving the written notice within the 10 days because of mental and physical incapacity caused by his sickness, and that, after he had recovered sufficiently to give the notice required by this condition of his policy, he did so with all reasonable and proper diligence. By an amendment to his petition he alleged that the company had waived his failure to give the notice within the time stipulated, by sending to him, through its agent, a blank form for the purpose of having him prepare and send the notice to it, which he did as soon as he received the blank. The question for decision arises on the construction of this condition of the contract.

Some authorities hold that, where the language is plain and unambiguous and mandatory in its character, its terms cannot be enlarged by judicial construction, but demand strict compliance with the letter of the contract, and that liability cannot in any event survive a failure to comply literally with its requirements in this respect. Gamble v. Accident Assurance Company, 4 Ir. R. O. L. 204; Patton v. Employers' Liability Assurance Corporation, 20 Law Rep. (Ir.) 93. Other authorities take a more liberal view, and hold that stipulations as to time in which notice of injury, loss, or sickness for which indemnity is claimed is required to be given are not necessarily and in every instance to be literally complied with in order to prevent a forfeiture of the policy. Unless these provisions are expressly stipulated to be conditions precedent, they should be treated as conditions subsequent and given a liberal construction in favor of the beneficiary of the policy to prevent a forfeiture. The condition that notice shall be given operates upon the contract of insurance only subsequent to the fact of loss, injury, or sickness, and it should therefore receive a liberal and reasonable construction in favor of the beneficiary under the contract. Niblack on Accident Insurance and Benefit Societies, § 417; Woodmen Accident Association v. Pratt, 62 Neb. 673, 87 N. W. 546, 55 L. R. A. 291, 89 Am. St. Rep. 777. It is settled by an overwhelming weight of authority that where the failure to give prompt notice is not due to the negligence of the insured or beneficiary, but such compliance has been prevented and rendered impossible by an act of God, this would furnish a sufficient legal excuse for the delay in giving the stipulated notice, and this doctrine has been applied in cases in which a specified time for the giving of the notice has been fixed by the contract. The theory of these cases, as stated by Cooley (4 Briefs on the Law of Insurance, 3482), is that "it could not have been in the contemplation of the parties that if the insured, who was required to give the notice, was unable to do so by reason of the very accident against which indemnity was given, he should therefore lose such indemnity through no fault of his own." Reed v. Loyal Protective Association (Mich.) 117 N. W. 600; 37 Insurance Law Journal, 1024; Brown v. Fraternal Accident Association, 18 Utah, 265, 55 Pac. 63; Comstock v. Fraternal Accident Association, 116 Wis. 382, 93 N. W. 22; Hayes v. Continental Casualty Co., 98 Mo. App. 410, 72 S. W. 135; Insurance Company v. Boykin, 12 Wall. 433, 20 L. Ed. 442; Woodmen Accident Association v. Pratt, 62 Neb. 674, 87 N. W. 546, 55 L. R. A. 291, 89 Am. St. Rep. 777. The Supreme Court of Georgia in the case of United Benefit Society v. Freeman, 111 Ga. 355, 36 S. E. 764, in a policy where the condition as to notice to be given was expressly stipulated to be a condition precedent, clearly recognizes that impossibility of performance by the insured would be a sufficient legal excuse for a failure to give the notice within the time required by the terms of the policy. In that case the court holds, however, that the evidence was not sufficient to support the finding that it was impossible for the plaintiff to give the notice to the society within ten days from the date of his injury. We deduce the proposition from the authorities cited that where the insured is suddenly stricken with some disease of the brain which renders him unconscious, and makes it impossible for him to give to the company within the time stipulated written notice of his sickness, this fact is legally sufficient to excuse him from a compliance with this condition of the policy during the existence of such disability. We are also of the opinion that, although the time in which the insured should give to the company written notice of his sickness is fixed, if the sickness itself makes a literal compliance impossible, giving the notice required within a reasonable time after it becomes possible to do so, or within the time stipulated after the cause preventing prior compliance has ceased to exist, would be sufficient to prevent a forfeiture. McFarland v. U. S. Mutual Accident Association, 124 Mo. 204, 27 S. W. 436; Woodmen Accident Association v. Pratt, supra. The questions of the sufficiency of the excuse offered, and the diligence of the beneficiary in giving the notice after the removal of the disability, are generally questions of fact, to be determined by the jury, according to the nature and circumstances of each individual case.

The material facts in the case now under consideration are not controverted. On July 20, 1907, the insured, while walking on the streets in Macon, was suddenly stricken with some disease of the brain which rendered him unconscious. He was taken to a hospital, where he remained under constant treatment for 16 days. During the first five days he was totally unconscious, the remainder of the time he had lucid intervals, but, according to the testimony of his physician, during the entire 16 days he was incapable of transacting any business. On August 5th he was sufficiently restored to be removed to his home, some 10 miles in the country. According to his own testimony, as soon as he arrived at his home, he sent for his family physician, and on the next day after his arrival he secured his policy, with a blank copy of the notice required to be given of his sickness, and asked the physician to aid him in making it out by filling in the statement to be made as to his condition by his attending physician. The doctor suggested that the physician who had attended him while he was in the hospital in Macon was the proper one to make this statement, and, acting on this suggestion, the blank was inclosed and sent through the mail to this physician at Macon, with the request that he complete it and return it to the insured. The insured further testified that he did not hear from the physician in Macon for some time, and he thereupon wrote him a letter asking the cause of the delay, and received a reply stating that the blank notice had been misplaced. It does not appear definitely in the testimony how long the insured waited before writing this second letter to the physician in Macon, but it is fairly deducible from the testimony that he did wait for several weeks, for he testified that immediately on hearing from the physician he wrote to the agent of the company at Atlanta on the 29th of August, requesting him to send him another blank notice, which notice he received on the 30th of August, and that he thereupon filled out the notice and mailed it to the company at Chicago, and it was received by the company on the 9th of September. It therefore appears that the company did not receive the stipulated notice for a period of 50 days from the time the insured was first stricken with the sickness for which he claimed the benefit. It is clearly established by the evidence that he was mentally and physically incapable of transacting any business or complying with the condition of the policy as to the notice during the first 16 days after his sickness and while he was in the hospital in Macon, but it does not appear that this disability continued to exist after his arrival at his home on August 5th. It does appear from his own evidence that, immediately on his arrival at home, he realized the importance of sending the notice to the company, and undertook to do so. It is reasonable, therefore, to infer that he was mentally and physically capable of complying with this stipulation of his contract from the time of his arrival at home on August 5th to the time when he did actually comply with it by sending the notice which was received by the company on September 9th. Whether he exercised all reasonable diligence during this time in complying with the requirements of his policy would be a question for determination by the jury, if, under his own testimony, there was any doubt on the question. It is true he states generally that for the entire 10 weeks of his sickness he was unable to attend to business, and was really not able to attend to business when he did return to his work on September 28th; but this general conclusion of his cannot overcome the specific facts stated by him showing that he was mentally and physically able to attend to the giving of the notice to the company under his contract; for, as a matter of fact, he did send the notice to his physician at Macon on August 6th. No reason appears why he could not have sent this notice directly to the company. It does not appear that any special form of notice was necessary. The condition of the policy simply required that written notice of his sickness should be given to the company at Chicago. It seems, too, that he was guilty of laches in waiting for at least three weeks to hear from the physician in Macon before writing to him to know the cause of the delay. He does not give any reason why it was necessary for him to wait so long a time. The law imposed upon him the burden of showing, by a preponderance of the evidence, that he was incapable, mentally or physically, of complying with this requirement of his policy from the time that he was taken sick to the time when he did actually comply with it by sending the notice. It was his duty to show, to the satisfaction of the jury, that he was incapable, on account of his physical or mental condition, of giving this notice, either within 10 days after his disability to do so had been removed, which was the measure of diligence agreed on by the parties to the contract, or, at least, that in the exercise of all reasonable diligence, he could not have done so sooner than when he did actually give the notice as required by his contract. The defense set up in this case cannot be regarded as purely technical. There are substantial reasons why notice of the commencement of the sickness within the time stipulated, or, at least, within a reasonable time thereafter, would be important to the company for the purpose of determining its liability for the benefit claimed. While this court is reluctant to adopt any construction of an insurance contract which would deprive the insured of the benefits of his policy, and will not do so unless convinced that such construction is demanded by the law and the evidence, under the facts of this case, we are clearly of the opinion that the plaintiff not only failed to carry the burden which the law imposed upon him, but did, by his own testimony, affirmatively show that he failed to comply with the plain, unambiguous terms of his contract without a sufficient legal excuse.

There is no evidence whatever that the company waived a performance by the plaintiff of this condition of the contract. The only evidence relied upon by the plaintiff as showing a waiver is the fact that the company's agent at Atlanta sent him a blank for the purpose of giving the notice; but it is undisputed that the agent did not know that the plaintiff had been sick, or that he had not given the notice as required when he sent the blank in compliance with his request. In his letter to the agent asking for a blank, the plaintiff did not inform him even that he had been sick, and in the letter there was no intimation given to the agent that the plaintiff had forfeited the benefits of his policy by a failure to comply with any of its conditions.

Judgment reversed.

POWELL, J. (specially concurring). I agree that the condition as to notice is prima facie reasonable. I agree that the time during which the insured by reason of his mental incapacity was prevented from sending the notice is not to be counted as a part of the 10 days. I think, however, that when he had had 10 days after excluding from the calculation the period of his mental or physical incapacity to send the notice, and had not sent it, his right to sue on the policy ended.

RUSSELL, J. (dissenting). I concur in the propositions stated in the first three head notes, but I cannot agree to set aside the finding of the jury in this case upon a question which it was their sole province to determine. It is conceded in the opinion of the majority that the stipulation of the contract which affords the insurance company its sole excuse for claiming a forfeiture of the sick benefits which the jury found that the defendant in error was entitled to recover (to wit, the condition that "written notice of any injury, fatal or nonfatal, or of any sickness for which claim can be made, shall be given to the company at its home office at Chicago within ten days of the occurrence of the accident or commencement of the sickness, and failure to give such written notice * * * in case of sickness, within ten days from the date of commencement of sickness, shall invalidate any and all claims under this policy") must be treated as a condition subsequent, and not as a condition precedent, nor as an essential warranty on the part of the insured. In Southern Life Insurance Company v. Wilkinson, 53 Ga. 536, the Supreme Court held that, if there was any variation in the conditions of the policy which changed the nature or extent or character of the risk, failure to fulfill the conditions would avoid the policy, but held, further, in the sixth division of the opinion that "the question as to giving notice of the death of the person whose life was insured to the company within a reasonable time was one for the jury, under proper instructions, to be given in the charge, and was not to be absolutely passed upon by the court." And the court ruled that it was not error to refuse to charge the jury as requested by the insurance company that a delay for several months to give notice of the death of the party whose life was insured would be failure to give notice in a reasonable time. I conceive the proper rule as to conditions subsequent in a policy of insurance, such as to give notice similar to that embodied in the contract now under consideration, to be that the stipulation will be held to be complied with if there is compliance within a reasonable time, and that the jury are the sole judges as to whether such conditions subsequent have been reasonably complied with. Unlike conditions precedent, conditions subsequent, embodied in a contract of insurance, do not affect the nature, extent, or character of the risk; and, if the conditions precedent or warranties on the part of the insured are shown to have been fulfilled, and the insured has paid all the premiums which by his contract he has been required to pay, no construction should be indulged which would enable the insurer, by the use of an unsubstantial technicality, to defeat an honest claim of the insured to the indemnity promised him by the contract. The great learning of Judge Bleckley was never more pithily expressed than in the statement: "Insurance is business, and not elaborate and expensive trifling." Mobile Fire Department Insurance Co. v. Coleman, 58 Ga. 257.

In this case my Brethren, conceding that the evidence shows that the insured could not give the stipulated notice within the 10 days required by the contract, and admitting that within a certain period thereafter a notice would have been efficacious, nevertheless hold that the notice given by the insured at a later period by a few days comes too late, and the insured's benefits must be lost to him because notice was not given 3 weeks sooner. Of what materiality is this stipulation? If it be reasonable at all, especially as to the requirement which requires notice of a fatal accident to be given within 10 days or else the benefits will be lost (although no one but the deceased may know that he has a policy, and it may not be discovered for more than ten days after his death by accident), and if it be conceded that there may be instances of reasonable cause for delay, and that notice may be given after the 10 days which can properly be held to have been given within a reasonable time, then it seems to me clear that it is for the jury, and for the jury alone, judging the question by the peculiar facts of the special case before them, to determine whether the condition has been so substantially complied with as to render the fact that it was not sooner complied with immaterial. In my opinion (based upon that of Chief Justice Bleckley), when one pays his money for insurance, whether it be life, fire, or accident insurance, and the bona fides of his claim for indemnity under the contract of insurance cannot be questioned, no stipulation of the contract which is immaterial in the ascertainment of the honesty and justness of the claim should be permitted to defeat his just demand. If it be said that the purpose of the notice is to give the insurer an opportunity of ascertaining whether the insured was really sick, and the notice confessedly was not given until after the insured was well, how can it be said that the rights of the insurance company were materially affected by the notice having been given three weeks and four days after the insured recovered from his sickness, rather than two days after he had actually recovered? As said by Judge Bleckley in the Coleman Case, supra: "The Code governs the contract, and the construction of the Code is settled, to the effect that what is wholly immaterial to the risk is so utterly immaterial that the yea or nay of it will not render the policy void. If this be the true meaning of the Code, even an express stipulation by the parties that the validity of the policy shall depend upon immaterial as well as material matters is, at bottom, an attempt to repeal the law. Such a stipulation is itself immaterial in the sense of being idle and nugatory. The Code, instead of relegating to the parties the subject of materiality, holds possession of it for rational and honest adjudication by the tribunals of the country. Whoever makes a contract of insurance in this state must submit to have its force and effect governed by the statutory provisions applicable to that class of contracts. There is a public policy involved in standing by substance. Insurance is business, and not elaborate and expensive trifling. Of course, what is in any degree material should be allowed its due effect; but the absolutely immaterial should count for nothing." This was the criterion established by the Supreme Court for determining as to the binding force even of representations of the assured warranted to be true. And much less then should a condition subsequent, which, in my view, is utterly immaterial to the validity of the contract, and which does not touch its substance, be permitted to defeat a claim whose honesty is unchallenged, and whose merit has been asserted by the solemn verdict of a jury. If Watson had never given any notice, and the circumstances had been such as to authorize the jury to find that he was not excused therefrom, the circumstance that he had failed to give the notice might tend to discredit the bona fides of his claim, but mere failure to give notice could not defeat it if a jury was authorized to find, and did find, that the circumstances were such as that he was excused from giving notice. I think that the jury were as much authorized to find that Watson (whom the evidence does not show to have been well, although convalescent) was as much to be relieved from literal compliance with the stipulation in regard to the 10-days notice at the time when the notice was finally sent as he could properly have been excused (according to the opinion of my Brethren) at the time that he first sent the notice to the physician. As to whether the notice, if ever given, was given in a reasonable time, was a question purely for the jury, and their finding, approved by the learned trial judge, meets my hearty concurrence. If it is the purpose of a contract of insurance to honestly furnish indemnity against loss, the substance of the contract should be preserved, regardless of immaterial technical stipulations. It is not to be supposed that it was within the contemplation of the parties to this contract of insurance that an honest claim for indemnity, purchased by the insured's payment of the required premiums for that sole purpose, should be defeated because of noncompliance with stipulations designed solely for the protection of the insurer against fraud, and where it could not be contended that compliance would either increase or diminish the true amount to which the beneficiary would be entitled in return for the premiums. Insurance premiums are not designed wholly for the profit of the insurer, but also partly for the protection of the insured. The presumption may be indulged that the insurer caused conditions subsequent to be ingrafted for his proper protection against fraud, but if provisions are inserted which apparently can serve no purpose other than to afford an excuse to defeat a liability which, according to the substance of the contract, is just, such stipulation should be disregarded as immoral, illegal, and void. In construing the condition subsequent in a contract of insurance, it can properly be assumed that proper protection, and not profitable speculation, was what was within the contemplation of the parties at the time of the contract.

GARBUTT LUMBER CO. v. WALKER et al.
(No. 1,590.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. May 18, 1909.)

1. FRAUD (§§ 20, 46*)—RELIANCE ON FALSE REPRESENTATION—ACTIONS—DECLARATION—SUFFICIENCY.

There was no error in sustaining the demurrer and dismissing the plaintiff's petition. To recover in an action for deceit, it must appear, not only that the representation made was false, to the knowledge of the party making it, but that the plaintiff parted with his money on the faith of the false representation. A declaration which fails to allege that the plaintiff parted with his money on the faith of the false representation is totally defective.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Fraud, Cent. Dig. §§ 17, 41; Dec. Dig. §§ 20, 46.*]

2. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS (§ 100*)—FRAUD—DISCOVERY—REASONABLE DILIGENCE.

Under the allegations of the petition, the suit was barred by the statute of limitations. The rule laid down in section 3785 of the Civil Code of 1895, to the effect that in cases of fraud the period of limitation shall run only from the time of its discovery, does not operate in favor of a plaintiff who might, by the exercise of ordinary diligence, have made such discovery. The petition now under review makes a case where the exercise of such diligence would have resulted in discovering the defendant's alleged fraud, if any there was, and states no sufficient or satisfactory reason or excuse for the plaintiff's failure to use such diligence. Consequently there was no error in dismissing the action. Little v. Reynolds, 101 Ga. 594, 28 S. E. 919 (1) (2).

MOSES v. STATE. (No. 1,842.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. May 18, 1909.)

1. ARREST (§ 70*)—DUTY TO BRING BEFORE JUDICIAL OFFICER.

An officer, arresting under a warrant, should exercise reasonable diligence in bringing the person arrested before a judicial officer authorized to examine, commit, or receive bail. While the officer has authority to imprison the person arrested before commitment trial, he should not do so arbitrarily and without reasonable cause.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Blakely; W. A. Jordan, Judge.

Whit Moses was convicted of resisting an officer, in violation of Pen. Code 1895, § 306, and he brings error. Reversed.

Moses was convicted of a violation of section 306 of the Penal Code of 1895 which is in the following language: “If any person shall knowingly and willfully obstruct, resist, or oppose any officer of this state, or other person duly authorized, in serving, or attempting to serve or execute, any lawful process, or order, * * * he shall be guilty of a misdemeanor.” The evidence, briefly stated, is as follows: The deputy sheriff of the county of Early arrested Moses under a warrant, duly issued by a justice of the peace, charging him with the offense of wife-beating. Moses made no resistance, but took the arresting officer in his buggy and drove with him to the jail. When Moses was arrested, a white citizen in the store where he was arrested offered to the deputy sheriff to then and there go upon his bond. The officer refused to take bond. This same citizen thereupon went to the courthouse, saw the sheriff of the county, and told him that he wanted to go on the defendant's bond. The sheriff made no objection to the bondsman offered, but refused to take bond at all. When the defendant and the deputy sheriff reached the jail, the officer ordered him to get out of the buggy and go into the jail, whereupon the defendant began cursing and said that he would not go to jail. The officer took hold of him, and he tried to jerk loose from the officer, and said he was not going to jail; that he had done nothing for which to go to jail. He tried to jerk loose from the officer two or three times, and the officer called upon a negro bystander to assist him in putting the defendant in jail. The defendant made no threat of violence, and did not attempt in any way to assault the officer. When the officer first commanded him to go into the jail, and he refused, the officer left him and went into the jail, got his pistol, and returned with it; the defendant remaining quietly outside until the officer returned. The evidence further showed that the city court of Blakely was then in session at the courthouse near the jail, and several justices of the peace, including the one who issued the warrant, were easily accessible to the arresting officer. The arrest was in the daytime, and no reason whatever was shown why the defendant should have been imprisoned before a commitment trial, nor why he was not taken before some judicial officer of the state for this purpose, by the arresting officer. The record shows the exceptional and remarkable fact—in a criminal case—that the plaintiff in error paid the cost of his appeal and did not resort to a pauper's affidavit.

Pottle & Glessner, for plaintiff in error.
Walter Park, Sol., for the State.

HILL, C. J. (after stating the facts as above). We do not think that the plaintiff in error, under the facts, was guilty of a violation of the Code section above quoted. The words of the statute, “obstruct, resist, or oppose,” imply force as a necessary element of the resistance. It will be noted that the defendant, when he was arrested, made no resistance at all, but got into his own buggy and carried the officer with him to the jail. This pacific conduct of the defendant was probably induced by the impression that his white friend would go on his bond, if it became necessary, and that he would have a preliminary investigation. It was quite reasonable that he should have had such an impression. The law made it the duty of the officer arresting to take the defendant with reasonable diligence before the judicial officer who issued the warrant, or some other judicial officer authorized to examine, commit, or receive bail, for the purpose of a preliminary investigation. Of course, an arresting officer would have the right, in a proper case, to imprison a defendant before a preliminary investigation, if it was necessary to do so for his safe-keeping before or pending such investigation. But in the present case no reason is assigned for the exercise of this right by the officer. Not only was the city court in session, but there were other judicial officers, easily accessible, all of whom were fully authorized to examine, commit, or receive bail in the case. The imprisonment of the defendant, therefore, by the officer, seems to have been without warrant and arbitrary.

The defendant did not resist his arrest. Neither did he forcibly resist the attempt to imprison him without reasonable cause. He simply protested against his unreasonable imprisonment, and emphasized his natural objection to being incarcerated under the circumstances, by refusing to voluntarily go into the jail. Under all the circumstances, we think the defendant's conduct was neither unwarranted nor unlawful, and that his conviction was unauthorized. He seems to be a negro of some property and character. He owned his horse and buggy, paid the costs of his appeal to this court, and has white friends anxious to go on his bond. These things, added to his natural repugnance to be put in jail without a preliminary investigation, furnished, in connection with the apparently arbitrary act of the officer, reasonable grounds for his vehement protest.

Judgment reversed.

BENNETT v. CENTRAL OF GEORGIA RY. CO. (No. 1,540.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. May 18, 1909.)

1. CARRIERS (§ 295*)—CARRIAGE OF PASSENGERS—INJURIES—NEGLIGENCE.

In a suit to recover damages for personal injuries received by a passenger from the sudden slamming of a car door by a servant of a railway company, in order to show a cause of action, it is not necessary to allege that the servant had actual knowledge of the dangerous position of the passenger at the time that the injuries were received, or that the act of the servant was intentional. Negligent ignorance on the part of the servant in connection with the act which caused the passenger's injury may be sufficient to warrant a recovery.

2. NEGLIGENCE (§ 108*)—ACTIONS—PETITION—SUFFICIENCY.

The allegations of the petition make the question of the defendant's negligence an issuable fact, and therefore the court erred in dismissing the petition on demurrer.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Savannah; Davis Freeman, Judge.

Action by Edgar Bennett, by next friend, against the Central of Georgia Railway Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

Oliver & Oliver, for plaintiff in error. H. W. Johnson, for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. Bennett sued the Central of Georgia Railway Company to recover damages for personal injuries. A demurrer, general and special, was sustained, and the petition dismissed. This judgment is the error assigned. The allegations of the petition to which the demurrer was directed, omitting mere formal parts, charges that on the afternoon of Saturday, June 6, 1908, petitioner was a passenger on a train of the Central of Georgia Railway Company, and was returning from Tybee to the city of Savannah. It became necessary for him to pass from the smoking car into the passenger car, and, in so doing, he approached the doorway of the passenger car. Just as he reached the door a flagman of the Central of Georgia Railway Company approached the door from the other side, opened it, and passed out. Petitioner stood aside for the purpose of permitting the flagman to pass. On account of the rapid motion of the train, and for the purpose of steadying himself and preventing himself from falling, or from being thrown from the platform, he placed his hand upon the facing of the doorway of the car, not knowing that his fingers extended to that portion of the door facing upon which the door shut. He could not see that his hand was in a dangerous position on account of the manner in which he was standing, and it was the only available place at that particular time which he could seize and hold for the purpose of steadying and holding himself on the platform. While he was so standing and holding the door facing with the end of his finger so extended in the door facing where the door slams, the flagman, seeing him so standing upon the platform, and seeing him holding to the side of the door, and knowing that petitioner's hand was in a dangerous position, or when in the exercise of ordinary care he could have known that petitioner's hand was in a dangerous position, forcibly and violently seized the knob of the door and shut it upon the end of petitioner's finger on the right hand, etc. Negligence is specifically charged in the following respects: (1) The flagman saw petitioner standing by the side of the door and holding it. He knew that petitioner's hand was in a dangerous position, and that, when he slammed the door, it would be caught and his finger mashed, or, if the flagman did not know these facts, by the exercise of ordinary and reasonable care he could have known them. (2) In willfully slamming the door on petitioner's finger. (3) The flagman permitted the door to slam on petitioner's finger, when, by the exercise of ordinary care, he could have prevented it. The special demurrer attacks the allegations on the subject of negligence contained in the second and third subparagraphs of the petition on the ground that they are mere conclusions of the pleader, without any facts stated upon which to base the conclusion that the flagman willfully slammed the door on petitioner's finger, or that the flagman could by the exercise of ordinary care have prevented the injury. The court required the plaintiff to amend so as to show actual knowledge by the flagman of the dangerous position of plaintiff's hand at the time he shut the door upon it. This amendment was not made.

Evidently the trial judge based his judgment upon the theory that no recovery could be had in the case, unless the evidence proved actual knowledge by the flagman when he slammed the door of the dangerous position of the plaintiff's hand on the door facing; in other words, that the act of the flagman in slamming the door on the plaintiff's hand must have been intentional or willful. We do not know upon what theory of the law this opinion is based. The Code of this state, embodying elementary principles of law, declares that "every person shall be liable for torts committed by his servant * * * within the scope of his business, whether the same be by negligence or voluntary." Civ. Code 1895, § 3817. And, where the master is a railway company and the party injured is a passenger, it imposes upon the former the duty of exercising, through its servants, agents, or employes, extraordinary care and diligence to prevent any injury to the latter. Civ. Code 1895, § 2266. This degree of care is imposed upon the servants of the railway company to prevent and protect passengers from all injuries, and makes the railway company responsible for any injury that the servant could have avoided by the exercise of such diligence. For a flagman or other servant of the company to negligently slam a car door on the hand of a passenger would make the company liable in damages, just as for any other negligent act by the servant within the scope of his employment.

The learned counsel for defendant in error insists that "the natural result of opening and closing a car door, which was made to open and close, and is constantly used for that purpose, would not be to cause injury to any one"; and hence he concludes: "Unless the employé of the company, when using the door in this natural manner, knew that the passenger's finger was placed in the opening so that the door would shut on it, negligence in the opening and closing of it could not be charged." We think his conclusion is a palpable legal non sequitur; for the employé, in closing the car door, is charged by law with the duty of exercising extraordinary care and diligence in opening and closing it so as to prevent any injury to a passenger; and negligent ignorance in connection with this act, from which a passenger receives an injury, is no exception to the general rule of liability on the part of the master. With reference to the special demurrer, the petition alleges specific facts upon which to base the conclusion that the flagman, by the exercise of that degree of care which the law imposed upon him, could have known of the perilous position of the plaintiff's hand at the time he opened and shut the door. In a suit to recover damages for injuries received as a result of the negligence of a servant of a railway company, the right to recover does not depend upon actual knowledge or willful or intentional conduct on the part of the servant. It may be based on actual knowledge or willful conduct, but negligent ignorance on the part of the servant of that which the law makes it his duty to know is all that is required. In safeguarding a passenger the law makes it the duty of the servant of the railway company to know every fact which by the exercise of extreme diligence he could discover.

To conclude, we think that the allegations of the petition are entirely sufficient to make the question of negligence by the flagman of the railway company an issuable fact, and that the court erred in sustaining the demurrer both on the general and special grounds. The questions in this case are fully covered by the decision of this court in Pacetti v. Central of Ga. Ry. Co. (No. 1660, recently decided) 64 S. E. 302.

LEWIS v. STATE. (No. 1,746.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. May 18, 1909.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 784*)—INSTRUCTIONS—CIRCUMSTANTIAL EVIDENCE.

In a criminal case, where the guilt of the defendant is dependent wholly upon circumstantial evidence, the jury should be instructed that, if the proved facts are consistent with innocence, the defendant is entitled to an acquittal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 1887; Dec. Dig. § 784.*]

2. INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 233*)—KEEPING AT PLACE OF BUSINESS—EVIDENCE.

Where one is charged with the offense of keeping on hand at his place of business alcoholic, spirituous, malt, or intoxicating liquors prohibited by law, and intoxicating liquors are shown to have been found at his place of business, such evidence is sufficient to support the inference that the forbidden liquors were kept by the owner of the place of business, but such inference is not conclusive, for it may be shown, among other things, that the forbidden liquors were not the property of the accused, that they had been temporarily deposited in his place of business by some other person, and that the owner of the place of business had no knowledge of their presence or existence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Intoxicating Liquors, Cent. Dig. §§ 293, 295; Dec. Dig. § 233.*]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Oglethorpe; R. L. Greer, Judge.

Noah Lewis was convicted of keeping intoxicating liquors at his place of business, and brings error. Reversed.

Hixon & Greer and L. J. Blalock, for plaintiff in error. Jule Felton, for the State.

RUSSELL, J. Lewis was tried and convicted of the offense of keeping on hand at his place of business, to wit, his barber shop, "certain alcoholic, spirituous, malt, or intoxicating liquors, or intoxicating bitters, or other drinks, which, if drunk to excess, will produce intoxication." He excepts to the judgment overruling his motion for new trial.

The evidence for the state showed that at about 10 o'clock in the morning a policeman entered the defendant's barber shop, and found in a room formerly used as a bathroom four quart bottles of whisky. The defendant had charge of this former bathroom, and a door led from it into his barber shop proper. The evidence in behalf of the defendant disclosed that the bathroom had a window shutter on the outside, but no door except the one opening into the barber shop; and this door was open at the time the whisky was found. The shop is a public shop, in which people are coming in and going out all of the time, getting hair cut and being shaved. The defendant contended that some one else put the whisky into his shop the night before, and stated that the panes of glass had fallen out of the window, and that for anybody to get in there was nothing to do but raise the window, which was not locked or fastened. The evidence shows that the shop had been searched before for whisky, but none had ever been found there, and that the four bottles of whisky found on this occasion were all full.

We think the evidence was sufficient to raise the inference that the defendant was keeping the whisky in question on hand at his place of business, and, for that reason, was sufficient to support conviction. Express exception is taken, however, to the fact that the court failed to charge the jury the law upon the subject of circumstantial evidence, inasmuch as the evidence in the case at bar was entirely circumstantial, and not wholly inconsistent with the hypothesis that the liquor found in the defendant's possession might have been put in his place of business by another without his knowledge or consent. As ruled by this court in Riley v. State, 1 Ga. App. 651, 57 S. E. 1031, and Glaze v. State, 2 Ga. App. 709, 58 S. E. 1126, and by the Supreme Court in Hamilton v. State, 96 Ga. 301, 22 S. E. 528, and Toler v. State, 107 Ga. 682, 33 S. E. 629, where the guilt of the defendant depends entirely upon circumstantial evidence, the attention of the jury should be called to the rule of law embodied in section 984 of the Penal Code of 1895, and the jury should be told in appropriate language that to warrant a conviction on circumstantial evidence the proven facts must not only be consistent with the hypothesis of guilt, but must exclude every other reasonable hypothesis but that of the guilt of the defendant. In the present case, from the fact that four quart bottles of whisky were found in the defendant's closet, the inference might arise that it was his whisky, and was being kept on hand there by him. On the other hand, under the evidence in the case, the inference is also suggested that the whisky might have been that of some patron of the barber shop, who had temporarily deposited it in the closet or bathroom without the knowledge of the defendant. Furthermore, the case is not like that of Jenks v. State, 4 Ga. App. 859, 62 S. E. 574, in which the facts that the mouth of the jug was still wet and smelled of corn whisky which had just passed through it, and that the whisky remained in the bottom of one of the glasses, pointed to the fact that whisky was being kept on hand; and, furthermore, the defendant in the Jenks Case admitted that the whisky which was found was his property, and that he was keeping it for his wife. In the Jenks Case some of the whisky was found under lock and key, and the defendant had the key in his possession. The facts made a case of direct proof. In the present case, to settle the ownership (which was admitted in the Jenks Case), the jury were compelled to rely upon the mere circumstance that the whisky was in the place of business of the defendant, in so public a place as a barber shop, and the evidence shows that the barber shop was in continuous use as such by the public. The mere fact that any article of personal property such as a walking cane or a book or even a bundle containing a bottle of whisky was there might raise the inference that the article in question was the property of the proprietor of the barber shop, but the presumption would not be so conclusive as to raise the evidence of location into the class of direct proof; and for this reason we think that the court erred in failing to charge the jury the principle of law enunciated in section 984 of the Penal Code of 1895. The error was particularly harmful because it ignored and obliterated the sole defense of the defendant. While the finding of the whisky in a defendant's constructive possession at his place of business, might raise such a presumption that he was keeping it on hand in violation of the statute as would authorize a conviction, still it was not direct proof of the fact of its being kept on hand by the defendant, or that the defendant knew it had been deposited in his place of business. For instance, if the door had been closed in the present instance, instead of being open, and glasses were there for the purpose of drinking whisky, or if some of the bottles were empty, these circumstances would lend additional force to the conclusion that the whisky had not been temporarily deposited by some patron of the barber shop, or some passerby, but that it was the property of the defendant. There being no direct proof that the defendant was the owner of the whisky in question, nor that he brought it to the place of business (even though the fact of keeping whisky might be shown by circumstantial evidence), the guilt of the defendant depended at last entirely upon circumstantial evidence, and on account of the failure of the judge to properly instruct the jury upon this point, so as not to exclude an inference which the jury might have preferred, a new trial must be granted.

Judgment reversed.

SOUTHERN RY. CO. v. WRIGHT.

(No. 1,531.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. May 18, 1909.)

1. CARRIERS (§ 318*)—NEW TRIAL (§ 76*)—CARRIAGE OF PASSENGERS—ACTIONS—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY—GROUNDS—EXCESSIVE DAMAGES.

The verdict was authorized by the evidence, and the recovery cannot be set aside upon the ground that it was excessive, inasmuch as no showing is made that the finding was induced by prejudice or bias or by corrupt means.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Dec. Dig. § 318; * New Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 153-156; Dec. Dig. § 76.*]

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 207*)—PRESENTATION AND RESERVATION OF GROUNDS OF REVIEW—OBJECTION TO IMPROPER ARGUMENT.

It is the duty of the trial judge, even without request, to check improper remarks to the jury or improper conduct on the part of any person or persons in the presence of the jury, and to seek, by proper instruction to the jury, to remove any prejudicial effect that improper remarks or improper conduct may have been calculated to have against the opposite party; but a verdict will not be set aside because of such remarks or because of any omission of the judge to perform his duty in the matter, unless timely objection be made at the trial. In such case silence will be construed as a waiver of the right to object, or as an admission that the apparently prejudicial circumstance was in fact harmless.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 1500; Dec. Dig. § 207.*]

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 205*)—PRESENTATION AND RESERVATION OF GROUNDS OF REVIEW—OFFER OF EVIDENCE—NECESSITY.

An assignment of error based upon the refusal of the trial judge to permit a question to be answered presents no ground for review, unless the answer sought to be elicited is stated to him at the time of the ruling complained of.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 1282; Dec. Dig. § 205.*]

4. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 302*)—PRESENTATION OF QUESTIONS—MOTION FOR NEW TRIAL—STATEMENT OF GROUNDS.

A ground of a motion for new trial, complaining of admission or rejection of evidence, should be complete in itself or in connection with the exhibits attached to the motion, and should not require reference to be made to other parts of the record to render it intelligible. "A mere statement in a brief of evidence that the plaintiff 'introduced in evidence the mortality and annuity tables in the seventieth Georgia Report' does not authorize this court to take judicial cognizance of the contents of the tables published by the official reporter as an appendix to that volume." W. & A. R. R. Co. v. Hyer, 113 Ga. 776, 39 S. E. 447.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 1747; Dec. Dig. § 302.*]

5. TRIAL (§ 203*)—APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1046*).

It is the duty of the court to inform the jury as to the issues submitted by the pleadings, and this may be done by stating the contentions of both parties as they appear in the pleadings, which the jury will have with them in the jury room. And, if any issue has by any means been eliminated, it is the duty of the judge to so inform the jury. The attention of the jury may be called to the abandonment of an issue stated in the pleadings by first stating the original contentions, and then informing the jury as to what has been abandoned. And where counsel in open court calls the attention of the court to the fact that his client has abandoned one of the contentions raised by the pleadings, and the court acquiesces, the fact that the court may previously have stated that the abandoned contention appears in the original pleadings, does not prejudice the cause of the defendant, but rather tends to accentuate the plaintiff's abandonment of his position.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. § 478; Dec. Dig. § 203; * Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 4134; Dec. Dig. § 1046.*]

6. CARRIERS (§§ 247, 303*)—CARRIAGE OF PASSENGERS—INJURIES—TERMINATION OF RELATION.

The duty of extraordinary diligence for the safety of passengers, devolving upon a carrier, continues until the passenger has safely alighted from the train, and it is not error to so instruct the jury. Whether extraordinary diligence requires that a passenger be assisted in alighting is dependent upon the circumstances and conditions surrounding the passenger, and the facts of the particular case. If, in the exercise of extraordinary care, it should become necessary for the safety of a particular passenger in an emergency that the passenger be assisted to alight, it would then become the duty of the carrier to assist the passenger.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. §§ 992, 1232; Dec. Dig. §§ 247, 303.*]

7. TRIAL (§ 255*)—APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1032*)—REQUESTS FOR INSTRUCTIONS—BURDEN OF SHOWING PREJUDICE.

In the absence of a timely request, it is not necessarily reversible error for the trial court to omit to charge upon the burden of proof. In a case where complaint is made that no instructions are given as to the burden of proof, the general rule that he who assigns error must show not only error, but that the error was hurtful to him, should be applied.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 627-641; Dec. Dig. § 255; * Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 4050; Dec. Dig. § 1032.*]

8. DAMAGES (§ 216*)—ASSESSMENT—INSTRUCTIONS—FUTURE PAIN.

In determining whether a plaintiff is entitled to recover for future pain and suffering and the amount of such recovery, it is proper for the jury to ascertain from the evidence whether the injury which occasioned the suffering is permanent or merely temporary.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Damages, Cent. Dig. § 552; Dec. Dig. § 216.*]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Polk County; F. A. Irwin, Judge.

Action by Dora Wright against the Southern Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Trawick & Ault, J. L. Tison, and Maddox, McCamy & Shumate, for plaintiff in error.

J. M. McBride, U. G. Brock, and G. R. Hutchens, for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. Mrs. Dora Wright brought suit against the Southern Railway Company for $10,000 damages on account of injuries alleged to have been occasioned by the act of an agent or employé of the defendant company in jerking her from one of its passenger trains. The original petition contained also an allegation that the plaintiff's fall (which was the cause of her injury) was caused by the fact that the stool which was placed at the foot of the car steps to aid passengers in alighting was placed upon rough and uneven ground, but this allegation of negligence was abandoned upon the trial. The jury rendered a verdict for the plaintiff for $3,500; and the defendant excepts to the judgment overruling its motion for new trial.
